Mr. President, I very much hope that during the morning hour we shall be able to enter into a unanimous-consent agreement that will lead to a vote on the pending question at some time during the day.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, so far as the pecuniary aspect of the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] is concerned it is a matter in which I can truthfully say that I am not particularly interested. I have invariably voted for every appropriation made by Congress for the enforcement of prohibition, and I should vote for this additional appropriation of $25,000,000 but for the fact that the very highest fiscal officer of the Government, the Secretary of the Treasury, has said that no good use can be made of it at this time.

Of course, in feeling that it would be a mistake, in the face of that declaration of the Secretary of the Treasury, to make any such additional appropriation, I am also to some extent influenced by the fact that the general counsel of the Anti-Saloon League itself, Mr. McBride, the successor of Wayne B. Wheeler, says that he also deems it inexpedient that such an additional appropriation should be made just now. Certainly he is in about as good a position as any man in the United States to form an opinion as to how far it would be wise, even from the strict prohibition point of view, to have such an additional appropriation made by Congress. Nor am I unmindful of the fact that the Methodist Board of Prohibition, Temperance, and Morals, which has been one of the most powerful influences behind prohibition for years, agrees with Mr. McBride.

So far as I know, the only active spirits connected with any of the great private agencies in this country which have been seeking to enforce prohibition who are outspokenly in favor of the appropriation are Bishop Cannon and Mr. Crawford, the president and secretary of the Board of Temperance and Social Service of the Methodist Episcopal Church South.

In that state of circumstances I feel that I could not justify myself, from the standpoint of official duty, if I were to fly in the face of the advice of the Secretary of the Treasury, and vote for this appropriation. But if the Secretary of the Treasury will say that he favors the appropriation, with the modification suggested a few moments ago, then I will be very glad to vote for it.

Nor, to turn to the utterances of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] a few moments ago, am I one of those who believe that prohibition can not be enforced. I believe that it can be enforced if the Government will spend enough money and multiply enough judicial tribunals for the purpose of enforcing it, and will exhibit in every respect the ruthless disregard to the fundamental principles of American civil liberty which would be involved in extreme measures of enforcement. If the Government will make the machine of prohibition enforcement elaborate enough, highly organized enough, crushing enough, it can enforce prohibition; but, as I said a few days ago, it can enforce it only as the Spanish Inquisition enforced Catholicism in Spain.

To me there was something simply pathetic in the confessions of impotence that fell from the lips of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS], with reference to prohibition enforcement, in the current debate. The only trouble about prohibition enforcement, said the Senator from Nebraska, is that there is too much partisanship in its administration. That has certainly been true in the past, whether it is true at this moment or not.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] at any rate is not likely to forget what General Andrews testified before the Senate prohibition subcommittee in April, 1926, on that subject. I read from the printed testimony taken by that subcommittee. General Andrews said:

> I think that resulted in the dropping of about 300 (prohibition field agents) right there.
> Senator REED of Missouri. Three hundred out of 3,600?
> Assistant Secretary ANDREWS. No; out of about 2,000 field agents. And since then some of my administrators are very keen to make sure.
> Now we anticipate civil service. I believe that the Congress will pass it. My reorganization bill includes a clause that the appointments shall be made under civil service. We want to come up to the day when civil service is effective in our force, with high-grade men in the organization. You know just as well as I do how the men were selected, probably, in the past.

Senator REED of Missouri. No; I do not. I wish you would tell us.

Assistant Secretary ANDREWS. Don't you, really?

Senator REED of Missouri. I do not.

Assistant Secretary ANDREWS. Well, I am told that they were selected on the recommendation of the directors in the field and the field supervisors of the more mobile force, and that there was more or less political reason for their appointment in many cases.

Senator REED of Missouri. That is, you mean they were appointed generally on recommendation of somebody in politics or somebody who held office?

Assistant Secretary ANDREWS. Or some other organization, maybe.

Senator REED of Missouri. What other organization?

Assistant Secretary ANDREWS. Well, any that are interested.

Senator REED of Missouri. Well, can you name some of them?

Assistant Secretary ANDREWS. Yes; I could name the churches and the——

Senator REED of Missouri. What churches?

Assistant Secretary ANDREWS. All the churches, so far as I know. They are all interested in this law.

Senator REED of Missouri. And they have been recommending men?

Assistant Secretary ANDREWS. I think so. I have heard recommendations from them.

Senator REED of Missouri. Who else?

Assistant Secretary ANDREWS. The Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the Anti-Saloon League, or any of these organizations that are interested in the welfare of the community and the enforcement of the law.

Senator REED of Missouri. And who represented the Anti-Saloon League particularly?

A little later Senator REED brought out the fact that it was Wayne B. Wheeler. Of course, nothing but gross, crass, unscrupulous partisanship could result from such applications of the spoils system of patronage as those. How flagrant the results were is only too well illustrated in some observations by Maj. Chester O. Mills, who was at one time the Federal administrator of the State of New York, after he lost his position through the machinations of that partisanship. I quote from Major Mills:

Gen. Lincoln C. Andrews, who was then in charge of prohibition enforcement, had notified the public, as he had repeatedly assured me, that politics would have no place in enforcement. * * * Gradually orders to exclude politicians were modified. I was told to advise with the local party leaders regarding appointments to the force of 240 men working under me. * * * In scores of cases involving useless and venal agents, suspected alcohol promoters, and outlaw breweries I felt the working of the political machine, whose wheels do not grind slowly, although they grind exceeding fine. Through weeks and months contests with the politicians multiplied, bickering increased, until finally action taken against the worst agents I have ever encountered provoked the politicians into open mutiny. * * * They complained that out of the 240 men in my district, nearly one-tenth of the entire Federal dry force, 103 were Democrats. The full roster was submitted to the bosses for inspection. There were only 12 Democrats on the force. * * * General Andrews ordered me to consult Charles D. Hilles, the national committeeman of the Republican Party from New York. Mr. Hilles and I had a conference lasting two and one-half hours. * * * He pointed out that the patronage system prevailed in every prohibition district throughout the country and that my territory would not be an exception.

Of course Mr. Hilles and other politicians in the State of New York made the seat of Major Mills so hot that he had to vacate it.

It was because of partisan scandals and outrages like these that the prohibition element in this country found that it was necessary to bring forward the Cramton bill and to place prohibition agents within the Federal classified civil service. The Cramton bill is the only measure looking to the application of the merit system of appointment to any office, Federal or State, against which I have ever voted; and I voted against that not because I did not believe that it would work a very considerable improvement in the personnel of the prohibition field force, because I did believe that it would, but because I believed that even the salutary merit system of appointment would be unable to neutralize the depraving, the corrupting influence of prohibition, and that ultimately the only result of placing these prohibition field agents under the merit system of appointment would be to discredit that system even in its preexisting applications. Just as certainly as I stand here at this moment I believe that that will finally be the result.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SACKETT in the chair). Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. WHEELER. I desire to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. BRUCE. I am glad to yield.

Mr. WHEELER. A statement was made a moment ago by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] to the effect that in certain parts of the country the law is being enforced. I know the Senator has given a good deal of thought and attention to the statistics with reference to how the prohibition law is being enforced in the States. Will the Senator tell me of any State in the Union that he knows of where it is being enforced?

Mr. BRUCE. I do not know of one single, solitary State in the Union where this law is being successfully enforced. It is only recently that attention has been called to the tremendous growth of law violations as respects prohibition in the State of Kansas, a State which adopted State prohibition long before the adoption of the eighteenth amendment.

A most striking illustration of the extent to which the prohibition law is being violated in Maine, too, another prohibition State of long standing, has been recently brought to my attention through the press of that State. No less an authority than General Andrews himself—and he was about the ablest, frankest, and most courageous man that has ever headed the Prohibition Unit—is on record as saying that bootlegging was coextensive with the entire territory of the United States. I do not want to single out any particular section for animadversion——

Mr. WHEELER. I was going to suggest that the Senator from Georgia said that possibly in some cities the law is not being enforced. From my travels over the country it would seem to me that even in the smallest communities the law is being violated just as much as it is in the larger cities.

Mr. BRUCE. That is shown most strikingly by the annual reports of the Moderation League of New York. The directors of that league are men of the highest standing in the United States in the professions, including the clergy, and in business circles; that is to say, men like Bishop Fiske, of New York, Harvey Fiske, president of one of the great New York life insurance companies, and Elihu Root, the great lawyer, and others whom I might mention. The Moderation League has brought out an annual report for a good many years, and its last report came out only a few weeks ago. Those reports show that throughout the period covered by the reports arrests for drunkenness in more than 500 cities and towns of this country have steadily mounted up. It was only this morning that the Washington Post brought to our attention the fact that during the year 1928 there were more arrests for drunkenness in the city of Washington than in any year since 1911.

Mr. WHEELER. I noticed a statement in the paper by Mr. Howard, or some one in charge of or at the head of some prohibition organization, to the effect that before Congress appropriated any more money for the enforcement of prohibition it ought to see to it that the law is enforced here in Washington.

Mr. BRUCE. Yes; that is to say, here where the President has his palatial home, here where the Supreme Court sits, here where Congress convenes—even here the Prohibition Unit is powerless to enforce prohibition.

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BRUCE. I yield.

Mr. TYSON. I would like to ask the Senator from Maryland, that being the case and prohibition not being enforced, if he has any remedy for the situation?

Mr. BRUCE. I have no remedy for it except to appropriate $300,000,000 a year and to cover the whole face of the land with courts of justice, as Mr. Doran suggested.

Mr. TYSON. I would like to ask the Senator, if that is the case, why he is not in favor of appropriating at least $25,000,000 at this time?

Mr. BRUCE. I should most assuredly vote for it, as I said a moment ago when perhaps the Senator was not in the Chamber, had not the Secretary of the Treasury and others peculiarly interested in prohibition enforcement reached the conclusion that just at this time it would be inexpedient for the interests of prohibition itself that any such additional appropriation should be made.

Mr. TYSON. Does the Senator think the time ever will come when it will be expedient to make such an appropriation?

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator knows perfectly well, if we are going to get back to first principles in this matter, that I personally do not think that there ever will be a time before the crack of doom when it would not be an unwise thing for this country to enforce prohibition—and why? Because, as Edmund Burke once said in one of his sublime bursts of eloquence, "No; never did nature say one thing and wisdom another."

Mr. TYSON. Does the Senator think we can repeal the eighteenth amendment?

Mr. BRUCE. I do. Just as sure as God sits in His mighty pavilion in the skies, that unnatural and irrational amendment will some day be modified.

Mr. TYSON. Does the Senator feel that it ought to be enforced while it is on the statute books?

Mr. BRUCE. I do; and I have always voted to enforce it.

Mr. TYSON. I think the Senator ought to aid in getting some remedy for the enforcement which he says is not now being had.

Mr. BRUCE. I brought forward a provision for the appropriation of $270,000,000.

Mr. TYSON. We have one pending now providing for $25,000,000.

Mr. BRUCE. Then comes along the Secretary of the Treasury, the chief enforcement official of the Government, and says that at this time it could not be used to advantage.

Mr. TYSON. Some people might disagree with him on that question.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator has the right to disagree. The Senator may disagree with Mr. Mellon. Some not only disagree with him but have not hesitated to misrepresent and traduce him. In that respect Mr. Mellon always reminds me of the story told by Benjamin Franklin. Some man in New England bought a lot of onions somewhere and stored them in his cellar. He could not sell them as soon as he expected to do and the consequence was that the onions began to sprout. Every day or so the owner would go down in his cellar only to find that they had sprouted still more than they had done the day before. Finally he succumbed in disgust and exclaimed: "Damn those onions. The more I curse them the more they grow." So it seems to me that the more Mr. Mellon is misrepresented and slandered the more he grows in public esteem and affection.

Some time ago I was at a great press gathering, one of the greatest in the country, and notwithstanding the high esteem in which I knew that Mr. Mellon was held by the American people, I was deeply interested to see that his rising elicited far more applause than that of any other member of the present administration who was present, and I said to one of the most distinguished newspaper correspondents at Washington, "Much as I know of the degree in which Mr. Mellon is esteemed by the people of the United States, I had not expected such a truly extraordinary ovation." "Why, Senator," replied the correspondent, "that is the kind of reception that is always given to him by the press." And I should like to know who is there in this land who knows better the virtues and the shortcomings, the worth and the lack of worth of public men, than the representatives of the press?

All that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] could say, I repeat, was, "There is too much partisanship in the administration of the prohibition law," and that notwithstanding the fact that we only recently passed the Cramton bill for the very purpose of eliminating partisanship from the workings of that law.

Then followed the suggestion of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] as to how prohibition is to be enforced. He said, "The thing to do is what I do. Whenever I secure the appointment of a prohibition agent I make him give me a written pledge that he will faithfully perform his duty." Think of that! No wonder that the sagacious, practical, hard-headed Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] should at once have spoken up and said, "Well, if a man would not be bound by the official oath he has to take as a Federal officer, what reason is there to believe that he would be bound simply by a written pledge that he might give to the Senator from Washington?"

So far as I am concerned, because my true relations to prohibition remain yet to be fully understood, I have never had a man appointed to the Prohibition Service that my last word to him was not, if not literally, yet substantially, "Do not disgrace yourself or me by not doing the full measure of your duty as a prohibition agent, without fear or favor."

As to my friend, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS], all that he could do in the course of this debate was helplessly to admit that there are now 50 bootleggers for every one of the old saloons.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. BRUCE. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. I did not hear the Senator from Georgia make that admission, but if he did—and I am sure he did if the Senator from Maryland says he did——

Mr. BRUCE. I certainly thought he did.

Mr. HEFLIN. If that is the situation, I want to say that from my observation of the blind-tiger business and the bootleggers, and of the barroom business, all the blind tigers combined did not sell one-fiftieth of the amount of whisky the barrooms sold in the United States.

Mr. BRUCE. How can the Senator say that when in many communities there are more arrests for drunkenness to-day than there were during the preprohibition day? How can he say that when such an authority as Mr. Bigelow, of the State Health Commission of Massachusetts, has recently declared that the increase of deaths from alcoholism throughout the entire census registration area since the enactment of the Volstead law has been 500 per cent? How can he say that when the health records of the community in which I live, not to go any further, disclose such facts as these: Since the enactment of the Volstead law the death rate from alcoholism in the State of Maryland has risen from 2 per 100,000 population in 1921 to 11 in 1928? The statistics from which I quote are derived from the Census Bureau. In the State of New York cases of alcoholic insanity have trebled.

How can less liquor be sold and there be more arrests for drunkenness than ever, more deaths from alcoholism than ever, more cases of alcoholic insanity than ever?

While I am referring to conditions in the State of Maryland, I might add another illustration to show how utterly groundless is the idea that savings-bank deposits in this country go hand-in-hand with prohibition. Only a few days ago the press called attention to the fact that in Maryland, certainly a State that has given the prohibition authorities, in proportion to population, about as much trouble as any other State in the Union, the gain in savings-bank deposits per capita last year was not less than $37 per inhabitant. I might go on to show that the groundlessness of such a suggestion is also illustrated by Australian statistics that have been called to my attention. Prohibition does not exist in Australia. Yet, if I am correctly informed, savings-bank deposits in Australia are larger per capita than they are in the United States.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. BRUCE. I yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I was in the House of Representatives when there were open barrooms in the city of Washington, and it was a rare thing to walk down the street in the afternoon and not to see from a half dozen to a dozen or more drunken men staggering out of saloons and getting into vehicles and going home or staggering on the streets. I have not seen a half dozen drunken men in Washington in a half dozen years.

Mr. BRUCE. I have just referred to the fact that there were more arrests for drunkenness in Washington last year than in any year since 1911.

Mr. HEFLIN. I should also like to say to the Senator that in those days when the barrooms were on trial; when the people were watching the barrooms, and an effort was being made to get rid of them, the barrooms controlled the local politics, they had their hands on the policemen, and men could get drunk and revel in whisky but there was no report made of it. Now, however, they have their sleuthhounds running everywhere and getting up every case they can in order to hurl it against the prohibition amendment. That is what I think of that.

Mr. BRUCE. That may be so down in Alabama, because, of course, activity has to be redoubled in order to deal with the situation which that State has to handle. I brought out the fact only a short time ago that there are 20 arrests for drunkenness per 10,000 inhabitants in the city of New York, while there is an average of 231 arrests for drunkenness per 10,000 inhabitants in three of the cities of Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, in my State, I think, the law is very well enforced. It is difficult to enforce it entirely in the large cities, but I dare say that in fifty-odd counties in the rural portions of my State the law is enforced, although, of course, not absolutely enforced. However, the conditions that obtain are so much better than those that obtained under the barroom system that the people would not even think of going back to the old system.

Mr. BRUCE. Well, drunkenness, of course, under present conditions is not as visible as it used to be, for the simple reason that there is no longer the open corner saloon that existed formerly, and, consequently, drunkards are not picked up by the police on their way from the corner saloon to their homes as formerly. Drinking has been shifted to no small degree to the home from the saloon. One of the very worst results of prohibition is that all kinds of brewing and fermenting operations are now being carried on in the home, under the very eyes of young children, which were not carried on under the license system.

Mr. HEFLIN. The difference is now, it is said, that men get drunk steadily in the home, while under the old barroom system they got drunk and went home and raised cain with the whole family.

Mr. BRUCE. The point I am making is that conditions are such that drunkenness is not so visible as it used to be, but it exists in the same or nearly the same volume that it did formerly, and is steadily increasing.

Mr. HEFLIN. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him right there?

Mr. BRUCE. I will ask the Senator to excuse me for a moment. Take, for instance, a community like that in which I live. I asked the police commissioner of Baltimore city not long ago whether he had changed his regulations with reference to arrests for drunkenness—that is to say, whether the police of Baltimore city were now instructed to be more strict than formerly. He said, "Not at all; there has been no change of any kind in our police regulations with reference to arrests for drunkenness." Yet, at the same time, as I have said, we find that dreadful increase in deaths from alcoholism in Maryland to which I referred a few moments ago.

Mr. HEFLIN. To show the Senator how well the law is being enforced in some places in my State they tell a story about an old gentleman whom they call Uncle Johnnie. He lived down at Greenville, Ala., and they said, "Uncle Johnnie, you used to be all the time talking about prohibition and advocating prohibition; we do not hear you say anything about prohibition now. What is the matter with you?" "Well," he said, "by golly, it has got to be so that you can't get any for yourself." [Laughter.]

Mr. BRUCE. There is no such dearth, so far as my observation prevails. Furthermore, the Senator must bear in mind that, so far as certain elements of our social life are concerned, there is more temperance and self-restraint now than there was formerly in the matter of drink. Self-restraint in the matter of drink was becoming more and more marked, as the Senator knows, when the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act went into effect. I have seen many people drink a glass of wine since the enactment of the Volstead Act, but I have never seen any individual at a social entertainment since that time who did it in the slightest degree under the influence of drink. That being so, why, I ask, should all of us be deprived of the privilege of drinking in moderation? Unquestionably when not abused drink is a perfectly proper and legitimate source of human enjoyment. It quickens the human faculties, it mellows the human sympathies. I am speaking of drink unattended by excess. Why, therefore, should they who drink in moderation be deprived of the physical gratification of drink because of the comparatively small percentage of the entire community who can not drink without drinking immoderately, but would yet continue to drink under any circumstances, prohibition or no prohibition, law or no law?

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator knows what St. Paul said about that?—

> If meat make my brother to offend, I will eat no flesh while the world standeth, lest I make my brother to offend.

There are some people who can not drink in moderation.

Mr. BRUCE. I believe also that St. Paul recommended a drink to one of his contemporaries for his stomach's sake, did he not?

Mr. HEFLIN. That was when he was sick.

Mr. BRUCE. I do not recall that.

Mr. HEFLIN. The law provides that one may get a prescription at a drug store of good whisky, whisky made in a proper manner by a distillery, and he can get it every 10 days. One can also buy port wine, and various other kinds of liquor can be legally purchased under similar circumstances, because the law permits it. That is how I know.

Mr. BRUCE. How did the Senator find that out?

Mr. HEFLIN. If I needed it for medicinal purposes, I could get it, and so could the Senator.

Mr. BRUCE. I might say that there is no need of my falling back on any medical consideration so far as a harmless glass of wine or two are concerned.

Mr. President, the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] asked a very pertinent question as to what extent bootlegging prevails throughout the United States. I have some figures here, if I can only lay my hands on them, relating to that subject. Because the most strenuous and enthusiastic advocates of prohibition seem to come from the South, I called attention only a few days ago to the fact that in 1925, 70 per cent of all the distilleries which were seized by the Prohibition Unit were seized in the 11 old Confederate States; and, not to give too personal a direction to my remarks, I might say to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] that I brought out on the floor of the Senate about two or perhaps three years ago the fact—and I brought it out in the light of a number of communications which I had received from prominent citizens of Atlanta—that the preceding Easter Sunday in Atlanta had been marked by more drunkenness than had ever been known in the history of the city during either the pre or the post Volstead era. Now, I am going into a little detail.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EDGE in the chair). Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not know on what authority the Senator from Maryland bases his statement, but I do not think it can be true. I have seen more whisky come to my little town than is now coming there——

Mr. BRUCE. I am sorry that I can not yield, but the Senator a few moments ago was quite unwilling to accord me the privilege of asking him a question or so.

Mr. GEORGE. I regret very much that I did not do so.

Mr. BRUCE. If time were not such an urgent matter with me now, I would be glad to yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. I suggest to the Senator from Maryland that he referred to the Senator from Georgia and to his State.

Mr. BRUCE. If the Senator from Georgia will just let me complete the statement which I am about to make, I will be glad to yield to him. I must say, now that I am about to leave this body, that it is a source of great regret to me that I ever failed to yield at any time to any Senator when he asked me to do so.

Some time ago Mr. Lawson Purdy, the head, if I am not mistaken, of the Department of Taxation and Assessment in the City of New York, wrote an article for the New York Times headed Figures of Moderation League, showing that only 10 cities in the United States have a smaller number of arrests per 10,000 population (than New York). He has this to say about Georgia:

> Georgia, if we may believe Representative Upshaw, is a very temperate State and wishes to avoid the contamination of its neighbors. It is hard to get statistics from Georgia. We have statistics for only four cities with a population of 256,729 and 9,636 arrests, being 375 per 10,000—

As against 20 per 10,000 for the city of New York.

The trouble about our friends from the South—and I can speak about it freely in that connection, for I myself happen to be a southerner—is that they do not find statistics quite as agreeable reading as do the inhabitants of some other portions of the United States, and consequently, for that reason, they are not as familiar as they might be with prohibition statistics relating to the South.

Let me turn now to some of the other Southern States besides Georgia and compare the conditions in those States with the rate of 20 arrests for drunkenness per 10,000 inhabitants in the city of New York.

Before I do that, however, let me advert for a moment to Kansas and read what this article says about Kansas.

The writer says:

> Compare some of the States that vote dry with the city of New York, which votes wet. Kansas should afford a good comparison. Statistics for seven cities in Kansas with a population of 153,431 show 1,723 arrests, or 112 per 10,000—

That is not as bad as Georgia, it is true, but still it is more than five times as bad as New York—

> There is only one place in Kansas for which we have statistics that shows a lower ratio than New York, that is Newton—population, 9,781; 15 arrests. Wichita is the other extreme; it has 149 arrests per 10,000, more than seven times as many as New York.

Then passing from Kansas, where they have been trying for generations to enforce prohibition, and where things are worse to-day than they have been for some time, Mr. Purdy passes to what he calls the "wetness of the South." First of all, he takes up Arkansas:

> In Little Rock there were 695 arrests for drunkenness in 1925, or 107 per 10,000.
> Mississippi comes next with two cities. Columbus is very low in the list. There are only 45 cities in the United States with a lower record for drunkenness than Columbus; still it is almost twice as high as New York. Vicksburg had 173 arrests per 10,000, eight times more than New York's record.
> North Carolina follows, and the average for five cities is 136 per 10,000, nearly seven times that of New York.

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BRUCE. I will yield to the Senator from Georgia first. The Senator from Georgia desired me to yield, and I gladly yield to him. I should have yielded to him just after I made my reference to Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. I beg the Senator's pardon for not having yielded to him in my time. I did wish to finish the statement I was making. That was the only reason why I declined to yield.

Mr. BRUCE. That is all right, Mr. President.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not want to interrupt the Senator, except simply to say that when we compare crime statistics, and particularly when we deal with the question of prohibition, we must take into consideration the character of the population.

Mr. BRUCE. Of course, we must; and there are special reasons why there should be more arrests for drunkenness in some sections than in others.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRUCE. And if there were not, you would not have been the advocates of prohibition that you have been.

Mr. GEORGE. I think there is a good deal in what the Senator says; but the Senator's statistics, if they led to anything, would lead to the conclusion that New York is the soberest place in the country.

Mr. BRUCE. It is. It is the most civilized place in the country.

Mr. GEORGE. And the soberest?

Mr. BRUCE. And the soberest. In other words, they have more self-restraint in New York. They have more civilization, and consequently more self-restraint.

Mr. GEORGE. I make no reflection upon the city or the people of the city; but I can not think that, taking its population by and large, it is any soberer than other cities.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator, of course, has not lived in a great cosmopolitan city such as I have lived in. Did the Senator ever move among large groups of Italians, for instance, and see them drink?

Mr. GEORGE. No.

Mr. BRUCE. Or French, and see them drink?

Mr. GEORGE. No.

Mr. BRUCE. They know how to drink without making beasts of themselves. In the first place, Italians as a rule drink only wine, and it is a point with them not to drink even that to excess. Of course the population of New York is largely a foreign population, and the habits of this foreign population have been formed in the Old World and brought over here. Consequently, if it is from countries like Italy it drinks with a degree of moderation and self-restraint that I am sorry to say is not characteristic of our native population.

Mr. GEORGE. It would be very difficult for me to believe, Mr. President, in the face of any statistics, that there is less whisky consumed per capita in New York than in Little Rock or almost any other city that might be mentioned.

Mr. BRUCE. I do not say less drinking per capita. I say less drunkenness.

Mr. GEORGE. There might not be as much open drunkenness, because you have a different population to consider. There might not be as many arrests.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I do not say that there is less drinking. I say that there is less drunkenness, because, of course, if my theory is right, prohibition is not indicative of a high order of civilization, but of a low order of civilization—that is to say, a state of society under which men have not the moral restraint to keep their appetite for drink within bounds.

Mr. GEORGE. I understand the Senator's contention about it; but I do not think there is anything in the Senator's statistics, and I do not think the country thinks there is anything in them.

Mr. BRUCE. There is a lot of drunkenness in them.

Mr. GEORGE. There may be lots of drunkenness in them; but no man who lives in the South could ever be persuaded that there is more whisky consumed there now than formerly.

Mr. BRUCE. I can judge only from the number of arrests for drunkenness that are reported from that section as well as from other sections, the number of deaths from alcoholism, and what not. It seems to me that you can not have people arrested for drunkenness, and dying of alcoholism, or lapsing into alcoholic insanity, without all the morbid sequels of every description that follow drunkenness.

Mr. GEORGE. You might easily have very much worse whisky, and you might easily have very many more deaths from consuming it.

Mr. BRUCE. No; the whisky of the South—I do not speak from personal observation, but I speak from highly credible testimony—the whisky that is used in the South as a rule is a pretty pure, good article. I know nothing about that of my own personal knowledge, I repeat; but I have had persons who do know say to me that the whisky that is manufactured by the southern stills is free from the toxic qualities that mark whisky that is manufactured in other portions of the United States, and can be drunk with a higher degree of impunity.

Mr. GEORGE. Let me make this statement to the Senator, and let him look on the other side of the picture just a little, whatever may be his views. I am not arguing from the standpoint of my view about anything, or how I would like to have this particular law operate; but let me ask him to take the other view of it.

Just before I came to the Senate last fall a car of ladies, one of whom is very dear to me, left one of the near-by cities of my State long after nightfall and traveled the distance of 65 miles to my home. That could not possibly have happened at the time when whisky was legally sold in that city or in that section of Georgia. There is not a man who would have permitted it. Those are facts that speak much louder than the gathered statistics of a few statisticians, spread about by a few newspapers whose representatives associate with about 1 per cent of the population of a city, and that 1 per cent within the realm where drinking is very much indulged in.

Mr. BRUCE. All I have to say is that the conditions were absolutely different in the southern community in which I was born and bred. I grew up on a plantation with a population of some 500 people, all of whom were negroes, with the exception of a mere handful of whites. I have been familiar with that plantation as boy and man for more than 60 years, and there never was a grave crime of any description committed on it. I recollect that two great big silver flagons used to stand on a table near the front door of the mansion house on that plantation night and day. Who would leave any silver flagons in the part of the world where I live, or in the parts of the world where most of my brother Senators live, exposed to theft in that manner? I say without a moment's hesitation that, so far as I know, the life of man and the honor of woman were just as safe in that old Virginia community before the adoption of the eighteenth amendment as they are to-day.

Now, let us pass on to North Carolina. I am still quoting Mr. Purdy; and here I must be very careful, of course, not to wound the susceptibilities of my friend the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], for whom I entertain the very highest degree of respect:

North Carolina follows; and the average for five cities is 136 per 10,000, nearly seven times that of New York. Wilmington is the temperate spot, with 70 arrests per 10,000, and Durham is the wet spot, with 353 per 10,000. If New York had as many arrests as Durham, it would have over 180,000 instead of 11,011 arrests.

Texas is fourth on the list. We have statistics from eight cities, no one of them as temperate as New York; but one is very temperate, indeed, as cities go—Sherman, 15,031 people; 39 arrests; 26 per 10,000. The average for Texas is 199 per 10,000, with two cities vieing with each other for the record—Dallas and Galveston, with 286 per 10,000 each. The 8 cities of Texas have a population of 439,000. There were 8,786 arrests for drunkenness, or 199 per 10,000.

South Carolina comes next with seven cities. The average for the seven is 208 arrests per 10,000. Orangeburg is the most temperate with 82, and Greenville with the greatest number of arrests for drunkenness, 436 per 10,000. Just remember that New York has 20. If there were as many arrests in New York in proportion to population there would be over 230,000 arrests instead of 11,011. The seven cities in South Carolina have a population of 178,614. There were 3,718 arrests for drunkenness, which is 208 per 10,000.

Virginia comes next with nine cities having a population of 465,782. There were 10,462 arrests for drunkenness, almost as large a number as in New York. The average for the nine Virginia cities is 224 arrests per 10,000.

It gives me the greatest pleasure to call the attention of my friend the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] to the statement that follows:

The most temperate spot is Lynchburg—

That, of course, is the home of the Senator—with 160 per 10,000, and at the other extreme is Roanoke with 503 per 10,000.

Lynchburg is not very far from Roanoke, and I can not help but suspect that some of its citizens slip over at times to Roanoke and help to run up the per capita number of arrests for drunkenness there.

It was possible to obtain statistics of arrests for drunkenness in only three cities in Alabama. The population of the three cities is 245,279; arrests for drunkenness, 5,684, being 231 per 10,000 of population. It is noticeable that these three cities—Birmingham, Troy, and Mobile—had half as many arrests for drunkenness as the city of New York.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, they must be very careless about getting up statistics in New York. I should think the number would be a hundred times more.

Mr. BRUCE. No; I think your people are a little careless about giving occasion for such statistics as I have been citing.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, is it not fair to assume that they are very careless about arresting drunken people in New York and very rigid about it in Virginia?

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes. I do not think they pay much attention to them.

Mr. BRUCE. If the New York police are careless about anything it never has been brought to my attention. The New York police force is supposed to be one of the finest police forces in the world.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. BRUCE. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not wish at this time to get into any discussion with the Senator with reference to statistics; but I have been a little surprised, to express it mildly, that the Senator takes New York with which to compare the prohibition conditions in all the other States of the Union. I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland if the State of New York, in which the city is situated, or the city of New York in any way assist the Federal Government in the enforcement of the prohibition law there?

Mr. BRUCE. As I understand, they do. Indeed, facts have been brought to my attention frequently which show that the New York City and State police at times render the most effective assistance to the Federal prohibition agents.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does not the Senator know that the enforcement act adopted by the Legislature of New York was repealed a short time ago?

Mr. BRUCE. Yes, of course it was; but that did not do away with the duty, the Senator knows as a lawyer——

Mr. SIMMONS. And there is no cooperation with the Federal Government by the city of New York or by the State of New York in the enforcement of this law.

Now, I want to ask the Senator another question. Has he statistics to show how many Federal agents have been assigned to the enforcement of this law in that city of 6,000,000 people, where it is the general belief in this country that there is more violation of the enforcement law than in any State in this Union?

Mr. BRUCE. It is a mistake.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not believe it is. From the information I have had from people who live in that city, and I believe the information is correct, there is no adequate enforcement there except by the Federal Government. I would like to have the Senator give the Senate and the country the statistics showing how many Federal officials are assigned to the enforcement of the law in that great center of crime in this country.

Mr. BRUCE. Of course, I deny that it is any such center of crime.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is.

Mr. BRUCE. It is the habit of many to picture New York as a painted Jezebel, the scarlet woman of the United States, and all that, a den of vice, and so on. It simply is not true. The Senator quite forgets that it is not the business of prohibition agents to arrest men for drunkenness. They arrest people for violations of the Volstead law. It is the duty of the State and city police to arrest men for drunkenness. I admit that there are not as many prohibition agents in the city of New York as proper prohibition enforcement calls for. Indeed, I brought out the fact only yesterday that in order to enforce prohibition in the State of New York Mr. Buckner, the former United States district attorney for the southern district of New York, stated that there would have to be 185 more courts and an expenditure of $75,000,000 a year.

Now I shall pass on to some other States.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, why would they need 185 more courts for the enforcement of prohibition if there were only 10,000 arrests a year there?

Mr. BRUCE. I do not see any reason for believing that there is not just as much effort to enforce prohibition in the city of New York as in other parts of the country. I think it can be freely admitted that there are not enough prohibition agents to enforce prohibition anywhere in the United States.

Mr. SIMMONS. A few days ago the Senator in his speech, laid great stress upon the fact that somebody—Durant, I believe—stated that if we were going to enforce the prohibition law there would be need of—how many judges was it, one hundred and some.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. Buckner said 185 additional courts would be necessary.

Mr. SIMMONS. Additional judges in the State of New York?

Mr. BRUCE. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yet the Senator now tells the Senate that there are only 10,000 arrests in that State.

Mr. BRUCE. Prohibition agents do not make arrests for drunkenness.

Mr. SIMMONS. If so many more judges were appointed for the enforcement of the law, it would seem that there would be a judge in that State for a very small number of violators.

Mr. BRUCE. There is no use in my repeating that prohibition agents do not make arrests for drunkenness. Why should I cover that ground again, if I may say so without discourtesy to the Senator?

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. BRUCE. I will have to ask the Senator to excuse me.

Mr. SIMMONS. I rather insist that after the remark of the Senator a little while ago, as a matter of courtesy—and I am sure the Senator does not desire to show me any discourtesy——

Mr. BRUCE. I have tried to answer the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should not have spoken as I did if the Senator had not referred the other day to these judges in connection with the congested condition of the courts in New York and the violations of the prohibition law.

Mr. BRUCE. I imagine that there is no more congestion there in proportion to population than there is elsewhere. Mr Doran said that to police prohibition fully the whole face of the country would have to be covered by courts, not simply the State of New York.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will say to the Senator now that we have only three Federal judges in North Carolina, and they have no difficulty whatever in disposing of the cases that come before them. In fact, I believe they have only about two or three sessions of their courts a year, which last never longer than two weeks, and they try not only prohibition cases, but every other infraction of the Federal law.

Mr. BRUCE. All I have to say in reply to that is that if all the judges in North Carolina feel it to be their duty, as did the judge whose communication was read here a few days ago, to express an opinion about the public policy of prohibition, it would be just as well if, instead of having three judges in North Carolina, they had only two.

Now let us pass on to Kentucky. Mr. Purdy states:

> We have statistics for six cities in Kentucky with a population of 387,288. The arrests for drunkenness were 9,285, which is 239 per 10,000. Ashland is the high spot, with 991 arrests per 10,000. * * *
> We have statistics for only three cities in Louisiana. Among their population of 417,404, arrests for drunkenness numbered 14,691—more arrests for drunkenness than in the city of New York.

Three cities in Louisiana. No wonder my friend the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] is such an ardent antiprohibitionist.

> Tennessee is the tenth on the list of the 12 Southern States. We have statistics for only three cities. The average is 355 per 10,000. The population of 417,404, arrests for 204,252; arrests for drunkenness were 7,263.

Then we come to Florida. Of course, everything grows in Florida with rank, tropical luxuriance.

> Last on the list is Florida. There was controversy in Tampa over the fact that Tampa has a high record of arrests for drunkenness. The population of Tampa in 1920 was 51,608. A Tampa newspaper contends that in five years Tampa doubled its population. Let us assume that it did, although disinterested observers do not credit it with so large an increase. Tampa would still have a record of 581 per 10,000, which is enough. The population of the three Florida cities in 1920 was 161,915; the number of arrests 9,598, which is 592 per 10,000.

That, I believe, completes the list of the Southern States. Immediately after leaving them, let me turn just for a moment to the statistics for Maine, where prohibition is supposed to have existed longer than it is supposed to have existed even in Kansas. This writer, Mr. Purdy, says:

> Maine has had prohibition for 77 years, and we have the statistics for 11 Maine cities. One of them has a better record for temperance than New York. Brewer; population, 6,064; arrests, 18 per 10,000. The high spot is Lewiston; population, 31,791; arrests, 290 per 10,000. The average for the 11 cities in the State of Maine is 158 per 10,000, nearly eight times the New York rate.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I for one must challenge the New York rate. I do not believe that is correct.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator does not want to believe that it is correct.

Mr. HEFLIN. No; I can not believe it is correct, because I know something about New York. I remember a very distinguished lawyer who closed a speech up there before a jury by saying:

Drunk on beer, wine, and rum,
New York, thy name is delirium.

Mr. BRUCE. That probably was composed by some Alabama poet.

Mr. HEFLIN. He was a very distinguished western lawyer, representing Thaw. I did not come from Maryland. I am inclined, however, to think that the people of whom the Senator speaks as being drunk down in Tampa, Fla., may have gone from up in this region somewhere.

Mr. BRUCE. No; the drift is all northward. Of course, as I said before, I am not bringing forward these statistics by way of invidious discrimination against the Southern States. Everybody knows that southern society is stratified, if I may use such an expression, in a wholly different way from society in other parts of the United States. I am happy to say that all the elements that make up its population are achieving a greater and greater degree of progress from year to year.

But one reason why the southern people are so strongly committed to the cause of prohibition is the peculiar composition of their population, which is essentially different from the social composition of other populations in the country. They have a large element in their population which in its earlier history simply could not be expected to exercise the proper degree of self-restraint, though it, too, I am glad to say, is making steady progress in every respect toward better things, and the result was that prohibition was precipitated on the South more rapidly than it would otherwise have been.

If I were to go through the rest of the country, there would be found not exactly the same conditions that are found in the Southern States as respect arrests for drunkenness per 10,000 population, but for all practical purposes very much the same conditions would be found, because, to repeat General Andrews's statement, bootlegging is coextensive with the entire territory of the United States.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BRUCE. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. Did the Senator say that the 10,000 cases of arrest in New York to which he referred were all for drunkenness?

Mr. BRUCE. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. In making the comparisons with other States, did the Senator give only the figures as to arrests for drunkenness?

Mr. BRUCE. I think Mr. Purdy's article deals exclusively with arrests for drunkenness.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was disposed to think that the Senator probably had gotten his statistics with reference to the other States mixed up, and referred not only to arrests for drunkenness but to arrests for moonshining and bootlegging.

Mr. BRUCE. Oh, no; this writer is simply rebutting the idea that New York is a particularly drunken place, to use his language; that is all.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, does the Senator know how the inebriety of New York compares with that of Pittsburgh and Philadelphia?

Mr. BRUCE. I could ascertain that without any difficulty. I am sure that it compares more than favorably, because New York is a very temperate community, relatively. Another thing Senators will be surprised to hear is that in the matter of the ratio of divorce to marriage the State of New York has a better record than most other parts of the United States.

Mr. SMITH. By whom were those figures compiled?

Mr. BRUCE. By the Department of Commerce.

Mr. BLEASE. We do not have any divorces in South Carolina.

Mr. BRUCE. No; I know you do not, and that was true down to the time of the reconstruction period. Then the alien carpetbagger came in and changed your law, and as soon as you kicked him out you reenacted your law, did you not?

Mr. BLEASE. That is right.

Mr. BRUCE. I wish every other State in the Union had a similar law, to forbid divorce except for one matrimonial offense.

Mr. BLEASE. I agree with the Senator; we would have more virtue in this country.

Mr. BRUCE. A Chicago sociologist predicted only a few days ago that during the coming year there will be one divorce in the United States for every five marriages. It seems to me it is to that field of human infirmity and shortcoming that the efforts of bishops like Bishop Cannon and Bishop Clarence True Wilson might well be directed rather than to the field of prohibition.

I grew up in a community where there was no such thing as divorce. I am speaking of the same southern Virginia community to which I referred a few minutes ago. With the exception of an occasional husband who made his wife and children unhappy by drinking to excess, there was no such thing in that community as marital estrangement. The old saying in southern Virginia was, "Once a wife always a wife," and I wish to God that day could return to rebuke the present generation.

It does seem to me that instead of clerical zeal in this country being so frequently headed, to use the striking words of the poet Keats, "for some false impossible shore" like prohibition, it would be much better if it were applied to the reclamation of the home from the degrading and disintegrating influences that are slowly, to all appearances, making the marital relation in this country a mere mockery. We rarely hear of one of the Anti-Saloon League ministers condemning divorce, notwithstanding that even in a southern community like that of the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], divorce has reached a ratio to marriage little less than appalling.

Divorce is too delicate a subject for them to take up with their parishoners. Speaking about that subject in their churches would be too much like talking about halters in the house of the thief, to recall the old Spanish proverb.

I am sorry that the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] was not here—he doubtless was called out of the Chamber by circumstances which he could not control—when I was bringing forward figures to show that bootlegging and arrests for drunkenness are coextensive with the entire territory of the United States.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland yield

Mr. BRUCE. Certainly.

Mr. WHEELER. I know that when one makes any statement with reference to the enforcement of prohibition he is generally accused by some prohibitionist of being a wet, but this statement was given to me by one of the men who is an ardent prohibitionist in the city of Butte. He said that at the present time in the city of Butte there are more saloons or more places where liquor is sold than there were before the days of prohibition.

Mr. BRUCE. I saw a statement to that effect only a few days ago, and it was apparently an absolutely authoritative statement.

Mr. WHEELER. Apparently there is no attempt there upon the part of the authorities to enforce the law at all, because there is no excuse, where they are selling liquor openly in violation of law, for the enforcement officers not doing their duty.

Mr. BRUCE. No excuse whatever, and that brings me to my idea of why it is that the prohibition law is not enforced. Other Members of this body have tried their hands at finding an explanation. Perhaps I may be a little more fortunate in finding one that fits the case. I discovered it in the statement of General Andrews, the former head of the Prohibition Unit, that the greatest obstacle to the enforcement of the prohibition law is official bribery. To use a simile that I have previously employed, prohibition enforcement is a kind of mop that from official corruption becomes so dirty in the process of mopping that finally it is wholly unfit for its office.

The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] said, "Oh, there are special reasons why we must appropriate large sums of money for the enforcement of prohibition as distinguished from other things that are enforced by our Federal agencies." Now what are those things? We do not hear of any large additional appropriations by the Federal Government for the punishment of murder, for the punishment of counterfeiters, or even for the punishment of violations of the antinarcotic laws, unless since prohibition first began to stimulate the use of narcotics.

(At this point Mr. WARREN approached Mr. BRUCE and spoke to him sotto voce.)

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator from Wyoming says to me that I promised him last night that I would not speak for more than half an hour, but I answer that I am like Benedict in Shakespeare's play who declared that when he said that he would die a bachelor he did not know that he would live to be married. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRUCE. Certainly.

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not want to prolong the Senator's speech, because I know the Senator does not want to contribute to a night session any more than I do. But I want to say to him that while we do not enforce the law in some of the localities where there are a number of speakeasies or blind tigers, some States of the Union that want prohibition ought not to be deprived of it, because there are localities that do not want it and where the law is not enforced.

Mr. BRUCE. I agree with the Senator entirely, and that is why I proposed an amendment to the Federal Constitution providing that any State in the Union which desired prohibition should have it and that any State that did not want it should not be bound to have it. If the Senator will only follow in my wake, which he will never do, I could lead him up to that happy consummation.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator, perhaps, remembers the story of the epitaph on the old tombstone. It read:

As you are now, so once was I.
As I am now, so you will be.
Prepare for death and follow me.

And the bystander wrote just below it:

To follow you I'm not content,
Unless I know which way you went.

[Laughter.]

Mr. BRUCE. Could there be any possible doubt, after the six years during which I have been here, as to the direction in which I am headed? [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I am going to be considerate of the feelings of my good friend the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] and conclude just a little earlier than I might naturally do under the circumstances. I want to say that the real reason why the prohibition law can not be enforced, except by the expenditure of hundreds of millions of dollars and by the creation of a vast number of courts and other judicial agencies, is because the prohibition law undertakes to make something criminal that is not criminal per se.

Mr. WHEELER. Does not the Senator think that we ought to appropriate this money so that we can have a fair test to see whether or not it really can be enforced?

Mr. BRUCE. I have no objection to that at all.

Mr. WHEELER. I heartily agree with the Senator's views when he says that the law is not being enforced in the country. I do not think it is being enforced in any part of the country any more than it is in some other part. But every time I tell some one that the law is not being enforced I am immediately told that it is because Congress does not appropriate the money or because of the fact that we do not give the enforcement officials sufficient money.

Mr. BRUCE. It is partly because Congress does not appropriate more money. Congress necessarily hesitates to appropriate $300,000,000 or $400,000,000 for prohibition enforcement and to cover the States of the country with courts. I have always said that if we were to appropriate all the money and to create all the courts, jails, and penitentiaries that prohibition calls for, it might, despite the amount of bribery that prohibition enforcement generates, be enforced.

But my point is that prohibition is not enforceable except by truly extraordinary agencies of enforcement, because, first of all, it commands no real respect at the hands of thousands and millions of the inhabitants of the United States, and, secondly, because the process of prohibition enforcement develops under the temptations of prohibition lucre so much official faithlessness.

Just think of it! Here we were told yesterday that no less than 180 customs officials had just been dismissed from the Federal service at the city of Detroit for conspiring with rum runners to violate the Volstead law. The truth is prohibition addresses powerful solicitations to the weak side of human nature. Millions of dollars are embarked in the illicit liquor traffic They are forever inciting the bootlegger to use a part of this fund for bribing prohibition agents, and forever subjecting prohibition agents to temptation, which is all the more urgent because they know that many of the most reputable citizens of the United States do not hesitate to patronize the bootlegger.

The prohibition law is not respected because it is not a respectable law, because it is an unnatural law, because it is an irrational law, because it should elicit no favorable response from any thinking mind or from any normal, healthy conscience. That is the true philosophy of the subject. Those are the reasons why prohibition can not be enforced except at the price of an expenditure of money that would be oppressive to the taxpayer in the highest degree and the creation of repressive Federal instrumentalities of such magnitude and searching operations as almost to forbode the death of civil liberty itself.

Just recall to what a pass this country has been brought in its futile, fruitless efforts so far to enforce prohibition! I saw in the press yesterday that the fourth poor wretch in the State of Michigan is now doomed to imprisonment for life for violations of the Volstead law; and that no fewer than 187 of the individuals who handed in essays in the Durant competition for the best essay relating to prohibition actually advocated capital punishment as a proper measure of punishment for such violations. Some of those essayists even went back to the dark ages and advocated torture, whippings, and other cruel and unusual penalties for them.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I should like to call the Senator's attention to the fact that during the Dougherty investigation Mrs. Remus, the wife of the notorious bootlegger who finally bought up 17 distilleries, came before the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] and myself, and with a handful of checks, stated that she had paid out, on behalf of her husband, $1,000,000 in bribes to officials in the State of Ohio, in the State of New York, and in the city of Washington, and that she was willing to testify to whom and how it was paid, providing that she would be given immunity. Of course, we were not able to give her immunity.

Mr. BRUCE. Think of that! That, however, is hardly worse than the condition of things that has been only recently disclosed in the city of Philadelphia, that city the moral welfare of which the good Gifford Pinchot is supposed to have had under his watchful supervision when he was governor of Pennsylvania, and where Gen. Smedley D. Butler was sent for the purpose of conducting his crusade, merciless in its beginnings and comical in its conclusion.

Let me call, for illustration, attention to a Philadelphia dispatch which appeared in the Baltimore Sun during the latter part of last year, under date of November 7:

Three police inspectors, 10 police captains, and 2 district detectives were discharged by the civil service commission to-day.

Two of the captains and the two district "specials" were served with subpœnas in the county prison, where they are serving sentences for extortion, conspiracy, and bribery in connection with the rum traffic.

Then this dispatch goes on to say:

The 13 men "beheaded" are among 22 whom the grand jury declared "unfit to hold any public office because of their unexplained bank accounts."

Then the dispatch continues:

The special grand jury questioned witnesses about large deposits in various banking institutions, specially the $9,000,000 supposed bootleg money in the Union Bank & Trust Co.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, did the Senator from Maryland say $9,000,000?

Mr. BRUCE. I said $9,000,000. Last year the Detroit Free Press computes $50,000,000 worth of liquor was smuggled into this country largely through the connivance of Federal officers within a radius of 25 miles of Detroit.

Mr. WHEELER. The leading citizen in many communities is getting to be a bootlegger now, is he not?

Mr. BRUCE. Of course, for bootlegging is said to be a highly profitable occupation that promises, to use Doctor Johnson's expression, "potentialities of wealth beyond the dreams of avarice."

I turn to another later dispatch, dated November 8, from Philadelphia, which reads:

PHILADELPHIA, November 8 (special).—A police captain and a detective to-day joined the exodus of police bureau members described by the "racket" grand jury as "unfit to hold any public office," the civil service commission dropping them from the roster.

This brings the number of the latest "beheadings" of police officials to 17, 10 captains—

Ponder that—10 captains!—

three inspectors and two district detectives having been discharged by the commission yesterday.

Members of the district attorney's staff are preparing indictments against 21 policemen formerly attached to a South Philadelphia station who are accused of graft and extortion. The bills will be submitted to-morrow.

SIX SERGEANTS IN LIST

In the list are 6 sergeants, 3 detectives, and 12 patrolmen.

In other words, wherever we find a State enforcement law, wherever we find a liaison between State enforcement officers and prohibition agents, there we find the same kind of official faithlessness, depravity, and corruption that has recently been revealed in the city of Philadelphia. It is because of our knowledge of the moral ruin worked by the combination of State enforcement agencies with the Federal prohibition force that we in Maryland have been unwilling, and I trust shall always be unwilling, that our brave and honorable Baltimore policemen who have never been charged with one single, solitary violation of the Volstead Act since that law went into effect, so far as I can recall—should sustain any cooperative relationship whatever to the Federal Prohibition Unit.

Mr. TYSON obtained the floor.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. TYSON. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, last evening I tried to get a unanimous-consent agreement, but was unsuccessful. I should like now to submit a request for unanimous consent. I ask unanimous consent that after 3 o'clock to-day debate on the pending amendment and all amendments thereto and substitutes therefor be limited to five minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. WHEELER. I object.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I could not hear the request of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. The request has been objected to, so I withdraw it.

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, I have listened with great interest to what the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE] has said. If the conditions in this country are as bad as he says they are, something ought to be done and done quickly.

I wish now to address the Senate as briefly as possible on the amendment of the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] to the first deficiency bill, to appropriate an additional $25,000,000 for the enforcement of prohibition.

Mr. President, I believe that prohibition is the most important issue before this country to-day. There were many important issues in the last presidential campaign, but I believe prohibition was the paramount issue.

The last campaign put the prohibition question more fully before the country than it has ever been put before, and while the election was not a direct referendum on the prohibition question, it was sufficiently so to let everyone realize, if he had never realized it before, that this country is dry, that it believes in the eighteenth amendment, and that it is determined to have that amendment enforced.

Mr. President, I do not think we should delay action in this matter. Everyone appreciates that the prohibition law is not being satisfactorily enforced; that enforcement ought to be improved; that it is discreditable to Congress to permit the present conditions to go on.

It is proposed by some Members of the Senate to wait on Mr. Hoover; but if there is something we can do now, why not do it!

No one seems to know whether Mr. Hoover will call an extra session of Congress, and if so, no one knows when he will call it, nor whether he will take up the prohibition question. It has been intimated in the press that if a special session shall be called, the House will limit the questions that may be considered there, and I have not discovered that the prohibition question is one of those that will be permitted to be considered. Even if it should be considered, it may take six months before any action can be had upon prohibition measures so as to bring about a more thorough enforcement of the law.

If we wait on Mr. Hoover, it will probably be well into next year before anything is done.

No law can be properly enforced without providing the necessary organization and the necessary machinery for carrying on. Congress is charged with the greatest duty of all—to see that this necessary machinery and organization are provided. We have a condition here, Mr. President, and we must meet it.

As I see it, there never has been any topic about which there is so much exaggeration and misinformation and false statements, false propaganda, and malicious efforts to deceive as about prohibition.

I can not go as far as my distinguished friend the senior Senator from Georgia, the author of the amendment, and say prohibition enforcement is a farce; for, notwithstanding all complaints, I believe the law is fairly well enforced.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HASTINGS in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. TYSON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Georgia said that prohibition was a farce because Congress did not appropriate money enough to enforce the law.

Mr. TYSON. I accept the statement of the Senator from Georgia. I believe, however, that it has become more and more difficult to enforce this law because of the experience that bootleggers have had, the new and organized ways they have learned of evading the law and of reaching some prohibition-enforcement officers, the better means of transportation which they enjoy by reason of good roads and automobiles, together with the organized efforts on the part of those living in foreign countries to aid our citizens to evade and violate the law.

The Secretary of the Treasury has been criticized for the last eight years for failure to enforce the law. I will say that I do not believe Mr. Mellon has ever been sympathetic with the law, but I believe the Department of Justice should come in for its just share of this criticism.

I can not believe there has been any enthusiasm or zeal in the Treasury Department during the last eight years in the enforcement of the prohibition laws; but violators of the law must be tried and punished if the law is to have force and effect, and the courts of the country have permitted the dockets to become clogged with cases, and the sentences imposed have been largely a farce; and, in my judgment, the Department of Justice is as much to blame as is the Treasury Department.

There are 21,000 prohibition cases on the dockets now, and there have been about the same number on the dockets at the end of every fiscal year for the last eight years; and yet the Department of Justice has made no recommendations of importance to the Congress to relieve this condition, nor has the Treasury Department made recommendations to relieve the conditions along these lines.

The enforcement of the prohibition law is one of the most difficult if not the most difficult thing this country has ever undertaken. The people of the United States for 300 years have been in the habit of drinking alcoholic liquors whenever they desired. With many it was almost as much a part of their lives as their daily meals. Most people enjoy alcoholic stimulants; and the habit is so set upon millions of the present generation that they rebel against what they believe to be an intolerable tyranny and deprivation of their personal liberty.

The press of the country does not appear to be sympathetic to enforcement and is not helpful.

Under such circumstances efficient and complete enforcement is impossible. It is largely a matter of education, and it will take years to change the habits of the people, and a long campaign of education is necessary. But, Mr. President, we must be patient, and not be discouraged, and continue the work.

I sympathize deeply with anyone charged with the enforcement of these laws; but this is the law, and I believe a good law, and therefore we must go forward with it, and in time I am confident we will have efficient and satisfactory enforcement.

I have a very high opinion of Mr. Mellon as a Secretary of the Treasury and feel that he has been a great success in every department except the Prohibition Department. I think he can improve that department greatly; and I think he not only owes it to the country but he owes it to his own reputation as an executor and administrator promptly to improve the enforcement of the prohibition laws.

We are proposing here to give him a large sum of money and put it in his hands and give him carte blanche and ask him to get results. Who could wish for more?

The Secretary has not said he could not use this money.

The Secretary, in his letter to Senator WARREN, states:

> For instance, one of the major difficulties encountered in making the prohibition laws truly effective is the congestion in the United States courts occasioned in large part by numerous pending prohibition cases. It would seem desirable, therefore, if the Congress deems it advisable to appropriate an additional sum of $25,000,000 for this general purpose, that some consideration should be given to whether a part of this sum at least should not be allocated to the Department of Justice. As to the needs of the Department of Justice I am, of course, not in a position to express an opinion.

Mr. President, that is the reason why I suggested to the Senator from Georgia, who offered the amendment for an appropriation of $25,000,000, that he change his amendment so that the wishes of the Secretary in that respect could be complied with, and that he would have discretion in the expenditure of this great sum of money.

It will thus be seen that the Secretary of the Treasury is of the opinion that there are not enough courts, there are not enough assistant United States district attorneys, in all probability, and that there ought to be additional courts and additional United States district attorneys or assistant United States district attorneys.

Knowing of the great dissatisfaction throughout the country with the way in which the prohibition laws were being enforced, and believing it was largely due to the fact that the Prohibition Unit was in the Treasury Department, and that the law would be better enforced in the Department of Justice, I had a bill prepared at the beginning of this session to transfer the Prohibition Unit to the Department of Justice; but after the bill was prepared I made an investigation of the effect of it.

I saw Mr. Doran, the Commissioner of Prohibition, and many other men in his department, and also the heads of the Anti-Saloon League; and they convinced me that it would be a mistake to transfer the Prohibition Unit from the Treasury Department, owing to the fact that the Coast Guard, the customs, the issuance of permits for alcohol, and the collection of revenue for liquor manufactured, were all under the Treasury Department, and if a change were made there would be less coordination and cooperation than there is now; and so I dropped the matter.

The Prohibition Unit has been newly organized under the new law. It has its own head, who appoints his principal subordinates. The employees are under civil service; and if the head of the Treasury Department will let us supply him with sufficient funds, and if he will then work out a program for the proper and efficient expenditure of these funds, I think we will have made a long step toward the enforcement of the law.

I believe all will admit that the present law, under which the Prohibition Unit is now operating, is the best we have had; and the two men at the head of the department, Assistant Treasurer Lowman and Commissioner Doran, I believe are sympathetic with the law and want to see it enforced.

I have made a study of the report of the Prohibition Commissioner, and I am convinced that there are not enough district judges in certain districts and not enough assistant district attorneys.

I send to the desk and ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a chart showing all of the prohibition cases that have been prosecuted by the United States district courts for the year ending June 30, 1928. This chart gives the sentences, fines, and complete information, and is illuminating. I ask unanimous consent to have it printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Mr. TYSON. This chart shows that there were 77,799 cases brought before the district courts of the United States, and of that number 58,813 were convictions.

The average fine was $120, and the average jail sentence imposed was 34.4 days. The per cent of convictions receiving jail sentences was 28.5. There were 54,325 who pleaded guilty, and a total of 7,072 trials by jury, of which 4,350 were found guilty and 2,722 were acquitted. None received jail sentences except those tried by jury.

It will be observed that the number of cases tried by jury is less than 10 per cent.

I have been informed that in some of the districts the docket is so crowded that the lawbreakers largely control the fines that can be given them by refusing to plead guilty if the fine is to be large.

An examination of the chart will show that in the southern district of New York, for instance, where there were some 9,084 cases disposed of last year, there were only 52 trials by jury, and if all the cases are considered which were tried and convictions had that the average jail sentence was only six-tenths of a day and the average fine was $26. How can you expect enforcement with those pitiful fines? That is the farce; it is the sentences and the fines that the courts give for violating the law.

It is said that the reason for these low fines and small jail sentences was because of the fact that a compromise had to be made with the criminal in order to get the accused to plead guilty, and thereby avoid jury trials. If jury trials had been demanded, thousands of cases would continue to accumulate upon the docket, the witnesses would disappear, and the accused would give bond and never be brought to trial.

Mr. President, it is a deplorable condition when a criminal can go into a court and almost dictate his own sentence owing to the crowded condition of the docket.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. TYSON. I do.

Mr. REED of Missouri. How does the Senator reconcile the statement he has just made with reference to congestion of the courts with the assertions that have been repeatedly made on the floor, to-day and yesterday, that the courts have plenty of time to try these cases and that they are not really working?

Mr. TYSON. That may be the case, Mr. President; and I doubt very seriously if all the courts do work. I think that if there is any one thing in this country that ought to be investigated it is the workings of our courts.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I do not care to cavil. I just wanted to call attention to the situation. I understand the Senator now to say that these fines have been accepted and these pleas of guilty have been accepted because if they had jury trials the courts could not dispose of the cases. That, of course, conflicts with the statements that have been made by other Senators; and I just wondered how we, who are sitting here trying to get information, are going to reconcile these conflicting statements.

Mr. TYSON. I did not understand that there were any conflicting statements.

Mr. REED of Missouri. I have tried to make it plain that a number of Senators have insisted that the courts are not busy; that they are not congested; that there are plenty of courts to try the cases. The Senator has just told us that one reason why jury trials have not been had is that if we had jury trials the courts could not dispose of the business. I am not saying that the Senator has made conflicting statements, but I say that his statement conflicts with the statements of others.

Mr. TYSON. That may be true, Mr. President; I do not know exactly what other people have said, but I want to say that I take it that the Secretary of the Treasury ought to know more about this matter than anybody else, and what does the Secretary of the Treasury say about it?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I think the Senator is correct.

Mr. TYSON. I want to read this into the RECORD. It is in the letter which he wrote, I think, to Bishop Cannon, or some gentleman who had written to him, and it is published in this morning's Washington Post. The Secretary said:

As I pointed out in my letter of January 12 to Senator WARREN, prohibition enforcement does not rest solely upon the Bureau of Prohibition, but its success—success depends largely on the cooperation afforded by the Coast Guard, the Customs Service, and the border patrol, and, what is even of more vital importance, on the possibility of bringing to trial cases prepared by the Prohibition Bureau and ready for trial.

POINTS OUT OTHER NEEDS

What I endeavored to point out in my letter to Senator WARREN is that the Harris amendment makes the additional funds available to the Prohibition Bureau only, and restricts the uses by the bureau, with no discretion in the Secretary of the Treasury.

There are now 21,000 liquor cases pending in the Federal courts and causing congestion, with no relief in sight.

The Customs Service needs additional guards in the principal ports and the border patrol needs strengthening, while in so far as the Coast Guard is concerned, Admiral Billard is at present undertaking a survey as to the ships needed to replace a number of destroyers whose usefulness has been pretty nearly exhausted, and is prepared to recommend an increase in the commissioned personnel of the Coast Guard.

Furthermore he said:

I note that in your telegram you suggest that the restrictions be removed and that $25,000,000 be made available to the Secretary of the Treasury to spend as he sees fit.

Mr. President, I tried to remedy that by making a suggestion to the senior Senator from Georgia, and I think his new amendment will correct that defect.

This, of course, is not the Harris amendment now pending in Congress, and aside from the fact that it would make no provision whatsoever for relieving the congestion in the courts, which to-day constitutes one of the major problems in the field of prohibition enforcement, I want to suggest whether you consider it good practice to place so vast a sum in the hands of a public official with unlimited discretion as to its use?

What I wish to call to the attention of the Senate is the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury, perhaps for the first time, has brought in a report, and says that the major problem in the enforcement of the prohibition laws is the relief of congestion of the courts. That is the major problem. We are speaking about a lot of things, about arrests, and so on, but the problem is, after you get men arrested, to get them tried. What good would it be to have 10,000 policemen in Washington arrest 10,000 men, and have no means for having them tried and punished? I say that that is the meat and the crux of this law-enforcement question, and until we succeed in having a court that can try every offender within a reasonable time, we may expect not to have any proper enforcement of this law.

It is said that in the courts of the southern district of New York, where there are six judges, there were 9,000 prohibition cases last year, but it must be remembered that that was in addition to all the other cases. New York is a great city; there is a tremendous amount of civil business conducted there, and yet they had 9,000 prohibition cases. The courts could not possibly try those cases. They had to accept practically what those men were willing to pay, and that is the reason why those miserable little fines were imposed, and why practically no jail sentences were given. Until we punish men, they will not think they have committed any crime to amount to anything. That is the thing to which the Senate ought to give its attention. We ought to pass a bill at this session dealing with that subject. If we do pass this bill and permit this $25,000,000 to be appropriated, the Secretary of the Treasury can not create courts. He can only employ assistants, and if the courts are clogged so that the cases can not be tried, men can give bond and go out and continue to do the very things next day which they did yesterday.

It is a deplorable condition, Mr. President, when a criminal can go into a court in this country and almost dictate his own sentence owing to the crowded condition of the docket. I speak advisedly. I have discussed this matter with the Prohibition Unit, with men who have had actual experience in this matter, and they tell me these are the facts. If the Congress of the United States does not relieve this situation, then they should be held responsible for nonenforcement as well as the Secretary of the Treasury.

The Prohibition Unit informs me that this condition can never be overcome until we have more judges and more assistant United States district attorneys, whose special duty it will be to keep the docket cleared of prohibition cases.

Especially is this true when district judges are situated in populous cities where there is a great number of civil cases to be disposed of, as well as other criminal cases.

The Secretary further says in his letter:

The problem of smuggling is an important one. Its prevention is largely dependent, in so far as our sea coast is concerned, on the adequacy of the fleet maintained by the Coast Guard and in part on an adequate customs force at our various ports; and in so far as our land borders are concerned, on an effective patrol of the borders. On account of our failure thus far to secure a satisfactory agreement with Canada, which, in my opinion, would materially reduce the liquor traffic coming over the Canadian border, the necessity of a thoroughgoing survey as to the best means of increasing the effectiveness of our border patrol is apparent.

Mr. President, it is the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, knowing these conditions, to set out to meet them. He is the man who is responsible. Responsibility can not be put on Doran or Lowman; it is the responsibility of the Secretary of the Treasury. When he sends men to the courts of this country to be tried, it is up to the Department of Justice to see that they are tried. We have a dual responsibility here. The Treasury Department insists that they are sending so many cases now to the Department of Justice that they can not get them tried. Therefore it is the Department of Justice that is largely at fault, as much so, in my judgment, as the Treasury Department.

The Secretary of the Treasury realizes that the prevention of smuggling could be largely aided by an increased force of the fleet maintained by the Coast Guard and an adequate customs force at our various ports, and, so far as our land borders are concerned, by an effective patrol of the border.

Mr. President, it stands to reason from these statements of the Secretary that he realizes that our Coast Guard is not sufficient and needs strengthening; that we have not an adequate customs force at our various ports; and that we have not an effective patrol of our borders.

We never can have prohibition until we stop the sources of supply, and this is the main source of supply in this country to-day.

With the money which we are proposing to give him he could strengthen the Coast Guard wherever he felt it necessary, increase the customs force at the various ports, and also increase the patrol at our border.

Until this is done, Mr. President, everybody must admit that we can not hope to keep liquor, and vast quantities of it, from coming in from Canada, Mexico, and elsewhere.

The Secretary further says:

Looking to the future, it will no doubt be advantageous to provide additional funds for increased border patrol of the Customs Service and an increased customs force at some of the principal ports of entry and increased equipment for the Coast Guard.

I ask, Mr. President, how are these things to be brought about unless there is an additional appropriation? As I understand the Budget as now made out, there is provision for the use of every single dollar that has been appropriated, so that if we are going to have any increase in enforcement, any increased efficiency in the Coast Guard, the border patrol, or the Customs Service we must have more money in order to carry those agencies forward.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that this is a positive statement by the Secretary of the Treasury that more money is needed.

He does not say how much, but when we appropriate $25,000,000 and put it in his hands to be used at his discretion, it seems to me that we have done all that he could possibly ask, and it shows our confidence in him.

I believe, furthermore, that the field men should have an increase in salary. As I understand it, these men now get $1,500 and $1,800 per year. This is entirely too little for men employed in such important and hazardous duties. I do not see how the department has succeeded in getting any suitable men at these salaries. They ought to be raised to $2,500 and $3,000.

Any man employed as an inspector or as a field agent has to be away from home a great deal and is put to unusual expense, and it is no wonder if some yield to temptation. It seems to me that the Government, by giving such small salaries, invites yielding to temptation, and is almost particeps criminis with the prohibition agent who falls by the wayside.

Mr. President, there are some twenty-five hundred prohibition agents throughout this country now. That is an average of about 50 for each State. What could 50 policemen or 50 deputy sheriffs do toward keeping down crime in any State of the Union, and especially in those States that have no State laws for prohibition enforcement?

I am in favor of appropriating this money and turning it over to the Secretary of the Treasury for better enforcement. I am confident if he has this great amount of money at his disposal, he, and those under him, will find a useful way to employ a part, if not all, of it.

It will be a spur to every official in the department to feel that the Congress of the United States is behind him. Double the amount of field men can be used and the great amount of liquor coming in from Canada and other foreign countries can be greatly decreased.

I have always believed that the Prohibition Unit was right in making its main effort against the source of supply, and this will require a great many more men than they now have, especially on the Canadian border.

I believe there will be no lack of applicants for civil service appointments if the department will go after this matter vigorously and let the public know that it needs men and will accept the applicants without undue partisanship.

I am willing to trust the Secretary of the Treasury with this money, and will trust him to use it economically, and if all is not used, it can be turned back into the Treasury. Pass this appropriation, and law enforcement will have made a long step forward.

I believe the paramount thing to do now in the enforcement of prohibition is to provide for additional associate judges and assistant district attorneys charged with the duty of looking especially after prohibition cases. If this is not done, it will be useless to continue to arrest great numbers of violators of the law who can never be brought to trial and thus tend to make a farce of the law.

It seems to me that the Congress, if it desires to see the law enforced, will readily see that without an increase in machinery to try these cases, enforcement will be no better no matter how much money we appropriate nor how many investigations we make.

The Secretary of the Treasury is being criticized because it is claimed he does not enforce the law. He says in effect it is necessary to clear the court dockets to make prohibition enforcement effective. The thing for Congress to do is to accept the opinion of the Secretary and remedy the situation by appointing additional forces for the trial of cases.

Mr President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a summary of the prohibition cases on hand October 31, 1928, by judicial districts; also a memorandum which I have had prepared relating to the condition of the dockets in the various judicial districts of the United States, showing that in some districts the judges seem to be very diligent and have tried hundreds of cases by jury, while in other districts they have tried but few. I simply want to submit these statistics for the consideration of the Senate and for the information of the public in order that, if possible, we might get better enforcement and a more diligent effort, if possible, on the part of the district judges of the United States to dispose of prohibition cases.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, do the Senator's figures apply to the whole country?

Mr. TYSON. Yes. There may be a few districts I have not been able to get, but the figures cover largely the entire country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Tennessee is granted.

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to announce that my colleague the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] is detained from the Senate on account of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-six Senators having answered to their names a quorum is present.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] debate on the pending amendment and all amendments thereto and substitutes therefor be limited to 10 minutes for each Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I was content to say nothing on the original amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations carrying an appropriation or $25,000,000 for law enforcement, but the action of the distinguished Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] and certain circumstances which have arisen since have provoked me into participating in the discussion.

It is a peculiar change of front upon the part of the leader from Washington to desire now to reduce the appropriation after he and others voted for it in the committee reporting it to the Senate. And it is a peculiar amendment that he now offers. Coming so soon after his conference with the late apostle of good will to South America, I am wondering whether it expresses the views of the next President of the United States. There is so much confusion existing about so many things at this particular time, including the question of who are to be members of the Cabinet presiding over the various departments of the Government, whether there is to be an extra session of Congress, what the new President's views are relative to this and that question, that I am almost at a complete loss as to just what the situation really is.

The Senator from Washington—and I am sorry he is not now in his seat—has always stood for large appropriations for enforcement of the prohibition law and has always allied himself with the prohibition forces of the country. I was delighted to hear him in his address the other day say that in the late campaign there was no prohibition issue. Of course, there were men and women in both of the great political parties who differed from their standard bearer touching this great question. I have differed with some of my best friends on it. I have differed with the leaders of my own political party respecting it. I recall that as a Member of the House on one occasion I voted to override the veto of a great Democratic President, one whom I delighted to follow, when he vetoed the Volstead Act. So we may have different views from those held by the leaders of our parties on this great political question, because long since the American people concluded that as long as we keep the prohibition question in politics we will get nowhere respecting it. We have seen the same thing happen relative to our entrance into the League of Nations.

The Senator from Washington, in his proposed amendment reducing by some $24,000,000 the appropriation for the enforcement of the prohibition law, proposes to use this small sum in many different ways. For instance, he proposes to use a part of the $250,000 "for dissemination of information." What that means we are not yet told. He wants to use a part of it for "an appeal for law observance and law enforcement." Whether the particular apostles who went over the country in the late campaign misrepresented views, and so forth, are to be put under civil service we know not. It may be that the distinguished Senator from Washington wants to take care of some of those men so that they may go to some of the meetings and speak for law enforcement—and for expenses in connection with travel of officers and employees in attending meetings of sheriffs and chiefs of police, and other meetings.

It is quite true, as the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] has said, if that appropriation be provided under the language written by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] the money could be used in sending officers to various meetings to post on billboards placards appealing to people to stand by prohibition and not be used, as it should be used, in providing for a larger number of men to go out and police the country, bring offenders to the bar of justice, and see that they are convicted of crime.

We are answered with a statement that the courts are clogged, that we need more courts.

Mr. President, since 1922 we have created 39 new Federal district judgeships in the United States. It was only a little while ago that we passed an omnibus judgeship bill here because it was said the necessity existed of enforcing this and other laws in the country.

However, be that as it may, both political parties in the last campaign stood for enforcement of prohibition as well as of other laws of the country. One party was just as strong in its expression, just as strong in its advocacy of enforcement as was the other political party. The leaders differed as to whether or not the law ought to be changed, and so forth. I did not agree with some of the leaders of my party, but I respect the views of other people on this question, because the American people have never been united on it, and I do not know that they ever will be united on it. However, the law is here, it should be enforced, and should not be stifled by either prohibitionists or by those who are lukewarm respecting its enforcement.

The Secretary of the Treasury says we ought to increase the facilities of the Coast Guard, and so on. I submit, Mr. President, that in the last bill covering that matter which we passed here and which, I think, is now a law, we increased the appropriation for the Coast Guard by $767,000; we gave to the Secretary of the Treasury every cent that he requested for the Coast Guard. The Appropriations Committee were liberal. The bill is now the law, and the appropriations carried by it for the Coast Guard have been increased to that amount. For the Customs Service we have appropriated every cent that the Treasury Department requested; indeed, we increased the appropriation this year over last year for that particular service by $1,816,000.

Every defect that might have been pointed out respecting the $25,000,000 appropriation proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] has been remedied by his amendment as he has now modified it.

Mr. President, I said I did not know but that the Senator from Washington in moving to reduce this appropriation to $1,250,000 was expressing the views of the next President of the United States. Certainly there are Senators here who know his views; somebody has certainly been able to find out his views. When he spoke in the campaign he lauded the present administration to the skies.

It is said that on one occasion when he spoke by the time he was half way through his speech three-quarters of the audience had left. But his speeches were carried in all the newspapers of the country. He had a great interlocking radio-broadcasting system; and he spoke loudly and eloquently, as I have said, and with the utmost sincerity as to his faith in the administration, pledging his talents and his ability to carry on the policies of the Coolidge administration.

In those campaign speeches, Mr. President, there was not a single head of any department of this Government but was praised by the distinguished President elect. He spoke of the great granitelike ability of the distinguished Attorney General; he spoke of the fine work done by the Secretary of State, and also by the Secretary of the Navy, by the Postmaster General, and all of the other members of the Cabinet; but yet to-day after his return from South America, where he went on his censored good-will trip, everyone—if the newspapers can be believed—is in as much confusion as to what is going to happen as he was on the day of the election.

Mr. President, I ask why should there now be such confusion in other directions just as there is relative to his prohibition stand? The Republican candidate for the Presidency praised the fine constructive ability of the Secretary of State, lauded his work in putting through the peace pact, in the settlement of the Nicaraguan difficulty, and in the diplomacy displayed in our relations with Mexico, and yet among all the candidates who are mentioned for appointment to the high post of Secretary of State not a word is said about the incumbent—Frank B. Kellogg? We hear of Mr. Fletcher, who journeyed with the President elect through the peaceful waters of the Pacific, who made the long trip around the South American coast with him, spoken of as the next Secretary of State; we hear Mr. Dwight Morrow, who performed so well in Mexico, spoken of as the next Secretary of State; but no newspaper correspondent, no one who is close to the President elect, has ever suggested the name for appointment as Secretary of State of Frank B. Kellogg. Yet it was because of his conduct of foreign affairs during the last few years that the President elect in his campaign speeches lauded the Coolidge administration and said that he would carry on.

Take the Attorney General, the great friend of the President of the United States.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HARRISON. Not just now, if the Senator will permit me to proceed.

The Attorney General came from the mountains of Vermont, and in many ways is somewhat like the President of the United States. If there was one appointment made by President Coolidge that was personal in its nature, it was the appointment of Mr. Sargent as Attorney General. His work was applauded by the President elect, who in his campaign speeches told how, since the Department of Justice had gotten rid of Daugherty, it had administered the law; it had enforced the law in all the courts of the land. Yet at this time, when the newspapers are publishing pages and columns about the next Cabinet, we find no mention of him.

They are mentioning Mr. Donovan, for instance, which brings to my mind certain facts and incidents which are not forgotten. Many of the prohibitionists of the country, perhaps, would like Mr. Donovan to be Attorney General of the United States, and there are many other elements in the country, perhaps, who would like to see him Attorney General. No doubt the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] would like to see Mr. Donovan appointed Attorney General of the United States. It will be remembered that, following an investigation by the Department of Justice, a jury acquitted and exonerated a distinguished Member of this body of certain charges that were brought against him after the sleuths of the department had gone out and conjured up tales to his detriment, although a committee of honorable Senators, headed by the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], had investigated the charges, gone to the bottom of the case, had unanimously agreed that there was nothing in the charges, and gave to the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] a clean bill. It was Mr. Donovan, of whom we hear so much to-day, of whom we read in the public press, that he may be named as the next Attorney General of the United States, who had something to do with that incident.

Then we read the next day that there is a timorous disposition about appointing him Attorney General; that he might fit in better as Secretary of War; and so the newspapers tell us that there is about to be kicked out the present Secretary of War who has reflected so much credit upon the present administration, who has molded the Army together and kept it upon a harmonious basis. In the campaign speeches by the President elect he was lauded as a great Secretary of War, and the work that he did in the Mississippi flood-control matter was cited; yet, as was done in the case of Mr. Culbertson, formerly a member of the Tariff Commission, he is to be transported overseas and given a diplomatic position.

We are told in the press that the present Secretary of War, one of the cogs in the great Coolidge machine, who was praised to high heaven and whose policies the President elect was going to carry on, is to be transported to some diplomatic place and Mr. Donovan is to be made Secretary of War. So we are left in a confused state as to whether Mr. Donovan wants to take the position of Secretary of War or to be the Attorney General of the United States; but in all that we read and all that we hear no word has ever come from any friend of the President elect or from the President elect himself that John Sargent might be renominated as Attorney General of the United States.

Take the Secretary of the Navy, who, it is said, was appointed to his present position on the indorsement of Mr. Hoover. He has not secured his job. It is said that he whispers around to certain Republican leaders and asks them the question, "Have you heard anything about me?" [Laughter.] Other men, Mr. Robinson, of California, for instance, and Mr. Cramer, of North Carolina, are mentioned for the job of Secretary of the Navy.

Let us take now the Secretary of Labor. Was there ever a man who was more diligent, more persuasive in his eloquence, and more constant in his devotion to the candidacy of Mr. Hoover before the convention and afterwards than Mr. Davis? Mr. Mellon might have disagreed with him, but Mr. Hoover knows of the devotion of the Secretary of Labor. It is true the Secretary of Labor and Mr. Hoover have had some differences in the Cabinet. They differed, perhaps, about the national-origins test; they could not agree in their report to Congress as to whether or not it should be put into effect, and they may have differed about some other questions; but we know that every time the distinguished junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], when unemployment was rampant in this country, would make a speech and say there were four or five million men out of employment, Mr. Davis, as one of the apostles of the present administration, would give out a statement the next day and show that a million and a half men had gone to work the night before. [Laughter.] So Mr. Davis has been constant in his loyalty and devotion to the Coolidge administration; and yet in this confused state of political thought of all the men that we hear mentioned for the position of Secretary of Labor we never hear the present Secretary's name. We hear talk of Lewis, of Pennsylvania; of Mr. Doak, and of others; but this man who stood by the Coolidge policies, which Mr. Hoover in his campaign speeches pledged to carry on, is lost in the shuffle.

Now, take the Postmaster General. We love Harry New. He was one of us here once. He has made a good Postmaster General. He has appointed whom the Republicans wanted him to appoint; he has not paid so much attention to civil service, but there never was a Republican who did. [Laughter.] He inaugurated the air mail service of this country, broadened and enlarged it, and made it effective. He was appointed on the recommendation of JIM WATSON. Perhaps Will Hays wants to get the Postmaster Generalship again. That may be the fly in the ointment. We also hear of Bascom Slemp as a probable candidate for Postmaster General. It is quite true that he has certain qualifications for the position. [Laughter.] He knows the South and how to distribute patronage down there.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, did the Senator from Mississippi say Mr. Slemp knows how to distribute patronage?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; distribute patronage.

Mr. CARAWAY. I did not understand the Senator.

Mr. HARRISON. And we hear of other distinguished Republican leaders, from Jim Good on; but nothing is mentioned about the present Postmaster General being reappointed to the Cabinet of President-elect Hoover.

Take the Secretary of the Interior. Of course, I know that you gentlemen are very proud of the last appointment to this place, and I will admit that it was a better appointment than some other appointments that have been made by the Republican administration to that office, but we hear nothing said now about reappointing Mr. West to this particular job. It is some one else. They do not know who it will be. It is said that the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has a man in mind; that he wants to place one of his distinguished and loyal friends in that particular job. He is close enough to them down there now. There is no need for that; but of all the men we hear mentioned for it, we do not hear that the President elect is going to reappoint the man whom President Coolidge has appointed to carry out the Coolidge policies.

Take the Secretary of Commerce—the very man who was appointed, it is said, at the insistence of the President elect himself—Mr. Whiting. Do you hear his name mentioned for Secretary of Commerce? No. He is not mentioned for that place at all. But we hear much of the eager desire of Mr. Walter Brown to land that plum for services rendered.

And so you go down the line, and you come to the Secretary of the Treasury. Of course, he may be pushing himself a little bit in this particular controversy. He may be getting into a little deep water with some of his old allies in the campaign just closed. We read the other day in the papers that they have about settled their controversy; that Mr. Mellon is to go in and stay in for about 14 months, with the understanding that he is then to be given a long furlough, and Mr. Ogden Mills is to be appointed to the place.

But it seems that the New York political situation was not ironed out as well and as smoothly as we had thought it was in the beginning, because we heard a loud voice from over at the other end of the Capitol the very next day, the voice of the chairman of the Rules Committee, Mr. SNELL, and he says that the New York Congressmen must be consulted with reference to this matter.

But, Mr. President, this confusion that exists everywhere, this growing concern on the part of distinguished gentlemen who think they are entitled to a Cabinet position and who do not know yet whether they are going to be appointed to it, may be a part of the censorship that was imposed by the President elect in his recent "good will" trip to South America. We have all read of that censorship on the Maryland and on the Utah. The man who was placed in charge of it by the next President, Mr. George Barr Baker, is said to have been spoken of for one of these high Cabinet positions. It may be that there has been a change in the plans since the President elect requested the Appropriations Committee the other day to create a new position, carrying a salary of $10,000, and the chairman of the Appropriations Committee gladly acquiesced in it, and the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] acquiesced in it. Word came up to them that he said, "I shall need another secretary. I am going to have more correspondence than the present President. I need to take care of a certain fellow." Anyway, it may be said that that might have been in his mind. He wanted two secretaries. It is inexplicable why the distinguished Senator from Utah and the distinguished Senator from Wyoming did not comply with the request and give him two. That was the message that came to the Appropriations Committee—that he needed two additional secretaries when he became President of the United States. He wanted to take care of two fellows instead of one; and so it may be that there was some conflict, some confusion, as to whether Mr. Akerson or Mr. George Barr Baker was to get this particular place. It may be that something will be done about that at the next Congress.

It has been suggested that when the new President comes in he will ask of Congress a larger appropriation to enforce this law; that he will carry out his campaign pledges by doing that; and that you will then make the appropriation. I submit to you that that is impossible under your plan. If what we hear is true—and if there is any denial of it, I wish some leader would rise and deny it—when the extra session of Congress meets, under your plan or the plan of the House leaders, you are going to organize one committee or two committees—the Rules Committee and the Ways and Means Committee. It is said that you are not going to have the Appropriations Committee organized, so that you will not be bothered with all that; that you will not have the other committees organized to consider a whole lot of other legislation; but you are going to organize the Ways and Means Committee and pass a tariff bill, and organize the Agricultural Committee, perhaps, and bring the bills over here under those circumstances. So it matters not how the President in his inaugural address or his first message to Congress may appeal for increased funds to enforce the prohibition law; you will not have the agency with which to do it unless you change your plan and pass it during the extra session of Congress.

Mr. President, there is no politics in this proposition. Both political parties—and I think about 99 per cent of the American people—believe in the enforcement not only of the prohibition law but of every other law on the statute books. At least it is our duty to provide the means so that there can be an honest endeavor to enforce the law; and, so far as I am concerned, I want no alibi from anyone with reference to this great question. I am willing to vote the $25,000,000 and place it in the hands of the present Secretary of the Treasury if he is to be the next Secretary of the Treasury, or in the hands of Mr. Bill Donovan, if he is to be the next Attorney General of the United States and there should be a transfer of the Prohibition Unit over to the Department of Justice. Let them have the necessary money. This appropriation lasts until the 30th day of June, 1930, nearly a year and a half. If this appropriation is not made now it would be at least a year before an increased appropriation could be made to enforce this law: and it would seem to me that the least thing we could do is to adopt the amendment offered by the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS].

Mr. President, I desire at the close of my remarks to have inserted in the RECORD an article on censorship, and how it worked during Mr. Hoover's recent trip around South America, as written by a distinguished newspaper correspondent, Mr. George H. Manning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

(See Exhibit A.)

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, before the Senator sits down, is it George Barr Baker that the Senator is talking about?

Mr. HARRISON. George Barr Baker is the censor.

Mr. CARAWAY. Is he the same gentleman who was peddling around those papers purporting to be diplomatic correspondence with Mexico, or at least had them and showed them to somebody?

Mr. HARRISON. He is the same gentleman. He used to be editor of Everybody's Magazine.

Mr. CARAWAY. Is he the one of whom Mr. Lane, I believe, said that they had to get these papers away from him with some difficulty?

Mr. HARRISON. That is the same George Barr Baker.

CHARGE PRESS CENSORSHIP ON HOOVER GOOD-WILL TRIP TO SOUTH—WASHINGTON CORRESPONDENT CORPS REPORTED INDIGNANT AT DELETIONS IN COPY AND GENERAL ATMOSPHERE OF INTIMIDATION—THREE CORRESPONDENTS FORCED TO RISK LIVES IN AIR

By George H. Manning, Washington correspondent, Editor and Publisher

(By telegraph to Editor and Publisher)

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 10.—Washington newspaper correspondents who accompanied President-elect Herbert Hoover on his good-will tour of South America are indignant at censorship of their dispatches during the trip.

While the actual deletion of stories was not frequent or at great length, the atmosphere almost of intimidation which prevailed imposed psychological conditions which are regarded by the correspondents as far more important than the restriction actually practiced.

In many instances, they declare, no stories were sent or even written because the newspaper men felt that it would be useless to attempt to get them radioed from the ships which carried the party. Actual incidents which were not reported or which were inadequately handled for this season included the following as the most important items:

A series of opinions given Mr. Hoover and the party by American firms and native chamber of commerce at points the party stopped that the visit of American battleships for maneuvers in South American waters is a nuisance and threatens good relations.

The wounding of a native policeman by a member of the crew of the Maryland at Lima, Peru.

The storm encountered in the Pacific by the Maryland.

Journalistic circles here and in other cities have registered a protest that is still growing against the methods employed on the trip. No similar censorship has been attempted by Government officials within the memory of the oldest Washington newspaper man, it was said, and the Baltimore Sun characterized the proceedings as "insufferable."

"By what authority was a censorship established over the news writers who accompanied the President elect?" continues that paper. "They were sent on that trip by press associations and individual papers to report the important news that resulted from Mr. Hoover's appearance in the Latin-American nations. In that mission they had a status as independent and as necessary to the public as that of any other individuals or groups.

"They constituted the one instrument by which the people of this Nation could hope to have an impartial record of what occurred in a momentous series of contacts between their President elect and the nations of Latin America.

"By what authority, legal, political, moral, or other, were these men told 'thus far may you go in your dispatches to be read by the American people and no further?' Who declared them political appendages of the tour?"

Every news story written on board the Maryland and the Utah, the two American battleships which carried the good-will party, had to be submitted by the writer to George Barr Baker, press liaison officer for Mr. Hoover, according to the newspaper men who were on the trip.

Before news dispatches were transmitted over the ship's radio each of them was required to bear Mr. Baker's O. K. The ships operated as much as possible with the Washington naval station in sending the stories. They were turned over from there to the Washington bureaus of the papers or press associations or to commercial lines for delivery.

On the Maryland, which carried the party on the first leg of the tour, five copies of each dispatch were required from the reporters. One of these extra copies went into the Navy Department files, another was used for sending the story, and a third is reputed to have been for the inspection of Capt. Victor Kimberley, commander of the battleship.

Disposition of the remaining copies is a profound mystery to all the correspondents.

Demands on the reporters were lightened by one copy when the transfer was made to the Utah. In addition to this favor, the privilege was given the reporters of receiving a copy on which was marked the hour of transmission.

At the time of the transfer a mimeographed memorandum from Mr. Baker was placed in the reporters' hands with a brief direction, as follows: "The O. K. system will be continued." This reference to the submission of dispatches for approval was accompanied by data as to the hours of radio service.

This system resulted in the deletion, according to the correspondents, of words, lines, and even paragraphs in stories written by many of the correspondents.

One reporter representing a press association withdrew an entire article at Mr. Baker's "suggestion." This "suggestion" was that he "thought it would be better" to withhold the story at the time.

An Associated Press dispatch written by one of its two reporters who made the trip was delayed for five hours, it was declared. When ultimately sent, changes had been made in it, he charges; this dispatch concerned the storm which the Maryland weathered in the Pacific.

Deliberate suppression of facts is charged to the officers by the reporters on at least one occasion. This occurred at Lima when an enlisted member of the Maryland's crew became involved in an argument with a Peruvian policeman. During the trouble the policeman was shot. No correspondent was able to obtain any information as to how the man was wounded or as to the cause of the altercation.

"Policy" also demanded the exclusion from news dispatches of the numerous complaints received throughout the trip against the maneuvers of the Pacific Fleet in the waters of Latin-American countries.

Consequently no mention has been made of the apparent connection between these advices to Mr. Hoover and the order from Washington canceling the visit of the fleet.

These complaints included charges of riots consequent upon American battleships touching at the ports and strained diplomatic and commercial relations generally, and they are regarded by the newspapermen as having a direct bearing upon the decision of the Navy Department.

It was emphasized by the reporters that this censorship was not attempted on land when stories were sent by commercial cable or wireless. They also refused to discuss the restrictions during the trip, in the best interests of Mr. Hoover, with the consequent lack of publicity concerning conditions until the return.

They declare that there was some basis for the censorship aboard the Maryland, because of less modern radio equipment than the Utah's, and because of unsettled atmospheric conditions. The latter was the chief difficulty encountered in transmission at various times.

The newspapermen themselves met this situation by appointing a committee from their ranks to assign wire time for all dispatches and limit the number of words to be sent at one time.

No such difficulties were encountered, however, on the Utah, it is said, and there was no possible physical reason for the censorship after the change to that battleship. Evidence as to this is cited in the fact that Mr. Baker's approval or disapproval of dispatches was not related to their length but to what they said.

Mr. Hoover and his representative, Mr. Baker, take the position that their "suggestions" did not constitute a censorship, and that the policy was "merely advisory." Although Mr. Baker is a commander in the United States Naval Reserve, he did not accompany the party as a naval officer or representative, but was a member of the President-elect's personal party.

Aside from the censorship, which had both its annoyance and humor, the newspaper men on the party had many enjoyable and unfortunate experiences during the trip.

The correspondents, for the most part, deeply resented the action of the commander of the Maryland in leaving port at Antofagasta, Chile, and leaving behind three of the newspaper men who were a little late in returning to the ship.

When the Hoover party reached Antofagasta, which is close to the border of Bolivia, that country having no port, a delegation of Bolivian officials called on Mr. Hoover. A reception was arranged for them and it was announced that the newspaper men might go ashore for a time but should return by 12.30 p. m. About 12 or 15 went ashore.

When the Bolivian delegation left the ship about 1.30 and preparations were made for weighing anchor, a check-up revealed that Rodney Dutcher, of NEA Service; William Philip Simms, representing Scripps-Howard; and Price Bell, of the Chicago Daily News, had not returned from "shore leave."

Although Antofagasta is in the nitrate desert region and the town folk are not particularly kindly toward Americans, the Maryland steamed away, leaving the three American newspaper men behind. So far as known no effort was made on the part of the Maryland's officers to ascertain if Dutcher, Simms, and Bell were ill or well, and the ship departed leaving the three newspaper men alone in a foreign country without preparation for a stay of more than a couple of hours.

It developed that they had been the guests of the commander of the port who had invited them uptown and continually protested that because of the office he held he could give full assurance that the Maryland would not leave until 3 o'clock. When they returned to the dock the Maryland was gone.

Next morning, with the sympathetic aid of Ambassador Culbertson and officials of the Chilian Government, arrangements were made to take them by rail, a gasoline hand car, and airplane to Santiago, the next port of call for the Maryland.

Two airplanes were placed at the disposal of the correspondents by the Chilian Government officials. One of them, an English plane, took Simms and Bell, because they were slim, and Dutcher, who is rather portly, took passage in the other, a rickety old American plane.

The plane carrying Simms and Bell made a chilly flight in a snowstorm over the Andes and placed them with the rest of the party in Santiago. The plane in which Dutcher attempted to make the trip stayed up only about 15 minutes and returned to the field without accident. The other plane made a return trip and carried Dutcher along to join the party on the following day.

The newspaper men are still laughing over what happened to one of their number who went out for the evening to one of the American embassies in Latin America to "visit" and left word behind with one of his colleagues to protect him if anything important happened. It did, and one of his associates filed 1,500 words for him on the incident under a special arrangement for expedition of the dispatch at the rate of $1 a word which cost the office $1,500. Another companion undertook to do a kindly turn for the socially inclined missing reporter and filed 1,200 words on the same story at a cost of about $250. It is reported that two more of his companions also filed stories for the missing man, but proof is lacking.

The object of the sympathetic attention of his colleagues is happy in the fact that the home office paid the tolls.

Eighteen reporters and seven news photographers accompanied Mr. Hoover on his good will trip to South America, which left San Francisco on November 19, and returned to Washington last Sunday.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I have been very much amused at some of the discussions upon this question, and I have been very much pleased indeed that some people who were so free to criticize any statement in reference to the violation of the prohibition act have now conceded that the law has not been enforced.

In the late campaign we were told all over this country that if Alfred E. Smith were elected President of these United States there would be no enforcement of the prohibition law; and when it was stated on the rostrum that the law was not now being enforced, but was a farce, those who said so were held up to ridicule and made fun of.

Mr. President, I shall vote for this amendment. I want to see this law and every other law enforced.

I hold in my hand a picture and an article clipped from this morning's Washington Herald. The picture shows a truck in the charge of certain policemen. I shall ask the clerk to read it, and shall ask that it be inserted at the end of my remarks. The heading is French Embassy Almost Loses Truck Load of Liquor to Police.

It is stated in this article that the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Lowman, ordered that this carload of liquor be released by the policemen of the District of Columbia and that it be turned over to the French embassy.

I shall never sit in this Hall contended and vote to allow these people who are not American citizens to have liquor and wine and beer, serve it to their guests, serve it in their homes, and, in some instances, sell it, under the protection of the men who say that they are enforcing the prohibition law; and at the same time, gentlemen of the Senate, if an American citizen born here, bred here, and who himself and whose people have fought the battles of this country and bared their breasts to the cannon of the country's enemies, after a hard day's work, possibly on a cold, rainy day, goes to his home in the afternoon and partakes of a drink of what is called whisky, he is immediately seized, arrested, locked up in jail, and possibly put on the chain gang, while these foreigners are allowed to have all the whisky they want.

The lawyers at their banquets have all the whisky they want. The newspaper people at their banquets have all the whisky they want. The doctors at their banquets have all the whisky they want. Who is it that is being deprived by this law? If prohibition is good enough for Henry Ford's workmen, it is good enough for Henry Ford; and if it is good enough for the poor people of this country, then I say the law should be enforced for all men alike.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] the other day made some remarks along this line. While I am not criticizing him, yet there is in his committee to-day, and has been since December, 1927, a bill asking that this law be enforced for all people alike. There is another bill before his committee asking that the ambassadors and other foreigners in this country shall not be allowed privileges not given to American citizens. Those bills have not been acted upon. Not one word has been said about them, yet this violation of the law goes on. Some little imitation of a man calling himself white runs over some girl here on the street and says, "I am an ambassador's servant." Our policemen must stand aside and let that man go free. Even though the man strikes a policeman, he dare not strike back as has been reported here time after time.

Mr. President, I ask the Senate in all good faith that if they make this appropriation they pass a bill something on the order of the one I have introduced providing that this law be enforced to all people alike—Americans, non-Americans, and all others—and that we do not continue to put ourselves in the position of depriving American citizens of rights and privileges given to other people.

Mr. President, proof of these things can be shown. It might pinch some people's shoes to show where they get their liquor. It might be shown that some of that liquor comes from embassies to their homes. It might pinch some people's shoes to have it known that they go to embassy receptions and drink liquor. Yet when it comes to voting you can not get a vote or a bit of assistance from them to stop what those same people are endeavoring to stop as to other people.

Let us be fair. Let us be men. If we are going to put this law on other people, let us abide by it. If we are going to let foreigners have liquor, and some of us go to the embassies and drink it and have it sent to our homes, then let us allow other people in America to have the same privilege.

I believe in fairness and equality in the enforcement of law. I believe all men should have equal punishment when they are convicted of violations of the law, and all men should have equal rights. I believe that if this law is going to be enforced it ought to be enforced to the letter.

I am in favor of the law; my people are in favor of it; we want it; but we want a fair enforcement and honest enforcement of it.

The senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE] gave some figures here a while ago and referred to my State as one where whisky is drunk. We have people in my State who drink whisky, and I had hoped that the Senator would go a little further and show the quality of liquor consumed in my State, and the number of people who are killed by liquor in the various States. I think my State would stand pretty well in the quality of its liquor and in the small number of deaths from drinking it. Let our motto be, "Equal privileges to all."

Mr. President, I ask that the article which I send to the desk be read by the clerk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will read.

The article was read, as follows:

[Washington Herald, Tuesday, January 22, 1929]

FRENCH EMBASSY ALMOST LOSES TRUCK LOAD OF LIQUOR TO POLICE

The French Embassy almost lost 624 quarts of choice liquor last night.

Twelfth precinct police interned a truck load from Baltimore marked for Jules Henry, secretary of the embassy, and arrested the two drivers on charges of transportation and possession when they failed to produce the necessary papers entitling them to proceed.

Diplomats scurried about pulling wires. An hour later an order from police headquarters released the two men, and a command came from Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Lowman to turn over the precious goods to the French Embassy.

Policemen T. F. Heide and John Berry, of the twelfth precinct, saw the heavy truck passing down Rhode Island Avenue, manned by Frederick David Trabing and Conrad Trabing, brothers, of Baltimore. The Trabings come through every week with French Embassy liquor, police say, but they could not produce any authorization for their journey last night.

Believing the embassy destination mark might be a "blind," police escorted the truck to the station. News of the capture spread and a large crowd soon was on hand, gazing wistfully, until legal technicalities were waived and men and goods discharged.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I ask that the four bills which I send to the desk be printed at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. Res. 287, Seventieth Congress, second session

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

S. Res. 31, Seventieth Congress, first session

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

December 6 (calendar day, December 9), 1927

Mr. BLEASE submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, January 17, 1928. The Committee on Finance discharged, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Resolution

Resolved, That the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Hon. Seymour Lowman, who is in charge of the enforcement of the Volstead Act, be requested to investigate immediately, and inform the Senate, whether or not whisky, wine, or beer has been served by any of the foreign ambassadors, ministers, consuls, or other agents of any other countries in Washington, District of Columbia, since the passage of the Volstead Act; and if it is now being done, and, if so, with the approval of the President of the United States or any other official whose duty it is to enforce the said law; and further, if it is true that the recent representatives of the Italian delegation to this country in reference to the settlement of its debt to the United States were permitted to bring into this country champagne, whisky, and beer, or either of them, and, if so, by whose permission, and if they did, why were they not promptly arrested as American citizens would have been?

Second. That a similar request be made of Hon. James M. Doran, Commissioner of Prohibition.

Third. That a similar request be made of the Secretary of the Treasury.

S. 786, Seventieth Congress, first session

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

December 6 (calendar day, December 9), 1927

Mr. BLEASE introduced the following bill; which was read twice and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

A bill to prevent double prosecution for same offense

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act no person who shall have been tried and convicted in any State court of any offense, or of selling, transporting, or storing contraband liquors, whisky, wine, or beer, shall thereafter be tried for the same violation or offense in a Federal court; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or liberty in both the State and Federal courts. The conviction in either shall bar prosecution in the other.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate very long. I am in favor of the appropriation of an adequate amount of money to enforce the prohibition law. I think the amount ought to be increased at this time.

The prohibition law is being enforced in many places. If those Senators who are constantly attacking the law and its enforcement would travel through the States and attend the courts in the various counties they would find that the law is being enforced and that people are being prosecuted and convicted for violating it. Of course, the law is not enforced absolutely to the letter. I do not know of a single law upon the statute books that is. We have a law against murder, and it is being violated in every State in the Union.

The Senator from Maryland referred to an incident down in Atlanta where some whisky was being drunk and sold just before Easter Sunday, but the Senator did not tell about a young man, a college boy, who not long ago went out to get a thrill, and who wanted to kill somebody in order to have that peculiar kind of thrill, and murdered a drug clerk one Sunday night.

There are other laws that are being violated every day. We have a law against people running an automobile at a reckless rate of speed. Would the Senator repeal the law on that subject because it is not fully enforced? I do not know of a single law upon the statute books that is enforced to the letter.

Mr. President, when statistics are presented contrasting the old system with the new I grow exceedingly weary with certain Senators who tell us that more whisky is being drunk than was drunk under the barroom régime. It is not true. There is not one one-hundredth as much whisky being consumed now as was consumed in the United States under the miserable barroom system.

What did the barrooms do? They controlled the politics of many of the towns and cities of the country and they controlled the politics of some of the States of this Union. The barroom brigade was in control, and if a man ran for office and he favored putting down the whisky traffic, the barroom bunch would oppose him and encompass his defeat if it were possible to do so.

What were they doing? They were selling whisky, and at the time the eighteenth amendment was adopted the meanest kind of whisky.

I know something about that situation. In my State in many places we banished the barroom and set up the dispensary, and municipalities became corrupted by it. The men whose business it was to purchase the whisky for the town dispensary in many instances were accused of graft, and they bought from the whisky interests whisky that was very cheap and very sorry. There was some high-grade whisky, and some of the sorriest whisky they had had dope in it. I once saw an empty whisky barrel sawed in two by a gentleman who wanted to use it for washtubs. There was in that whisky barrel three times as much plug tobacco as my hat would hold. They had put it in the whisky and the whisky had absorbed the nicotine and tobacco juice and it swelled out those plugs until they were as thick as my wrist or thicker. They were selling all sorts of concoctions for people to drink in the barroom days. They were poisoning the people with that vile stuff.

I remember an instance at the capital of my State. A very fine young man who lived out in the State came over to the capital for something. He took two drinks in a barroom and was sitting down in a shoe shiners' chair sound asleep and two other men and myself had great difficulty in arousing him at all. He had taken two drinks of sorry whisky, which was being sold under license permitted by law.

I know of a case where in a drunken brawl in a barroom a young man's throat was cut from ear to ear, killed by his companion and friend in a drunken row. Both of them were drunk. And two sad and sorrowful families were bowed in grief over that awful tragedy of the barroom.

That is not all I have seen. When I hear gentlemen talk about denying the poor people and the laboring people the right to have whisky in abundance, I reflect that prohibition is the greatest blessing that has come to the poor people of America, the greatest blessing that has come to the toiling masses of our country. What are those particular people doing? They are living sober lives, and their sober boys are outstripping the drunken sons of the rich in college. Their boys are forging their way to the front and are becoming the heads of the industrial establishments of the country, and these sober, clear thinking, and clean-living boys are going to be the men of wealth and power in the near future.

If nothing else will do them, let those who want to drink and debauch themselves go on as they are going, and let the poor man's son be sober and live an industrious, upright, honest life, and he will become a very useful and influential man. You do not have to make a laboring man drunk in order to make him work and support his family.

I will tell you what I witnessed once at Birmingham, in my State. We had a campaign on to drive the barrooms out, and the wives and children of the laboring men of Birmingham were invited to parade the streets of Birmingham. They did so. It was a touching and pathetic sight. Why were they parading? They were appealing to the voters to drive the barrooms out, and why? Because many of them said, "On Saturday night, when our husbands start home with the week's pay in their pockets, they go by the barrooms. They take a drink or two; they are doped and made stupid; they are led into the poolroom, and they do not know anything else until they are locked up in the calaboose at midnight, the contents of their purses are gone, and their wives and little children waiting, waiting in the deep watches of the night, for the return of the husband and father, but he does not come." And he did not come, and they did not know where he was until Sunday, when they got word that he was in the lock-up. After the barroom bunch got his money they turned him over, drunk and penniless, to the policemen, and they locked him up. That is what happened in the cruel and wicked old days of the barroom. These women said, "We are trying to have the barrooms driven out of Birmingham." And they helped to drive them out, and what have we there now? We have the finest class of laboring men, sober, with heads erect and light upon their faces. They are putting money in the bank, they are building little homes on the mountain sides about Birmingham, and they are educating their children and providing well for their families. So we have a different order of things at Birmingham and other places all over the country.

Mr. President, I do not want to see the great mass of people who are being blessed and benefited by prohibition lose those blessings and benefits in order to furnish intoxicating drinks to certain lawless cities filled with foreigners who care nothing for American ideals and institutions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Alabama has expired.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BLEASE] in his remarks a few moments ago referred to four bills. Technically, one is a proposed amendment to the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], one is a resolution, and the other two, I think, are bills. The Senator has called attention to the fact that no action has been taken thereon by the Judiciary Committee.

There are, of course, many hundreds of bills referred to the Judiciary Committee, as is the case with other committees. I was satisfied that every bill and every resolution that the Senator from South Carolina had introduced and which had been referred to the Judiciary Committee had been, under the rule of the committee, properly referred to a subcommittee. I sent for the clerk of the committee and I was told by him that I was right in that belief, that each one of the so-called bills or resolutions to which the Senator referred was referred to a subcommittee and that the Senator was notified in writing that they were so referred and was given the names of the members of the subcommittee. I am satisfied that the subcommittee having charge of any bill or resolution which the Senator from South Carolina or any other Senator has introduced and on which he wants action will be glad to give him the privilege of a hearing. I am satisfied that every bill which has been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary has been referred to a subcommittee and given consideration by the subcommittee.

Mr. BLEASE. I did not intend any reflection on the chairman of the committee or on the committee itself, but the bill with reference to the whisky business to which I referred has been in the committee over a year. I have never been notified to appear before the committee or any subcommittee.

Mr. NORRIS. Has the Senator been notified of the appointment of a subcommittee?

Mr. BLEASE. I was notified just a few days ago.

Mr. NORRIS. If the instruction of the chairman of the committee is not followed I would be glad to have any Senator call my attention to it. It is for the clerk to notify the Senator introducing the bill of the appointment of a subcommittee and the names of the members of the subcommittee. The clerk is also directed to send the bill to the chairman of the subcommittee so that they can proceed to take action.

Mr. BLEASE. I simply called attention to the matter because I wanted to show that while this violation of the law is going on, while this exemption of foreigners is being allowed day after day, the Senate has had a bill before it for over 13 months and no action has been taken on it. I did not intend any reflection on the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. I am entirely in sympathy with the Senator in his efforts to get some action, if we can, to control the matter of the intoxicating liquor that is being handled by people connected with the embassies. I have taken the matter up with the Secretary of State and had quite an extended correspondence with him about it a year or two ago.

The incident to which the Senator refers is not the first instance of the kind where liquor has been seized by the police officials and has been sent back because some representative of an embassy, through our own Secretary of State, demands that it be done. The law is in existence providing punishment for the illegal sale of liquor. It applies to everybody. But there is a serious question as to how we can approach an abuse of the law when persons connected with embassies are not amenable to our laws, but only to the laws of some foreign nation.

I am going to take up with the proper enforcement officers the matter of a letter which I received since I addressed the Senate on this subject the other day. The writer gave me the name of an individual who, he said, is connected with an embassy. He gave the name of the embassy and said this individual is engaged in the bootlegging business in the city of Washington, and that if the officers will get after the man they will be able to convict him. That presents a little different case from the one to which the Senator from South Carolina referred and from the one I referred to the other day where a large quantity of liquor had been seized by the enforcement officers and they had released it upon the demand of our Secretary of State because he had been importuned to do so on statements made by representatives of an embassy.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. I realize that as old as intercourse between nations is the matter of courtesy extended by one nation to representatives of another nation, but under modern conditions does not the Senator seriously think there ought to be a curtailment of immunities granted, at least to the lesser of those employed or engaged in the service of some foreign nation here?

Just this morning I noticed an article from London indicating that there is to be a serious effort made to curb the immunity granted to representatives of foreign nations in England because of accidents so frequently occurring as the result of some reckless person driving an automobile and causing an accident. In this country I think somebody ought to take the initiative to curb the privilege that is now enjoyed in that respect. I am not at all certain that the day of diplomacy as we have had it heretofore is not already a thing of the past as far as any useful purposes can be served.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to conclude, because my time is limited.

Mr. CARAWAY. I did not realize that his time was limited. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator about the point he has just raised. I think that some of the privileges to which he has referred ought to be curtailed. The bootlegging of liquor is not the only question. The driving of automobiles in our streets, paying no attention to local regulations and local laws, is another question.

I want to say, however, that if any embassy wants intoxicating liquor as an embassy, and wants to use it according to its own ideas, I doubt very much whether it is wise in us to try to interfere. I would not want to interfere. But when somebody from the embassy, perhaps just an ordinary employee, goes out with liquor and bootlegs it and sells it or offers it for sale or makes a business of it, that is an entirely different proposition. I do not believe there is a foreign embassy in Washington the head of which would stand for that kind of business. I am really not criticizing them, but I am told over and over again that the condition exists; and in the particular instance to which I have referred I have the name of the man who it is alleged is engaged in the bootlegging business. That man is amenable to our law, and when he is arrested for selling liquor, no embassy ought to be allowed, by any of our officers in the State Department or by any court of any prohibition officer to secure immunity merely because he happens to be an employee at the same time of a foreign embassy.

These things we can properly reach, but there are, of course, questions involved different from that when we undertake to say to an embassy, "You shall not have liquor in your embassy." I presume they have a right to have it if they confine it there. I have no disposition to interfere with that situation of course. They are in their own jurisdiction then and are not subject to our laws. But when an employee of an embassy sells liquor or when an employee of an embassy recklessly drives an automobile to the damage and injury of every other driver on the street, he ought to be amenable to the same law that I am or that anyone else is.

Mr. BLEASE. Did they not violate the law when they hauled liquor from Baltimore to an embassy just recently, when that liquor was not hauled by a foreigner connected with an embassy, but when American citizens not representing any embassy hauled it, and when it was being hauled by American boys on an American truck over American roads?

Mr. NORRIS. I should think they would be amenable to our laws. That would be my judgment of it.

Mr. BLEASE. Why should those men to whom the Senator would give this $25,000,000 be permitted to violate our liquor laws? Of course they are violating our liquor laws.

Mr. NORRIS. In the case I mentioned, another officer of the law ordered the liquor turned loose. In my judgment, as I said in writing to the then Secretary of State, when a consignment of liquor—in that case I think something over 11 barrels of whisky——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I desire to add just a word to what I have already said in the course of this debate for the purpose of protesting against the bulldozing telegram sent to Secretary Mellon by James Cannon, jr., chairman, and Eugene L. Crawford, secretary, of the Board of Temperance and Social Service of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, and Bishop Thomas Nicholson, president of the Anti-Saloon League. We all remember that only a short time ago the Hearst press unearthed the fact that the executive committee of the Anti-Saloon League had failed by only a single vote to indict President Coolidge for failure to do his duty in relation to prohibition enforcement, and now Bishop Cannon, Mr. Crawford, and Bishop Nicholson have called the attention of every Senator this morning to their "request"—to use their own term—to Secretary Mellon to give his approval to this additional appropriation of $25,000,000 for prohibition enforcement.

When their telegram is read it is found to be no request at all but simply another threatening and blustering communication such as the Anti-Saloon League has so often addressed to public officials. Who are these people anyway? Are they ministers of the gospel, or are they common politicians? Some French wit once said, "There are three sexes, men, women, and clergymen." Of course, that was a malicious thing to say. I have had the honor to know many clergymen who were distinguished from their fellow men only by the higher plane of moral superiority in every respect on which they moved. Among them were many evangelical ministers. Their lofty integrity, their purity of life, their dignity, their fidelity to the reserve of their sacred calling did them infinite honor. But divines like these Anti-Saloon League divines—if I can use such a term as divines in such a connection at all—do seem to belong to some kind of neuter gender.

They do seem to be some sort of tertium quid, lacking as they do the mental balance of men and the considerate gentleness of women.

When I think of them in connection with the evil influence that they have exerted over elections, legislative bodies, and the appointing power I am always reminded of the malignant observation of John Randolph of Roanoke in the Virginia constitutional convention of 1829–30 that no countries are so badly governed as countries that are governed by women, except countries that are governed by priests. God forbid that any clergyman of this kind should ever come near me for the purpose of exercising any office that appertains to his profession. If he were to sprinkle baptismal water upon the head of a child I should expect its scalp to be scalded rather than hallowed. If he solemnized the marriage of a maid I should not be surprised to see the orange blossoms that encircled her brow immediately wither and die under the scorching effect of his abusive breath. So far as I am concerned, just as soon would I have a raven perched upon the head of my bed as to have such a clergyman approach me in my last agony.

If he were to preach a funeral sermon over my corpse, I believe that, like Lazarus, I would throw aside the cerements of the grave and come back to life in indignant resurrection.

These three men come here and say to the Secretary of the Treasury:

> It will be difficult for the average citizen to believe there is much zeal or eagerness on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury to secure adequate enforcement if he refuses this opportunity to develop and carry out an adequate program.

In other words, they are arrogating to themselves the function of browbeating and berating no less a functionary than the Secretary of the Treasury.

In the year 1924 this Bishop Nicholson admitted in a speech that he delivered at Washington that whatever else the champions of prohibition might say they were obliged to admit that drinking among women was rapidly increasing. So it was, so it is, and so it will continue to do unless the moral shipwreck that is being worked in the case of so many individuals, men and women, by prohibition is brought to an end by the termination of the prohibition law itself.

This is the Bishop Cannon who came over to the Eastern Shore of Maryland during the presidential campaign and fanned the flame of detestable religious bigotry, sowed discord in the breasts of our people; and instead of teaching them how to obey the injunction of our Saviour "Love ye one another," taught them the devil's creed, "Hate ye one another." Not only did he under the mask of prohibition distill the poison of his anti-Catholic prejudice into the hearts of our people but he even undertook to cast calumnious reproach upon the Italians and Poles who make up no small part of our Maryland population.

Ah, how readily could he learn lessons of courtesy and self-restraint from our Italian population—men whose social relations are marked by the highest degree of politeness and gracious hospitality, and who can drink wine without the least excess. Much, too, could he learn from our Polish population, and the native Polish genius which has so often flowered out into brilliant achievements of art. But Bishop Cannon's object, as I have stated, was to create a bitter Pool of Marah in our midst, to do all he could to induce our people to forget what, after all, was the most glorious tradition in their history; that is to say, their tradition of religious tolerance, that thing which, in the language of the Scriptures, has been their very crown of glory, their very diadem of beauty. And he came not without success, for feelings of sectarian animosity were aroused by him and others like him in the breasts of our people that I am afraid will not die down for the next generation or so.

So as an humble follower of Christ, who has never failed to pray for forgiveness morning and evening since he learned to pray at his mother's knee, who has all his life been a regular church attendant, I say in that capacity, as well as in my capacity as a United States Senator, that I resent and reject with scorn the domineering interference of such men as Bishop Cannon in the public life of this Nation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Maryland has expired.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I hesitate at this late hour to have anything to say upon a question that has been so thoroughly thrashed out. My only purpose in taking the floor is to express my earnest interest and sympathy with this effort to contribute to the enforcement of the prohibition law.

Of course there are those who think that the prohibition law is vicious; who think that it ought not to be enforced. They are entitled to their opinion, but the great body of the people of this Nation, without reference to party affiliation or political creed, are deeply in sympathy with that law. At any rate, Mr. President, it is written into the Constitution of our country, and in that Constitution it is going to stay.

Complying with the mandate of that constitutional provision the two Houses of Congress, speaking the voice of the people of this country, have solemnly declared that the prohibition law shall be enforced. Many efforts have been made since the enactment of that law to secure its modification, but they have been without success. Every time this question has been presented before the people in any aspect whatsoever, as it was in the last campaign, they have reinforced their command to the Congress to see to it that the law shall be enforced. Not only is that true of the men but of the women of the Nation as well.

The Senator from Maryland inveighs against government by women. Mr. President, there is no government by women in this country, but the voice and the prayers of the women of America are a vital influence in the affairs of men, and that influence since they have been invested with the ballot has always been, and in my judgment always will be, exercised in the interest of higher standards of life and morality and government and not in the interest of lower standards.

Mr. President, this is not the place to enter into an acrimonious discussion as to whether prohibition is a good thing or a bad thing or whether the prohibition law ought to be enforced or ought not to be enforced because of its fundamental weakness and vice as some have contended. The one question before the Senate at this time is: Are we going to supply the agents of the Government with sufficient funds in order to enforce this law adequately and efficiently? Cover it over by oratory, eloquence, and vituperation as you may, Mr. President, in the last campaign and before that campaign the consensus of opinion in this country was that the law was not being properly enforced, that it was not being as effectively enforced as it might be.

The answer then came to us and to the country in defense of that dereliction that the blame was upon the Congress of the United States because of its failure to supply the Treasury Department with sufficient funds with which to make the law effective. That was the defense advanced in the last campaign; that has been the defense during all of these years when the law was going unenforced—the lack of sufficient funds; the stinginess of Congress. Now, Mr. President, we come with open hands and say to the Secretary of the Treasury, the chief agent of enforcement in this country, and to his department, "We give you here more money than the Budget asked for the enforcement of the law, more money than you asked for its enforcement, in order that you may have no excuse to give to the people hereafter if you fail to exercise every facility, every agency that may possibly be employed to make this great law effective." Did I say "a great law," Mr. President? I wish to express my individual judgment that no law which has ever been written upon the statute books of this country at the command of the Constitution has been of as great importance to the masses of the people of the United States or has meant so much for the advancement of the moral standards of the people as has the prohibition law.

The officer of the Government who says he can not use money with which to make the enforcement of the law effective trifles with the people of America; he trifles with the intelligence of the country. If he can spend $13,000,000 ineffectually because it is not sufficient, he can spend this small additional amount more effectually, although it is not adequate to the task.

Mr. President, I have no patience at all with the arguments which have been made against this proposed appropriation. First, the argument is made that it is not needed. Thirteen million dollars are now available with which to enforce the law, the most difficult of enforcement of any law ever written upon the statute books of this country, a law which lends itself to violation by reason of the profits that are involved in its violation and by reason of the depraved appetites of a part of our people—$13,000,000 to enforce the prohibition law in 48 great States of this Union with a population of about 120,000,000, representing, apportioned among the States, about $250,000 to each State to enable the Federal Government to enforce the law.

If the Secretary of the Treasury can not use this money to make effective his efforts to enforce the law—which efforts everybody recognizes as having been futile and ineffective—he need not spend it. I do not particularly expect that the Secretary of the Treasury will spend it; but he has no mortgage upon the position which he occupies.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I believe this is the first time that I have ever risen on the floor of the Senate to make any statement in reference to how I personally stand with regard to the eighteenth amendment.

I was a Member of this body when the question was voted upon for the submission of the amendment to the people. I was also a Member of this body when more than seven-eighths of the States promptly ratified it. I was also a Member of this body when, very recently, the people of America seemed to reindorse the position they took when, through their several legislatures, they indorsed it.

So far as my attitude upon this question goes, I am not very greatly concerned as to the position that may be taken in reference to it by any group of men, whether in the form of the organized church or whether in the form of a voluntary body such as the Anti-Saloon League. Certain things that individuals and groups may do may be deplorable, but that in no way affects your relation and mine to a great question which involves in itself either welfare or disaster to the country over which we are set up as the legislators. We must settle with ourselves individually the question as to how we stand in reference to a great issue that has been incorporated in the organic law of this country by perhaps the greatest and most immediate response from all the States that has ever been made in reference to the ratification of a constitutional amendment.

Now there come reports that the law has not been and is not being enforced. From its very nature it naturally would not be enforced in so great a measure as the sanguine proponents of the law might hope. It is in keeping with the very nature of the matter that it has not been enforced any better or to any greater extent than it has been. But the greatest vice-producing agent in Christendom is the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors, especially those known as distilled liquors.

The other day when the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] was discussing the matter and reading evidence which seemed to show that those charged with enforcement were not in sympathy with the law and were not trying to enforce it, the thought occurred to me that if the allegations made by the Senator from Nebraska and others were true—that those charged with the enforcement of the law were not in sympathy with it and were not zealously trying to enforce it—it was to the everlasting credit of the American people that it was being so splendidly enforced, in view of all the circumstances, without the sympathy and cooperation of the enforcing officers.

I shall not attempt any incursions into the question of whether or not prohibition is a proper subject of national legislation. It is already incorporated in the organic law of our country. It is a part of our Constitution. Whether or not it should have been placed there does not enter into this question. The question is not whether we are going to act in accordance with what some one outside says or the reports that come in but what is our attitude as a body? My attitude is, as long as I am a Member of this body, that if I err I am going to err on the side of trying to enforce the law, so far as appropriations for its enforcement are concerned.

I agree with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] that it is perhaps the greatest manifestation of the spirit of America that has ever occurred in its history that we have incorporated into the Constitution and the laws enacted for the purpose of carrying it out those things necessary to outlaw the immemorial crime-producing element of the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors. We are boasting of being the greatest Nation on earth, and I believe we are, morally, politically, and industrially. The crowning glory of America is the fact that she has outlawed and is using her best men and her best forces to bring about the cessation and to minimize the effect of the greatest social crime-producing, vice-producing element that ever has cursed humanity, and I shall cast my vote for the appropriation to carry on the work of eliminating from our organized society, as far as possible, the presence of this inherently pernicious element.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I think everyone concedes that prohibition is permanently a part of the law of the land. The whole discussion revolves around whether it can be enforced.

I doubt if any right-thinking man indulges in the well-considered hope that the eighteenth amendment will be repealed in your time or mine. That question has been so firmly settled and fixed that discussion of it would be entirely superfluous.

It is my belief that the people of this country are divided into three groups upon the question of prohibition:

One group desire a continuation of the present system.

One group desire to repeal the whole system and return to the preprohibition days.

A third group—and I think they are larger numerically than either of the two former ones—believe thoroughly in prohibition and subscribe wholeheartedly to it industrially, socially, civically, morally, and righteously; but they are both dissatisfied and unsatisfied with the enforcement accorded it ever since its inception and until the present time. I think they have cause to feel that way about it. I feel that way about it myself. I have voted for prohibition in every form in which it has been submitted from precinct to Nation. I intend to continue doing so until I am convinced that it can not be enforced. I am not yet convinced of that fact.

The argument revolves around the question of enforcement. As the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] said to-day, people are arrayed in two groups, one asserting that it can be enforced, the other asserting that it can not be enforced; so that enforcement is the question with which we properly should be concerned. It is the question with which the citizenry of the country are concerned. Mothers and fathers who are interested in homes and sons and daughters are vitally concerned with the enforcement of prohibition.

The statement is made by prohibition officers all over the country that the reason the prohibition law is not enforced is because they have inadequate enforcement facilities and an insufficient number of enforcement officials. That statement is heard everywhere as an alibi, as an excuse, as an explanation for the failure to give us adequate enforcement. When the recently made statement of Doctor Doran is kept in mind to the effect that it will require $300,000,000 annually to enforce prohibition adequately, coupled with the further fact that we now appropriate only $13,500,000 annually, there is great force in the statement repeatedly made that it is not being enforced because they have insufficient money and an insufficient number of men with which to enforce it.

I believe that the vast majority of the people of this country earnestly desire enforcement; I earnestly desire it. I, for one, am willing to place at the disposal of the enforcement officials $25,000,000 additional in order that they may be facilitated to give the country enforcement. Let us test the proposal, and see whether or not, with proper facilities and a good-faith effort, it can be enforced.

I am wholly unwilling to turn backward. I am unwilling to concede that it is unsound morally, righteously, civically, or industrially. Neither will I concede that it is a failure in this country, populated by the highest type of men and women that God Almighty ever created or prospered.

So, Mr. President, I shall support the proposal to place at the command of the Treasury Department $25,000,000 additional in order that the people of this country may have what they voted for when they adopted the eighteenth amendment, and what we supported when we passed the Volstead Act, and give the law a fair test and trial, in order that it may no longer be said that we have not enforced it because we have had insufficient men and insufficient money.

It is my belief that if $25,000,000 will bring about substantial enforcement it will be the greatest advancement industrially, commercially, socially, civically, morally, and righteously that the country has taken in a long while in the past.

I shall not detain the Senate longer; I merely desire to give the Senate the reasons upon which I shall cast my vote in favor of the amendment of the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] to place this additional sum at the command of the enforcement officers of the country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, as modified, proposed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] to the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, will the President pro tempore kindly have the proposition upon which we are now to vote read?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] as a substitute for the committee amendment, on page 16, beginning in line 16, insert the following:

> For increasing the enforcement force, $24,000,000, or such part thereof as the President may deem useful, to be allocated by the President, as he may see fit, to the departments or bureaus charged with the enforcement of the national prohibition act and to remain available until June 30, 1930.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, I think everybody has made up his mind on this question, but, following the example of the Senator from New Mexico, I would like to give the reason for my vote.

In the first place, I am completely at sea with reference to the position of the proponents of this amendment. We are told by one class of its proponents that prohibition is a success, that it has obliterated drunkenness, that it has produced sobriety, that it has brought prosperity into the homes of all of the people of their States, that labor is now bearing its money home to the wife and to the children, and that this is a blessing we already possess. Of course, if that is true, the job has already been done, and there is nothing left to be done except to continue on in the good way that has brought these happy conditions.

We are told by another class of proponents of this amendment that prohibition is a farce; that for 10 long years it has been a farce; that prohibition has never been enforced; that it is altogether a failure; and that an honest attempt has not been made to enforce it.

Both of those statements can hardly be correct. They are just as far apart as two statements can be. Nobody can reconcile them.

If the latter proposition is true, if there has never been an honest attempt to enforce this law, then we should not be appropriating any money to-day to be dishonestly used by men who have dishonestly conducted the business in the past. I am not saying that the charge is correct that they have been dishonest. Those who make the charge that the law is not enforced have said that identical thing in substance and effect.

It must be pretty well understood that the same man will enforce this law in the future who has been enforcing it for the last eight years, Mr. Mellon. It is pretty well understood that he is to remain in his present position. If he does remain there, and if he has been dishonest in the past, if he has not tried to do his duty in the past, why give him $24,000,000 more so that he can have that much more money to improperly or improvidently waste? There does not seem to be much answer to that, in my judgment, although I have no doubt that somebody can make some kind of an answer that will be entirely outside of the issues we are discussing here now.

I can not understand that kind of logic myself. If it were conceded that the Secretary of the Treasury had been an honest and efficient man, and if it were conceded that prohibition had not been successful, and if the Secretary stood here and said to us, "I can expend a certain sum of money in addition to that which has been allotted to me, and can do it wisely and providently and economically," then we would have an argument to appeal to us to pass this amendment. But the Secretary does not take that position.

Before I discuss that phase of it for a moment, however, let me revert to the statement of the distinguished Senator from Tennessee [Mr. TYSON]. He takes the position that the law has not been enforced, and he charges, not once, but many times, in his address, that it is impossible to enforce it because we have not enough courts.

That is denied, and it is said we do have the courts. But assuming that the Senator from Tennessee is right, and that we do not have enough courts, and already the courts are overburdened with business, and are congested, so that they can not handle the business that is now before them, what is the use of creating more prohibition officers to bring more business to courts which already have more business than they can attend to, as he says?

Manifestly the first thing to do would be to create the additional courts, to prepare ourselves so that when money was appropriated in the future, something could be done to bring a result from the expenditure of that money, and hence we would first create the courts, and not create the business, and, having created the business, wait until some indefinite time in the future to create the courts.

Then comes the further question. I have been a Member of this body now for nearly 18 years. That has been a long time for the country to endure me, and for my brother Senators to put up with me. But in that time I have observed the wisdom of other Senators, if I have not always followed it, and this is the first time I have ever known Congress to be forcing an appropriation upon a department which the department said it did not need and did not want. If this bill passes, appropriating money to a department which the department says it does not need and is not prepared to expend, it will be the first time in the history of the Senate, I think, that such a bill has passed.

If we were to pass a bill containing such a provision as this, and no good results came, the Secretary of the Treasury could well say, "I told you in advance that we were not prepared to use this money, that we did not have the machinery, the necessary preliminary steps have not been taken, and you have simply given an additional amount of money with full knowledge of the fact that the department was not prepared to expend it."

I have one further observation. I am opposed to appropriating money for vague, uncertain, and indefinite purposes, and putting it into the hands of the President, or putting it into the hands of any person, to expend according to his own volition and notion. Twenty-five million dollars is a considerable sum of money. It must, however, be added to an expenditure already of $59,000,000, for while thirteen and a half is the direct appropriation, it is admitted that the real expenditure is $59,000,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The time of the Senator from Missouri has expired.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, I am inclined to believe that everyone has already made up his mind how he is going to vote with reference to this appropriation. Everyone who is opposed to the prohibition law and rejoices that it has not brought all the blessings its proponents had predicted will vote against the appropriation. There has never been a better time for anyone to go on record as favoring or disapproving prohibition, and Senators are going to vote according to their attitude toward the law. On the other hand, everybody who believes that the law itself is a good law, that prohibition is a blessing and not an evil, and that it can be enforced, is going to vote for the amendment.

Personally there are two reasons which would compel me to vote for it. In the first place, I believe prohibition is a blessing and not a curse. Secondly, I believe that the law can be enforced and will be enforced.

I believe that if there is no alibi we will see a very marked improvement in the enforcement of the law. If the money is provided under this amendment, it will not necessarily have to be expended if there is no demand for its expenditure. On the other hand, when the departments charged with the enforcement of the law are confronted with a situation which compels them to enforce the law or to admit their inefficiency—in other words, when they have no longer an alibi—we are going to see the law enforced.

I have no doubt but that the law can be enforced. I have no patience with anybody who says this is a law that can not be enforced. I know it can be enforced if the instrumentalities for enforcement are put into the hands of those who want to enforce it. There is no reason why this law can not be enforced as well as any other law, except for one thing. There is no other law on the statute books to which so many people who were either instrumental in putting it on the statute books, or are now charged with its enforcement, are always denouncing and decrying the efforts made to enforce it and predicting its failure.

I do not think the law has been enforced, and I do not believe there is a Senator on this floor who believes there has been an honest effort to enforce it. If there has not been an honest effort to enforce it, there is a reason for that failure.

The only thing we can do at this time is to supply every instrumentality, and then, if the officers charged with the enforcement of the law do not do their duty, we can take other steps, and we will do so.

I have no fault to find with the people—I do not care whether they are preachers or laymen—who express their convictions, whether they are expressed to the Secretary of the Treasury or to Congress or to the President of the United States, that the law is not being enforced and that there is a growing public opinion charging some people in high places with a failure to enforce the law because they are out of sympathy with it. Anybody out of office is just as much interested in this Government as is the man in office. He has just as much right to his opinion and just as much right to express his opinion and certainly ought not to be criticized if he expresses an honest opinion. He has the right to criticize the Congress if we shall fail to supply every instrumentality that may be required to enforce the law, and say, "I do not believe Congress is in sympathy with the law, I do not believe that Congress wants the law enforced," and I shall not fall out with him for so doing if we turn down this amendment. He has a perfect right to express his opinion that the present Secretary of the Treasury is out of sympathy with the enforcement of this law and is not trying to do so. He would have had a perfect right to so express himself with reference to the President if he felt that way about it.

There is no immunity in this country going with the holding of office. There is nobody that is above the honest criticism, the honest censure of the humblest man or woman that walks the earth. So far as I am concerned, I do not fall out with a man when he uses that right and uses it with all the vigor he possesses. I do not believe there is an honest effort to enforce the law and I do not believe there ever has been.

I do not believe there is any sympathy with the enforcement of the law upon the part of some people who have been charged with it, just as I know there is no sympathy with its enforcement among certain Members who sit here in the Senate and who have denounced the law. I have not any doubt in my mind that there are men in jail to-day who got their inspiration and courage to violate the law because they heard it denounced by men who helped to make it.

This is a good time to say at last that we are in sympathy with the law we have made. If the instrumentalities have not been supplied, let us supply them, and when they are supplied then if the men charged with law enforcement will not enforce it, let us put others in office who are in sympathy with the law, so that we will have the law enforced.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, we are on the eve of a new administration. I have faith in Herbert Hoover. The American people have faith in Herbert Hoover. In his address of acceptance of the Republican nomination for President, delivered at Palo Alto, Calif., he said:

> I recently stated my position upon the eighteenth amendment, which I again repeat. I do not favor the repeal of the eighteenth amendment. I stand for the efficient enforcement of the laws enacted thereunder. Whoever is chosen President has, under his oath, the solemn duty to pursue this course.
> Our country has deliberately undertaken a great social and economic experiment, noble in motive and far-reaching in purpose. It must be worked out constructively.
> Common sense compels us to realize that grave abuses have occurred, abuses which must be remedied. An organized searching investigation of fact and causes can alone determine the wise method of correcting them. Crime and disobedience of law can not be permitted to break down the Constitution and the laws of the United States.

We have been given to understand, Mr. President, that he proposes to bring about an exhaustive study and survey of the whole situation. Let us await the result of such study and survey, and to the end that that survey and study may be exhaustive and thorough and searching, I submit that we shall perform our duty fully at this hour if we approve of and adopt the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]; in a word, if we authorize the sum named in the Senator's proposed amendment, $250,000, for the purposes indicated.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I desire to present for the RECORD a little bit of information with reference to one phase of the prohibition question. I am not one of those who claim the law has been enforced in every detail or that it ever will be enforced in every detail. Nevertheless, I think it has been the most successful experiment in both an economic and a social way that we have ever undertaken in a national way in our country.

I think that the enforcement has not been what it should be. I am going to vote for the $24,000,000 amendment. I believe it should be used and used efficiently. I am not satisfied with the efficiency of the enforcement of the prohibition law, and the principal objection I have to that efficiency is the fact that a plan adequate to meet the situation has not been proposed or carried out by the Treasury Department. I think they have not been in sympathy with the prohibition law and have neglected it and not cared to enforce it as it should be.

While that is true, I realize at the same time that many of the charges against prohibition are groundless. I think one reason why we need more money is because some of the States have not complied with the mandate of the Constitution itself.

The eighteenth amendment puts the same obligation upon the State of Maryland to have an enforcement law that it places upon the Congress of the United States. Maryland has neglected that duty, but the people of Maryland are aroused to the situation. I have lived almost two years now out among the people of Maryland and they are on the dry side of the question. Those who are on the wet side who have not already been retired are going to be retired as fast as the people of Maryland get a chance at them.

Therefore, while the amendment should be adopted, I want to place in the RECORD a contradiction of some of the charges which have come here about the abuses of the use of liquor at this time. The claim is that drinking has increased in the colleges of the United States and that the young people are being debauched. I want to deny that statement. I say that they are in better condition and are living better and their purposes are higher than they have ever been at any other stage in the history of the United States. In support of that statement I submit an editorial from the Evening Journal of my home town, which contains a letter from Col. Morton C. Mumma, retired, of the Regular Army, who has had a long and intimate experience with college students among the universities of the country and who is able to speak as accurately as any man in the country of those conditions. I ask that the editorial incorporating the letter may be inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

[From the Washington (Iowa) Evening Journal, January 11, 1929]

DRINKING IN THE COLLEGES

In a recent issue of the Des Moines Register there appeared an article by Rupert Hughes on the subject "College Students Drinking Too Much," which many people read, no doubt, and it is equally probable that some of them were unduly impressed by the Hughes article. There are some people to-day, as there have been in all periods of our history, who think that the young people of "this day" are going to the dogs just as fast as they possibly can and faster than ever before. The only exception may be their own children.

Many of our older people who remember the past, as it was, do not agree to that proposition, however. They believe in the young folks of this day; believe that they are the best ever, and they are. Such a rule must prevail, generally, else civilization would die. But it prevails, anyway, to-day by reason of the fact that the average of people are much more reasonable, better hearted, wiser, more sympathetic, more considerate, less superstitious, clearer brained than ever before.

Mr. Hughes, in his article, saw great debauchery in the colleges. If he was in any of the same colleges 30 years ago, 25 years ago, 20 years ago he saw more, much more. But he may have forgotten, or he may be one of those who sees no beauty in any present, but has distorted remembrances of the past, or he may, possibly, have had contact with an exceptional institution only.

At any rate, a week later, in the same paper there appeared an article by Col. Morton C. Mumma, challenging Mr. Hughes's diagnosis of the "college" case. Colonel Mumma has had a rare opportunity to observe "drinking in colleges," as his article will explain. The following is his letter:

"I am surprised that you would publish the writing of Rupert Hughes which appeared in the Sunday Register of December 23 with the accepted caption 'College Students Are Drinking Too Much.' The illustration heading the article and the article itself in its entirety constitute a slander on the good name of American youth, and especially of those in our colleges and universities. I presume this article was accepted as news, but I have always been of the opinion that the essential of news is truth.

"I do not know the extent of either Mr. Hughes's contact with or observation of college men and women, but I am quite willing to match my own experience with his, and in so doing I say positively that he is either blind to the truth or is prostituting it to meet his own desires. For 28 years I have been an official at athletic contests, especially football and baseball, in the East and Middle West. Since the advent of prohibition my activities in this respect have been confined, with a few exceptions, to the western conference and the Missouri Valley. For 4 years before the war, and for nearly 10 years since, I have been a resident on a college campus and in an unusual way have been brought in close contact with student life. Since the war I have officiated in football games at which there were approximately 4,000,000 people in attendance. I have observed students and alumni on trains going to games, watched them while they were wending their way to the stadium, traveled on trains with them after games, stayed in hotels occupied by them before and after games, and attended a great many fraternity parties after games, and to generalize, as Mr. Hughes has done, by saying that 50 per cent of the college boys and their friends were more or less drunk is a slander that merits the utmost contempt.

"No matter how impossible it is to say just what percentage are noticeably under the influence of liquor I want to emphasize that in my judgment I have not seen an average of one person in a thousand in that condition out of the vast throngs I have carefully observed.

"A few years ago in an Ohio city a prize fight was scheduled between two nationally known contenders—one white, the other colored. This fight was only a few miles from a military camp which I commanded, and many from my command attended. Because I knew that a large contingent of colored people would be in attendance—Ohio near this locality has a large colored population—I went over, being apprehensive that there might be some trouble after the fight. I arrived early and took station just at the entrance where I observed practically every one of the 40,000 attending. I had several other officers and noncommissioned officers with me instructed to observe especially for evidence of liquor. Not one of us saw a single person in that prize-fight audience who could be positively marked as intoxicated. This never happened in the days prior to prohibition—in fact, liquor concessions would probably have been a part of the receipts.

"In liquor days I spent one racing season as a reporter for a racing paper, visiting all the tracks of the grand circuit.

"My duties involved a visit to the stable of every trotter and pacer in the program. Drinking and drunkenness were evident everywhere; liquor was openly sold under every grandstand.

"Since the war I have attended several meetings on the same circuit. Drinking from pocket flasks may still be seen, but drunkenness, especially among the employees of a stable, is so rare as to cause comment.

"But to get back to the objects of Mr. Hughes's attack: In all the cities and college towns in which I have officiated in big games there has been just one occasion in the last 10 years when the evidences of liquor were such as to give rise to an opinion even approximating that expressed by him in his article. In this instance as in all others where drinking has been noticeable the offenders were almost invariably from the ranks of alumni and not students. Of course I am not blind to the fact that some students do have liquor and use it at times to excess, but by comparison with liquor days the instances are so rare as to cause comment. In too many cases, also, the offenders are numbered among the so-called respectable class, men who, because of their wealth and social position, feel secure in their violation of the law. According to my observation by far the greater number of cases of excessive drinking will be found in hotel rooms after a game and on special trains returning from games and not among students on the campus or in the fraternity houses. I have known 15,000 students on the campus of the University of Iowa and not one-tenth of 1 per cent of them have used intoxicating liquor to the extent that it has been noticeable. As I said earlier in this letter I had an unusual opportunity to know the facts. Rupert Hughes's expressed opinion may be ascribed to one of the following: He has poor powers of observation; he has observed and written about a particular and exceptional occasion; he has distorted the facts for literary purposes; or like most antiprohibitionists has an utter disregard for facts in order to influence opinion. Probably all of these have influenced his scandalous article."

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, when the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] first offered his amendment I told him I would vote for it. Subsequently the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] offered an amendment which provided for a propaganda bureau in the Prohibition Department to which I am very much opposed. I wish to ask the Senator from Georgia now if his amendment as modified incorporates or retains the $250,000 for the propaganda work in that department?

Mr. HARRIS. My amendment strikes that out.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Does the Senator's amendment provide for any sum to maintain such a propaganda bureau in the Prohibition Bureau?

Mr. HARRIS. It does not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Georgia as modified.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll, and Mr. BARKLEY answered to his name.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, what is the exact question on which the vote is being taken?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS], as modified, to the amendment of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] to the committee amendment on page 16, line 16.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, if in order I would like to have the amendment read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by Mr. JONES as a substitute for the committee amendment on page 16——

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire will state the point of order.

Mr. MOSES. The roll call having been begun and a Senator having answered to his name, the roll call can not be interrupted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be stated, so that we may know what we are voting on. I understood that we were about to vote on the amendment of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES].

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is the amendment of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS]. The clerk will proceed with the roll call.

The Chief Clerk resumed the call of the roll.

Mr. COPELAND (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. If he were present, he would vote "nay." If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. GLASS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] and vote "yea."

Mr. NORRIS (when Mr. HOWELL's name was called). My colleague the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] is detained from the Senate on account of illness.

Mr. BLAINE (when Mr. LA FOLLETTE's name was called). My colleague [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is unavoidably absent on account of illness.

Mr. BRATTON (when Mr. LARRAZOLO's name was called). My colleague [Mr. LARRAZOLO] is absent from the Chamber on account of illness.

Mr. RANSDELL (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON]. If he were present, he would vote "nay." If I were permitted to to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON]. If he were present, I am informed he would vote "nay," and if I were allowed to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JONES. I wish to announce that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] is necessarily absent on account of illness. If he were present, he would vote "nay." He is paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY].

I also wish to announce that if the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. LARRAZOLA] were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] is necessarily detained from the Senate by illness.

The result was announced—yeas 50, nays 27, as follows:

So the amendment of Mr. HARRIS in the nature of a substitute for the amendment of Mr. JONES to the amendment of the committee was agreed to, as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by Mr. JONES as a substitute for the committee amendment, on page 16, beginning in line 16, insert the following:

"For increasing the enforcement force, $24,000,000, or such part thereof as the President may deem useful, to be allocated by the President, as he may see fit, to the departments or bureaus charged with the enforcement of the national prohibition act and to remain available until June 30, 1930."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the so-called Jones amendment as amended, proposed as a substitute for the committee amendment.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is now on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I gave notice of an amendment which I present now as an independent provision of the bill, to follow the amendment which has just been adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. To be inserted in the bill after the amendment which has just been agreed to, it is proposed to insert the following:

For the purposes of a thorough inquiry into the problem of prohibition under the provisions of the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution, and laws enacted in pursuance thereof, $250,000, or as much thereof as may be required, to be expended under authority and by direction of the President of the United States, who shall make report of the result of such investigation to the Congress together with his recommendations with respect thereto, said sum to be available until June 30, 1930.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. REED of Missouri. There is a division of opinion among Senators as to whether we have adopted simply the Harris amendment, in the nature of a substitute, or have adopted the Harris amendment and also the Jones amendment, so that both appropriations stand.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Harris amendment was offered as a substitute for the Jones amendment.

Mr. REED of Missouri. Then it is substituted for it, and that is the amendment which stands.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, and ask that it may be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 16, line 9, it is proposed to strike out the proviso contained in lines 9 to 15 and in lieu thereof to insert:

Provided, That section 3220 of the Revised Statutes (title 26, sec. 149, p. 737, U. S. C.), as amended by act of Congress on May 29, 1928, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3220. In case of any claim filed with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue before the approval of this amendatory act for refund, credit, or abatement of income, war-profits, excess-profits, estate, or gift taxes, or other internal-revenue taxes (whether such claim arises from illegality of assessment, of collection, of penalties, or of unjust or excessive taxation), the commissioner, under rules prescribed by the United States Board of Tax Appeals, shall, upon final action by him upon the claim, certify the claim to the board where the commissioner recommends a refund, credit, or abatement, and where the amount claimed or recommended for allowance is more than $10,000. The commissioner, under rules prescribed by the board, shall also certify with such claim all papers and proof in reference to such claim, with his recommendation and reasons therefor, in such form and manner as the board may by rule require. Where the amount claimed is more than $10,000, should the commissioner not recommend the refund, credit, or abatement in the amount claimed, the taxpayer shall have the right to institute, by petition to the board within such time as the board shall by rule prescribe, a proceeding for the determination of the claim, and in such cases the commissioner shall, upon order of the board, certify to the board the papers, proof, and recommendation and reasons therefor as above specified. The board shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine on the merits any claim certified to the board by the commissioner or instituted before the board by the taxpayer under this paragraph in the same manner as is provided for in cases of deficiencies, with the right of either the commissioner or the taxpayer to submit additional proof.

"Any such claim made after the approval of this amendatory act shall, where the amount claimed is more that $10,000, be instituted, within the period of limitation provided by law, only by petition for refund and/or credit or abatement filed by the taxpayer with the board. The board shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the claim on the merits in the same manner as is provided for in cases of deficiencies; and in such cases the commissioner shall, upon order of the board, certify to the board all papers and proof in reference to the claim in such form and manner as the board may by rule require.

"The jurisdiction of the board under this section shall be concurrent with the Federal courts, and any judgment of the board determining any claim under this section shall be final unless within six months the taxpayer or the commissioner has filed a petition for a review of such judgment of the board in such manner as is provided for in cases of deficiencies.

"All judgments or decrees of a court or of the board for the refund of internal-revenue taxes, and all judgments of any court against any collector or deputy collector for any internal-revenue tax collected by him and the costs and expense of the suit, and all judgments for damages and costs recovered against any assessor, assistant assessor, collector, deputy collector, agent, or inpector in any suit against him by reason of anything done in the due performance of his official duty, shall be certified to the Congress for payment.

"All claims, whether filed before or after the approval of this amendatory act, for credit and/or refund, or abatement of income, war-profits, excess-profits, estate, or gift taxes, or other internal-revenue taxes, or penalties in connection therewith, illegally assessed or collected, or for refund of such taxes unjustly assessed, or excessive, or wrongfully collected, shall, where the amount claimed is not more than $10,000, be determined by the commissioner, and any refund, credit, or abatement therein shall be made by him, under regulations prescribed by the board.

"At the beginning of each regular session of Congress the commissioner shall make a report to the Congress, by internal-revenue districts and alphabetically arranged, of all refunds and credits authorized by him in excess of $500, and the board shall make a like report, with its findings and orders, of all refunds and credits or abatements authorized by it."

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, this amendment for the present is offered under a suspension of the rules, of which I have already given notice, and I propose now to discuss the matter with that statement.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will.

Mr. WARREN. Of course the Senator knows very well that this amendment would have to be ruled out of order, as it is legislation.

Mr. McKELLAR. I know nothing of the kind.

Mr. WARREN. It proposes to alter laws already on the statute books having nothing whatever to do with the appropriations, so that it could not be considered in connection with the bill that is now before us. It has not been properly passed upon by any committee. It is merely a measure which the Senator introduced originally as a bill, and which he has since changed and put in the form of an amendment. As I have said, it has not been before the committee at all.

I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, because I understand that he proposes to move to suspend the rules.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A two-thirds vote is required on a motion to suspend the rules. The point of order lies against the amendment as general legislation. The Chair will hold that it is general legislation.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have offered the amendment under a suspension of the rules. When I offer it as an amendment not under a suspension of the rules I hope the Chair will permit the matter to be ruled upon at that time, and not now.

Mr. President and Senators, for a number of years I have sought in some way to correct the abuses that have grown up about tax refunds, and I desire to explain to you very briefly the situation as it is disclosed by the evidence.

The other day, when this matter came before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, I secured the attendance of Mr. Blair and the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Bond, and Mr. Parker, connected with the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, and took their testimony; and upon their testimony I want to speak to you now about what is contained in this amendment, and the reasons for the amendment.

It has been constantly stated by the Treasury Department for a number of years that the collections from additional assessments were about four times what was paid out in tax refunds. Instead of that being the fact, I find that during the last eight years there has been collected on reassessments in round numbers $3,900,000,000, while during the same period there has been paid out by the Internal Revenue Department in tax refunds, in credits—which means exactly the same thing—or in abatements—which means exactly the same thing—the stupendous sum of about $3,300,000,000. In other words, without regard to the cost of the collection of these reassessments, there has been about $600,000,000 difference between the entire amount collected and the entire amount paid out to favorite taxpayers during those eight years.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do.

Mr. SWANSON. Do I understand that over $3,000,000,000 was improperly assessed against the taxpayers, and subsequently remitted? I should like to have an investigation of this kind, and I hope the Senator will amend his proposal so as to cover it, because I should like to vote for it. I think one of the worst features of this matter is the reckless, lawless way in which the representatives of the Treasury Department make assessments against people and compel them to hire lawyers to defend themselves against unjust taxes. If three billions of these taxes were imposed and then remitted, one of two wrongs has been done: Either they were unjustly imposed, and the taxpayer was oppressed, or they were improperly remitted.

I should like to see a more honest and better assessment of taxes; and I should like to have the Senator amend his proposal so as to cover that matter.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator from Virginia will be just a little patient with me, I think I can demonstrate that he ought to vote for the measure that is proposed. I know he will agree, and I believe every Senator here will agree, that these abuses that have arisen in the Internal Revenue Department ought to be corrected.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope the Senator will let me go on for the present.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, adverting to what the Senator from Tennessee has just said, may I inquire whence he derives the figures he has given?

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be delighted to tell the Senator. I can not say it all in one word; but I have it here on the indisputable evidence of the Treasury officials themselves—notably, Mr. Bond, the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury in charge of refunds, and Mr. Blair, the head of the department.

Mr. GLASS. I do not find it in the testimony, and I have read every word of it. I am a member of the subcommittee, but was unavoidably absent from the meeting at which this matter came up. Therefore I put myself to the pains of reading every word of the testimony.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am afraid the Senator did not get all of it. The Senator will recall that Mr. Bond was to give us certain additional information. What came out before the committee, let me say to the Senate, was this:

Mr. Blair and Mr. Bond both admitted that $935,000,000 had been paid back in cash to taxpayers up to 1928. So much for that. I then called upon Mr. Bond for further information and I hope the Senate will bear with me while I read a very short letter. This letter is dated January 11, immediately after the hearings before the committee:

Hon. H. H. BOND,

Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. BOND: I will be greatly obliged if you will send me down by special messenger in the morning a list of all those who have been allowed credits or abatements of taxes during the years from 1920 to date.

Notice, "from 1920 to date."

I have been reliably informed that there is such a list already compiled in your department, and I know it will not be much trouble. Of course, I want the amounts. If, under your interpretation of the law, you are unwilling to give me the names of the taxpayers to whom abatements, credits, or depletions have been allowed, I will be glad if you will give me the amounts of these credits, abatements, or depletions by year; in other words, the total amount from 1920 up to date.

I am sure from what I have been informed and from what I know about the necessity of the department for having such information for the Director of the Budget that the figures are available.

Your immediate attention to this will greatly oblige.

Very sincerely yours,

KENNETH MCKELLAR.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator pardon me for just a moment? I want to get these facts before the Senate.

I now have from Mr. Bond the figures as to the credits allowed. I want to call the attention of the Senate, however, to the fact that he starts in 1923 and winds up in 1928. He did not start in 1920, as I asked him to do. I am just going to read the millions in dealing with these figures. I will not go into the thousands and hundreds.

Mr. GLASS. I suggest that the Senator just give us the totals.

Mr. McKELLAR. There is another reason for giving them. This is very short:

1923, $306,000,000 in credits.
1924, $355,000,000 in credits.
1925, $226,000,000 in credits.
1926, $339,000,000 in credits.
1927, $262,000,000 in credits.
1928, $199,000,000 in credits.

The total of those six years is the stupendous sum of $1,679,000,000, which, by a simple calculation, added to the cash refunds, amounts to the enormous sum of $2,614,000,000.

Now I call your attention to the fact that the figures for 1921 and 1922 are not given. I call your attention to this further statement in the memorandum inclosed by Mr. Bond in his letter, from which I read:

It will be noted that in the latter years there has been a substantial reduction in the abatements and credits.

In other words, the 1923 abatements were $306,000,000. In 1928 the amount was $199,000,000. The Assistant Secretary seized upon that fact to indicate—though some of the amounts for other years in between were greater—that the amounts toward the end were less. If we will take 1921, and assume that they paid out the same amounts in 1921 and 1922 that they paid out in 1923, that will add over $600,000,000 more to this fund, which will produce the figure of about $3,300,000,000.

I stop here long enough to say that ever since this law went into effect the department has honeycombed this whole Nation with tax gatherers examining into the returns of every taxpayer in this country, from the smallest to the highest perhaps. They have gone over them with a fine-tooth comb; and one of the things that make the income tax law unpopular is the fact that this horde of tax gatherers are going out through the country——

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I decline to yield at this time. I will yield a little later to the chairman of the committee.

This horde of taxgatherers have been going out through the country examining into the income-tax returns of every business man, every corporation, every individual; and after examining them they have reassessed and collected $3,900,000,000, and they have paid out in secret, Senators—paid out in secret by committees in the Treasury Department that nobody knows——

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him? I wish to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. McKELLAR. I very much prefer to go on, because I do not expect to take a great deal of time, but I do want to explain this situation to the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. I simply desire to make a suggestion. The Senator made some remark about the witnesses who came before us.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope the Senator will not go into that now. I am going to quote their testimony in so many words.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will not yield, of course, I will not interrupt him. I simply wanted to ask a question.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be very glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. WARREN. I want to know if those witnesses who came before us acted the part of gentlemen and officers, and if they were open and frank in every way except where the law did not permit them to give figures?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am making no criticism of the two witnesses at all. I think very highly of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. I had never met Mr. Bond before, but I think very highly of him. What I object to is the infamous system of secrecy, the system itself, not the individuals. I want it distinctly understood that I am not making charges against individuals. What I am attempting to do is to show the Senate and the country the outrageous system of making secret returns to taxpayers, which none of us know anything about, and are not permitted to know about.

Let me call attention to what is asked here now. The department asks for an additional appropriation of $75,000,000, an emergency fund, to pay these refunds for the balance of the year. We have already given them $130,000,000 this year. They said they had $22,000,000 left, and were paying it out so rapidly that between now and July they would need $75,000,000 more. I said, "Mr. Bond, what are the reasons for these refunds amounting to $75,000,000?" "I can not tell you."

"What claims have you to pay?" "I can not tell you."

"Mr. Blair, what claims do you propose to pay out of this $75,000,000?" "I am not permitted to tell you. The law prohibits me from telling you."

Think of it, Senators, they come and get a regular appropriation of $130,000,000 to pay out secretly in refunds, and then come back for an emergency appropriation of $75,000,000, to be paid out in like manner, and yet they are not willing to tell the Senate what claims are to be paid, and why they are paying that money out. Is it possible we are going to keep that up?

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield now for me to make a correction?

Mr. McKELLAR. I would rather go on and explain the matter, but if the Senator desires to ask me a question, of course, as the Senator from Utah is a member of the committee, and I am very fond of him, I will yield to him.

Mr. SMOOT. I wonder if other Senators got the impression I did from the statement the Senator made, that these were refunds on taxes beginning with 1920, and running through 1921, 1922, 1923, and 1924?

Mr. McKELLAR. I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator must know that all of these refunds come from 1917.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; they come all the way through the years from 1917. I am glad the Senator has asked the question, and I would like to answer it. I will take the year 1917 and give the Senate a concrete example. In the year 1917——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the Senator from Tennessee has the floor and that the Senator is entitled to proceed with his remarks without conversation on the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope Senators will not indulge in conversation so that I can explain this matter which is very important. It is the most important matter that has come before the Senate this year, or any other year. No such enormous amount, in actual value, can be imagined. When I tell Senators that the secret rebates and credits which have been made in the last eight years amount to more than the entire value of every shred of property in the State of Louisiana, including New Orleans, including real estate, and every other kind of property, they will realize what this means. The entire wealth of the State of Louisiana is about $3,000,000,000, and the amount that has been paid out in the last eight years is over $3,000,000,000.

When I tell Senators that the entire wealth of the State of Alabama is less than $3,000,000,000, and that the amount which has been paid out in rebates is more than $3,000,000,000, they will realize what sort of a question is involved.

The question involves an enormous amount of credits and cash—and the credits are just exactly the same as cash—paid out secretly by the department. Mr. Blair, an honest man, as I believe him to be, said exceedingly frankly, "I never pass upon a claim"; and he does not. He did not know anything about any claim. There was not one case he claimed to know anything about. It is not the head of the bureau but clerks in the bureau who pass upon the claims, and I want to give a concrete example.

In the year 1917 the United Steel Corporation made its own voluntary tax return. Let us not forget the date; it made a voluntary tax return in 1917. I do not know what that return was; we can not find out. A Senator is not permitted to know. A Senator can not find out what they paid from that hermetically sealed department. But let us assume, for the sake of the argument, that the United States Steel Corporation voluntarily came forward and paid half a billion dollars in taxes of all kinds that year. I do not know what they paid; I am merely guessing at it and using that amount for the sake of the argument. They made a voluntary return. We suppose they made an honest return.

In 1919, two years later, what happened? The return was examined later on in the department—in the solicitor's office of the department, according to the testimony of Mr. Blair and Mr. Bond—and they found that mistakes had been made, and that the United States Steel Corporation should be assessed $7,000,000 more. They paid that, and I believe the record shows—I will not be absolutely sure about it—that they paid it without protest.

Mr. GLASS. No; the record shows that they paid it under protest.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think not; but that is immaterial. About a year later the department again reassessed the United States Steel Corporation $6,000,000 more, and they paid that.

Mr. NORRIS. The same year?

Mr. McKELLAR. A year later, but for the same year.

Mr. NORRIS. That is what I mean.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not talking about anything else but the year 1917. In 1920 they reassessed it $320,000 again for the same year, 1917, and they paid that. In 1921 they reassessed it the fourth time, and they paid that fourth reassessment. Those several assessments amounted to $17,000,000. No claim for a refund was made as to that year then, either on the original investment or on the subsequent assessment—in the aggregate amounting to $17,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. The assessments were paid under protest, and they paid them because if they had not done so they would have had to pay 6 per cent interest.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator may have private information, but there is nothing in the record about it.

Mr. GLASS. Right on that point I want to ask the Senator if he does not consider it a frightful indictment of the efficiency of the Internal Revenue Bureau that it takes all these years and all these different assessments to determine what ought to be the tax assessed against a great corporation.

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree with the Senator; but I have something that is so much more important than that at this minute that I want to give it to the Senate, if I may.

Mr. GLASS. I do not think there is anything more important than that the Internal Revenue Bureau shall accurately assess taxes against taxpayers and acquit them of their responsibility to the Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. In the erudite words of that distinguished statesman, Al Jolson, "You ain't heard nothing yet."

Mr. President and Senators, at the time those four assessments were paid there were five men in the solicitor's department. I do not know what the facts are, but Mr. Bond and Mr. Blair both testified, as appears in the record, that these claims were settled in the solicitor's office, as it was called then; it is now the general counsel's office. They testified. I do not know whether it is so or not, because it is hermetically sealed so far as I am concerned; but that is the testimony. There were five men in that department at that time. One was a Mr. Service, one was a Mr. King, one was a Mr. Cardwell, and they are still in that department. A fourth one was a Mr. Wayne Johnson, who was then the solicitor, or part of the time was the solicitor. Another one was a Mr. Alverson, who was his assistant.

On September 25, 1920, as I remember the date, Mr. Johnson resigned his office, and Mr. Alverson resigned a few days later; and on February 25, four or five months afterwards, those two gentlemen were admitted to the practice of law in the Treasury Department. In 1923, apparently when the two years had expired when they might file such claims of all the United States Steel Co.'s attorneys in this country, Mr. Wayne Johnson, formerly the solicitor, when these assessments were made, and Mr. Alverson, brought suit for the United States Steel Corporation to recover the $17,000,000 of additionally assessed taxes, with interest thereon, and also to recover, I believe, a hundred million dollars of the voluntary assessments and payments of taxes made by the company in the first instance.

Mr. CARAWAY. Did I understand the Senator to say that these were the men who made the assessments?

Mr. McKELLAR. They were in charge of that department. I am assuming that Mr. Bond and Mr. Blair testified to the truth, and I believe they did.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will wait one minute, I will get to the matter.

Mr. SMOOT. I have the dates here, and Mr. Wayne Johnson——

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Wayne Johnson sent a telegram here denying what Mr. Bond and Mr. Blair had sworn to. I do not know which is right. Mr. Wayne Johnson himself said they had nothing to do with the original assessments or reassessments. Whether they did or not, I am not advised, and I can not say. I am going on the record made by these two gentlemen.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Referring to the interrogation addressed to the Senator by the Senator from Arkansas, I do not understand that the solicitor's office would have anything to do with the assessment in the first instance.

Mr. McKELLAR. The reassessments; oh, no.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Or the reassessments.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know, but that is what Mr. Blair and Mr. Bond testified to, and I will read the testimony in a few minutes.

Let us see what happened. Here were five men in that bureau, in the solicitor's office, if you please, in the general counsel's office, if you please, and two of them became lawyers and the other three became the judges. The three—Mr. Service and Mr. King and Mr. Cardwell—became the committee which passed on these claims.

This is what happened: From 1923 to 1928 those claims were being tried before the department, and at the same time lawsuits were being brought in the Court of Claims for, I think, $150,000,000.

In 1928 this committee of three made an allowance. What testimony they had nobody knows; we could not find out. It was against the rules to tell us and against the law, they said. They allowed $15,000,000 principal out of the $17,000,000.

Mr. President, I should like to have a little order in the Chamber. I have a good, strong voice and I ask Senators to bear with me a little while. I assure them I am not talking against time. I am trying honestly and sincerely to lay the facts before the Senate as they appeared in the hearing. Will not Senators listen for a few minutes? If they want to uphold this secret method of paying out these enormous sums of money, it is no matter of mine. I can stand it as well as anybody in the Nation, but I would like to go on for a few minutes and at least lay the facts before the Senate.

These three men paid $15,000,000 out of the $17,000,000 reassessment and then gave them $11,000,000 more interest, amounting to $26,000,000. But is that all? Not at all. They went back and ripped up the voluntary assessment, and they allowed a credit on subsequent years to the Steel Co. of $28,000,000 more and $3,000,000 more in interest, making a grand total of $57,000,000 at one time for one year. The year 1918 has not been settled yet, and they have a claim of $50,000,000 to settle on similar grounds.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I would like to ask a little explanation on that point.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am very glad to yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. As I understand the Senator, he spoke about a voluntary assessment?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is, the Steel Co. returned that they were obligated to pay so much?

Mr. McKELLAR. And paid it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And without any protest on their part at all?

Mr. McKELLAR. They did not seem to know whether there was a protest.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The department looked it over and said, "You have reported too much and are entitled to a refund"?

Mr. McKELLAR. Ten years afterwards.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, if that were so, why should not the department say, "You are entitled to so much"? If the Commissioner of Internal Revenue or his agents assess me $50,000 of taxes and thereafter find that they have taken $10,000 of my money to which the Government is not entitled, why should not they voluntarily return it to me?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. They should; but that is not the situation, as I understand it from the statement now made by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator pardon me a moment? I want to say that in making this argument I am not against the Government returning every dollar that it has unjustly or unlawfully taken from a taxpayer. It is the secret method to which I am objecting.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the law.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is being done secretly, with nobody, not even the Congress of the United States, having the power to find out about what the $75,000,000 is.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator wants to have it done in the open.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to have it done in the open and not in secret.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. How many times was the assessment for 1917 audited?

Mr. McKELLAR. Four times, according to the record.

Mr. GLASS. And that is the very system that I say is the vice of the whole thing.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is one of the vices.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Does the Senator remember within what period those several audits occurred?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will give the Senator the exact dates. I asked the witnesses that very question and can give the Senator the dates. The first of the audits was made on December 29, 1919, for $7,190,165.71. The second was made December 30, 1920, for $6,369,497.75; the third on February 14, 1921, for $167,073.30; and the fourth on August 29, 1921, for $4,000,000. These aggregated $17,000,000 plus. They were audited evidently by the department on four different occasions and each time they were audited an additional amount was required and an additional amount was paid.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. What explanation was made of the successive allowances?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Just a moment, if the Senator please.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be glad to answer that question in just a moment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It has been quite a considerable period since I read this case, but my recollection is that in subsequent years several audits were made of the same assessment—perhaps in 1924, though I am not sure.

Mr. McKELLAR. They have been audited ever since, and the final credit and return by way of credit was $28,000,000, with $3,000,000 of interest, applicable on taxes for subsequent years—and credits are just the same as money—a total of $150,000,000 principal and $11,000,000 interest on reassessments.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What I would like to understand is what explanation is given by the authorities in charge for the repeated audits, and why one audit should not have been sufficient to determine the issue.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let me explain just what they said.

Mr. GLASS. If I may answer the Senator from Arkansas right there, the reason was that at that time the system of income tax was new, just inaugurated, and the Bureau of Internal Revenue had to establish here in Washington a school to teach auditors how to audit accounts. That school, as I recall, was maintained perhaps for more than two years, and hundreds of persons had to be taught how to assess taxes and how to audit accounts.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That does not reach the question I had in mind. As I recall it a suit was brought and was pending in court—in fact, I think it had gone to the Supreme Court of the United States—involving the issues respecting the taxes for 1917 of the United States Steel Corporation.

Mr. McKELLAR. So far as the record is concerned, it does not show that there was anything done with the suit except to bring it for a large amount in the Court of Claims. I suppose it is intended to dismiss it now though I do not know. We can not tell anything about it. They may prosecute the suit and get another refund. Who knows?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Were there changes made in 1924?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; not in 1924. The first audit was made in 1919, and they called that an office audit and gave that as a reason for the new audit. Now I want to call attention to another remarkable part of this so-called refund system. Here is what Mr. Bond testified:

> Every large corporation knew that before its tax matters were finally closed its books would be audited with the greatest care and the work reviewed and their tax finally determined on the basis of those facts.

In another place he said that up to this good hour the moment one of the large corporations pays its taxes on its own assessment it at the same time files a petition for a tax refund. It has gone into the tax-refund business. It just continues to keep after them year by year until 10 years afterwards, in the case of the 1917 tax, it was still after them.

There is another element about the tax refund of 1917 that I want to call to the attention of Senators. There were about $12,000,000, including principal and interest, paid out in violation of the Secretary's own regulations in the matter, and admittedly so as shown by the record, $7,000,000 in principal and $5,000,000 in interest. The reason they gave for it was this—and the only reason why we have any facts about it is that this was the one, single, and only case that ever went to the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. O Mr. President!

Mr. McKELLAR. It is only one that they have ever passed on, then.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator means it is the only one they have commented on.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will give it to the Senator exactly in a moment.

Mr. GLASS. That shows, if the Senator will permit me, that the joint congressional committee is not worth a thrip.

Mr. McKELLAR. I tried to get the Senator not to vote for it at the time.

Mr. GLASS. I do not know that I did.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Does not the Senator know that every refund involving $75,000 or more has gone to the joint committee since that act was passed?

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, and let me tell the Senator how it is done. They have an agent and, by the way, he is a very delightful gentleman, and, I think, a man of some ability, too, a Mr. Parker.

Mr. WARREN. I hope the Senator will answer the question of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am going to do it. Of course, I am going to do it. I have not the slightest notion of not doing it.

Mr. Parker is an agent of the committee. All these questions come to him and he says he has no authority to do anything with them. The matter comes to him and he looks at it and can make any suggestion he wants. But the Steel Corporation the last time, early in December, just last month, when its claim was before the committee, for some unaccountable reason brought about a different situation. I think Mr. GARNER is subject to the severest reprimand on the part of the House and the Senate and the department and everybody else, because he was inquisitive enough to ask something about it. He violated all the rules, of course, but he did. He was an inquisitive man and asked something about it, and Mr. Parker told him something about it, and in that way the horrible secret got out.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. Just a moment, please, because I am answering the Senator's question. I was examining Mr. Potter.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. Eresident, will the Senator permit me to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania a question about the point?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. How many times has that tax assessment for 1917 been audited, if the Senator knows?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It has been one continuous audit for about nine years. The file in the case in the Bureau of Internal Revenue occupies hundreds of thousands of pages. The final settlement letter rendered last year covers 2,700 pages.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Does the Senator remember how many times it was said to have been audited and changes made in the assessment?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes; it was at least five times.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That was my recollection.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. In the first place, let me explain——

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I will get to that in a moment. I will yield to the Senator later to let him explain it. I want to read from the evidence now:

Senator McKELLAR. What cases are there now amounting to over $75,000—refunds of over $75,000—that are before the committee or that have been transmitted to your committee by the bureau?

Mr. PARKER. I am under the same limitations about naming those cases.

He could not name them because they were secret.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the law.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; that is the law. The Senator from Utah helped to enact the law——

Mr. SMOOT. So did the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Hermetically sealing the Bureau of Internal Revenue in so far as any reports are concerned. I continue reading from the record:

Senator McKELLAR. Well, can you give me how many there are? Can you give me the number of them? If the name is so sacred, let us have the number.

Mr. PARKER. After all, they are coming up while I am sitting here. I can give you the number as of a certain date, or how many we have received up to a certain date.

Senator McKELLAR. Now, how in the name of Heaven has the United States Steel Corporation's name been given—how did it leak out; how did the people get hold of its name with regard to this matter, when the other names are so carefully preserved, except as to the Tobacco Co.? How in the world did you gentlemen ever let those two names of those two concerns get out?

Mr. BOND. Because Mr. GARNER got upon the floor and described the whole case. I do not say that in criticism, but because you ask the question.

Senator McKELLAR. Well, that is awful on Mr. GARNER's part, I should imagine. I think that he ought to be dealt with. I am speaking ironically, of course. I want the record to show that.

I spoke ironically a few moments ago. I think Mr. GARNER has performed a great patriotic service in his efforts in this matter to prevent a continuance of such a secret system of tax refunds.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. Let me finish reading the extract and then I will yield.

So it was due to Mr. GARNER that those two names got out. It was over your protest, I suppose?

Mr. PARKER. No, sir; but Mr. GARNER is a member of this committee. Mr. GARNER has a right to see our records. He has a different standing from all others, except members of our committee, so far as our records are concerned.

Senator McKELLAR. He had a right to see any of these records?

Mr. PARKER. Yes.

Senator McKELLAR. Then it was not such a heinous offense to Mr. GARNER to disclose the names of these two concerns (pp. 42 and 43)?

Senator McKELLAR. Are hearings on these tremendous sums held and are they open to the public?

So we find that the principal case—I will speak of the Tobacco case in a few moments—is that of the United States Steel Co. It has claims for tax refunds, I suppose, for all the years, according to this testimony, from 1918. It has been testified that it had a claim for $50,000,000 for 1918.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I promised to yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania; then I will yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, the Senator said that he did not know how the committee happened to take up the Steel Corporation case, and then he proceeded to guess that it was because Mr. GARNER had insisted upon it.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I did not guess at all; I quoted from the testimony.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I can show the Senator how the committee happened to take up the case. Mr. Parker, who had carefully investigated all the claims for refunds as they were turned over to the joint committee, with much more skill than any member of the committee could do it, came to this one, and thought it was so big and so important that he ought not to take the responsibility for it, and he suggested, very properly to the chairman, Mr. HAWLEY, that he call a meeting of the joint committee in order to learn the facts.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Parker is to be commended for his action and it might have been a great pity that he had not called the attention of the committee to other cases, but evidently he did not do it, because this was the only claim of all the claims with which the joint committee undertook to deal. It considered the matter, I believe, for two days, according to the testimony, and at the end of that time left the matter where it was; it paid no further attention to it.

Mr. HAWLEY wrote a letter and said it was the unofficial opinion, I believe, of the committee, or the sense of the committee, that the bureau might as well go through with the claim, and that it might as well be allowed. The joint committee took no vote on it; they made no revision of it; they did not do anything with it except to express that sort of vague, indefinite opinion through the chairman of the committee, Mr. HAWLEY.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. O Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to interrupt him, we had a very fully attended meeting of the joint committee for two days in succession, but no member was willing to offer a motion that this claim be disapproved. The Treasury said flatly that if our committee disapproved the settlement they would turn it down and force the case to go through to judgment in the Court of Claims, but no member of the committee, Republican or Democrat, was willing to offer such a resolution of disapproval. I am sure I was not.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. In the very nature of things could a joint congressional committee dealing occasionally with tax assessments be supposed to know as much about them as the accredited trained auditors of the Treasury Department? Therefore what is the use of the joint congressional committee?

Mr. McKELLAR. There is none whatever.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Because we might have had a doubt about it after the very full and frank explanation that was given to us and after a study by our experts, and if we had any doubt about it we would have expressed that doubt, and then the claim would have gone to suit. They told us flatly they would not make settlement if we had any doubt about it.

Mr. GLASS. It is to be conceived that the one expert of the joint committee knows more about the intricacies, the difficulties, and the insuperable perplexities of tax assessments than the officials who are employed by the Government and trained for that very work?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes. Mr. Parker is one of the ablest men in the United States on questions of internal revenue taxation.

Mr. GLASS. Why does not the bureau hire him then and stop all these difficulties?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Because we do not want to let go of him.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. This is a public fight.

Mr. McKELLAR. No, Mr. President; it is not a public fight.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee has yielded to me. I presume that one of the purposes of having the expert to whom the Senator has referred is to afford a check on the proceedings of the department?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Absolutely, and we chose him because of his conspicuously fine work with the Couzens committee. Nobody could think that Mr. Parker was prejudiced in favor of the Treasury Department. He has rendered us loyal, faithful, and able service.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, since there has been some question raised, let us see what was the opinion of the joint committee. I will give it to the Senate. I read the following letter:

Washington, December 19, 1928—

I hope the Senator from Virginia will listen to this.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I have read every line of it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad the Senator has done so.

Hon. DAVID H. BLAIR,
Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Treasury Department,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. COMMISSIONER—

This letter was written by Mr. HAWLEY, chairman of the joint committee—

The Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation at two sessions held on December 17, 1928,—

The committee did not hold meetings on two days, as I thought, but two sessions on that one day—considered some of the problems involved in arriving at the tax liability of the United States Steel Corporation for the year 1917, with special reference to the computation of the consolidated invested capital.

After considering the statements of your representatives, the preponderant opinion of the members of the committee was that the committee should not interfere with your bureau—

They did not pass on the claim—in the determination made and the refund proposed.

The staff of the committee is still engaged in making certain mathematical checks of this case. If any questions arise in connection with such checks, they will be taken up in the usual way before the expiration of the 30-day period.

Very truly yours,

W. C. HAWLEY.

Just when that period began I do not know, but it was on the 19th of December when the letter was written, and during the early part of the present month the hearings were held——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. Let me finish what I am about to say, and I will yield to the Senator in a few moments. Let me get the exact date of the hearing. It was on January 9, 20 days after the letter had been written, and then the amount had been paid. It was a rush case, an emergency case; as soon as Mr. HAWLEY said "Go ahead" the money went out of the Treasury.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Tennessee and other Senators for just a moment.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will be glad to listen to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. We are now considering the most important proposition that we have had before us in connection with this bill. It is long past the time to quit; most of the Senators have gone to dinner; we ought not to expect to dispose of a matter such as this with the slim attendance we have here. It seems to me we ought either to take a recess or adjourn until to-morrow.

Mr. McKELLAR. I may say I will be very happy to have that done. I should like very much if this matter could go over until to-morrow.

Mr. WARREN. Surely we can take a few moments more to complete the work on this bill.

Mr. NORRIS. We can not complete this work this evening.

Mr. McKELLAR. It would be impossible to do that.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Tennessee is not anywhere near through, and are those of us who remain going to vote blindly on this question without hearing it fully debated and having all the facts brought out? I do not want to interfere with the procedure, but it seems to me it is unreasonable to expect to proceed with this discussion this evening. Senators are talking among themselves—the few who are present—and wondering why we are going on with this farce, with practically no Senators here, and a question involving $75,000,000 or $80,000,000 in taxes before the Senate by an amendment which, if agreed to, will bring about a very important change in our tax-collecting system.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, this amendment has really nothing to do with the money that is sought to be appropriated by this bill. The Senator from Tennessee is seeking to attach to the appropriation bill a measure which has been reported by another committee, as the Senator from Nebraska knows.

Mr. NORRIS. This amendment has all to do with the law.

Mr. WARREN. As I have said, this amendment was before another committee and was reported by that committee as a separate bill. It is now proposed to engraft it as legislation on the pending appropriation bill.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator does not want to compromise or feel inclined to adjourn until to-morrow or recess until to-morrow—I do not care which, and I do not care at what time we may meet to-morrow—I protest that this is not the proper way to legislate; it is not the way in which the Senate ought to proceed.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I should like to say with respect to the suggestion made by the Senator from Wyoming that, of course, even if we concede that the amendment is inappropriate under ordinary circumstances on an appropriation bill, the Senator from Tennessee has moved to suspend the rules, and certainly he has that right.

Mr. WARREN. That motion is before us, and we can vote on it in a few moments.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But that is a debatable motion.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am going to explain the matter.

Mr. NORRIS. We are going to have full debate on it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The Senator from Tennessee is certainly within his rights in debating his motion and endeavoring to impress its importance and desirability upon the Members of the Senate.

Mr. WARREN. I am not complaining about that at all.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. From his remarks the Senator from Wyoming seems to think that this is an entirely inappropriate procedure and one that is of no great importance at all.

Mr. WARREN. Of course, it is important, as the Senator himself knows if he has heard the amendment read.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, and it is entirely proper under the motion of the Senator from Tennessee to suspend the rules.

Mr. WARREN. I am willing to have that motion put.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course, but the Senator from Tennessee is not willing.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I am not.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, others of us are not, either; we want to know what the truth is about this question before we are required to vote on it. I do not want to vote blindly. I know that there is not a third of the Senate here, and we can not suspend the rules without a two-thirds vote.

Mr. WARREN. There are plenty of Senators about the Chamber.

Mr. NORRIS. I know there are Senators about, but they ought to be here and listen to the argument.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I should like very much if this matter could go over until to-morrow. I would be perfectly willing to have the Senate meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. NORRIS. That is what I suggested some time ago.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. Just a moment. Every Senator here knows that I have been constantly interrupted, and very properly so because it is a matter of importance and I am glad to be interrupted, but I can not give all the facts that I have within my knowledge without more time.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, this is such an important matter that I think the chairman of the committee ought to agree to a recess until to-morrow morning at 11 o'clock. Then we can take up this matter; Senators will be fresh; they can hear the argument and know what they are doing. Most of the Senators are absent now; they do not know the facts; they do not know how to vote; and if they vote under the present circumstances they will have to vote as someone else tells them to vote.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the Senators who are here have been here all afternoon and they are tired, while many others are not here. I agree to the suggestion that the question which the Senator from Tennessee has brought before the Senate is the most important one that we have considered, and we ought to be informed on it. Senators who are not here ought to be here to listen to the discussion. This question is going to be discussed at length. I intend to discuss it to some extent, as do other Senators. If it could go over until to-morrow, I think we could finish it on that day.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Nebraska what has he to say about fixing a time for voting on the question.

Mr. NORRIS. I have nothing to say as to that. I am merely seeking light on the whole subject.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I had hoped that we might get a vote on this amendment to-night, perhaps for personal reasons as well as others. I have accepted an invitation to speak at Camden, N. J., to-morrow at the launching of the cruiser Salt Lake City, and I have to leave Washington at 8.30 o'clock in the morning. I can give the information which I have to the Senator from Pennsylvania and let him present it to the Senate, but I beg Senators, if we shall take a recess, not to make up their minds upon the basis of what has already been said. We have entirely satisfactory reasons for the action taken, and I want the Senate to understand them.

Mr. McKELLAR. If I have made any mistakes I want to be corrected, but I do not think I have made any.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator has made mistakes in what he has presented to the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not think so, but if I have I want them to be corrected.

Mr. SMOOT. If I had an opportunity to present the facts to the Senate, I think I could convince the Senator that he has made mistakes, and that he would so acknowledge.

Mr. McKELLAR. If I have made a mistake, I am willing to state publicly that it is a mistake.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I move the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SMOOT. Wait a moment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Just a moment, Mr. President.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, the motion is not debatable.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. But the Senator from Michigan can not take the Senator from Tennessee off his feet.

Mr. COUZENS. I understood the Senator from Tennessee to say that he was willing that an adjournment should be had. I did not make the motion without having heard him say that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why can not this matter go over until to-morrow?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I should like to say a few words if the Senator from Tennessee will permit me.

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. We have other appropriation bills besides this to pass here. We have to quit on the 4th of March.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. We are going to have an extra session. I am in sympathy, however, with the Senator's desire to dispose of the appropriation bills.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am, too.

Mr. WARREN. If Senators think we are going to finish every night before this time, I am sure they are going to pass up unconsidered a great deal of proposed legislation. I think we ought to determine now whether we are willing to spend more than five hours in our daily sessions when we have such a short term.

I do not suppose Senators think it is any pleasure for me to stay here hour after hour each day. I do not believe it is any more pleasure to me than to anyone else. I did not expect any especial consideration when I consented to take the chairmanship of this committee; but there is no reason why a filibuster on the part of a Senator for an hour or two every day should keep me here every day and night.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator does not intimate that the Senator from Tennessee is filibustering?

Mr. WARREN. No; not the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. There is no evidence of any filibuster.

Mr. NORRIS. That is right.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have been interrupted by 40 Senators here this afternoon.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator from Tennessee has not had 10 minutes in which to state his case.

Mr. NORRIS. No; he has not.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let us take a recess, and do the right thing.

Mr. NORRIS. Let us have a motion to adjourn if we can not get any agreement.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am a member of the Appropriations Committee, and I want to expedite this matter; but I want to say that it is so important, in my judgment, that we must have a reasonable time in which to discuss it, so that all the facts can be brought out.

Mr. GLASS. Yes; I am a member of the subcommittee, and I am not prepared to vote now. I should not like to vote on the ex parte statement of the Senator from Tennessee, however accurate it may be. I have read all the testimony, but I am not ready to vote.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if I may, I move that we take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, if the Senator wishes to assume the management of the bill, of course, he is at liberty to do so. I had expected to ask unanimous consent for a recess until 11 o'clock.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think that is fair—to meet at 11.

Mr. WARREN. Objection is made by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS]. I am perfectly willing to amend it to 12 o'clock, since we can not obtain unanimous consent to meet at 11.

Mr. McKELLAR. Wait one minute. Let the chairman of the committee make a unanimous-consent request that we recess until to-morrow at 12.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. NORRIS. Why does not the Senator move a recess now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ODDIE in the chair). The Senator from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, how can I make a motion with this mob about me?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. A point of order, Mr. President.

Mr. WARREN. I make the motion now.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, Mr. President, I will submit a motion that will take precedence of that, if that is the way the Senator is going to do. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; the chairman has moved a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to that.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope the Senator will agree to that.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HEFLIN. I hope the Senator from Nebraska will withdraw his motion for this reason: An adjournment will give a morning hour, while if we recess we will go right on with this bill.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to a recess.

RECESS

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 23, 1929, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, January 22, 1929

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Most merciful Father in Heaven, Thou who are so full of human tenderness and art forever renewing the face of this old earth, we praise Thee for this new day. Be so gracious as to remind us that personal responsibility is again with us; it presses upon us from every department of life and is always as evident as the air we breathe. Our supreme task is to always keep alive that divine spark within, namely, conscience. Our skill and knowledge aside from this are nothing. Put our liberty under the restraint of this divinity. Indeed may it be God within. Beyond all wealth and honor are the timeless virtues to which we are related; they are purity, love, and truth. Their secret springs are in Thee; may they lavish themselves in all the streams of our beings. O Father of mercies, be with us in our daily walk that we may crown these virtues above all others. Through Christ our Saviour. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed a joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. J. Res. 180. Joint resolution authorizing the granting of permits to the Committee on Inaugural Ceremonies on the occasion of the inauguration of the President elect in March, 1929, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. REED of Pennsylvania and Mr. SIMMONS members of the joint select committee on the part of the Senate, as provided in the act of February 16, 1889, as amended by the act of March 2, 1895, entitled "An act to authorize and provide for the disposition of useless papers in the executive departments," for the disposition of useless papers in the United States Veterans' Bureau.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 343

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr Speaker, on yesterday the House passed the resolution on the Consent Calendar (H. J. Res. 343), and we accepted an amendment to the bill which was offered on the floor but the title was not amended to conform with it.

I now ask unanimous consent that the Clerk may be permitted to amend the title of House Joint Resolution 343 so as to conform to the amendment offered to the bill on yesterday.

I ask unanimous consent that the RECORD and the Journal of yesterday's proceedings be corrected to show this action.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

CIRCULATING FALSE REPORTS CONCERNING BANKS

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on a bill (H. R. 15521) which I have introduced, proposing to amend section 5209 of the United States Revised Statutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD on H. R. 15521, a bill introduced by me to amend section 5209 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, I beg to make the following statement for consideration of Members of Congress.

This bill is to amend section 5209 of the Revised Statutes of the United States by adding at the end of this section the following paragraph:

> Whoever maliciously or with intent to deceive makes, publishes, utters, repeats, or circulates any false report concerning any national banking association or any State bank if a member of the Federal reserve system which imputes, or tends to impute, insolvency or unsound financial condition or financial embarrassment, or which may tend to cause or provoke or aid in causing or provoking a general withdrawal of deposits from such bank, or which may otherwise injure or tend to injure the business or good will of such bank, shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned for not more than five years, or both.

When the bill H. R. 2, introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN], chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee of the House, to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for consolidation of national banking associations," known as the McFadden bill, was up for consideration in the House on February 3, 1926, I submitted an amendment to section 5209 of the Revised Statutes of the United States which is in the exact language of this bill. The amendment was defeated without any serious consideration of its merits, notwithstanding the fact that the chairman of the committee publicly stated on the floor of the House that he had no objection to the amendment, and the further fact that the amendment, as I am informed, had the approval of Colonel McIntosh, then Comptroller of the Currency, and the approval of the Federal Reserve Board.

After the bill reached the Senate the Senate Finance Committee amended the House bill by restoring the amendment rejected by the House, and the bill as thus amended by the Finance Committee of the Senate was reported to the Senate with recommendation that the same do pass as amended.

However, the amendment was eliminated from the bill by the conferees having charge of it.

This amendment was a part of the McFadden bill, though it was rejected by the Banking and Currency Committee of the House.

There is nothing whatever in the provisions of this bill to alarm any intelligent person. There is nothing within its provisions calculated to do injustice to any fair-minded and truthful person. No innocent man will suffer from it if the bill is enacted into law. Upon the contrary, it is a safeguard to every banking institution of this country over which Congress has jurisdiction. It is a substantial protection to every stockholder and depositor of national banks and State banks members of the Federal reserve system. It is the only legislation which Congress can enact in behalf of stockholders and depositors of such banks against one who utters and circulates false reports concerning their solvency.

The amendment is cautiously worded, and under its provisions no one can be convicted unless it is proven not only that the words uttered were false but that they were uttered maliciously or with intent to deceive. In addition to this, in order to convict one indicted for this offense the evidence must show that the words so uttered impute or tend to impute insolvency or unsound financial condition of a bank, or that the words so uttered may tend to cause or provoke or aid in causing or provoking a general withdrawal of deposits from such banks.

Whenever these elements of crime are proven against one, the guilty party should be put in the penitentiary, particularly if a bank fails as a result of uttering or publishing such false reports.

There is no existing Federal law to protect a bank against any person who utters such false reports. It is true we have different penal statutes in most of the States of the Union in respect of uttering such false reports, but none of them embrace the elements of crime as set forth in the bill I have introduced.

In the annual report of the Comptroller of the Currency, Hon. J. W. Pole, of date December 13, 1928, the following recommendation is made:

> I make the further recommendation that there be enacted a law making it a criminal offense to maliciously or with intent to deceive, make, publish, or circulate any false report concerning any national bank or any other member of the Federal reserve system which imputes insolvency or unsound financial condition, or which may tend to cause a general withdrawal of deposits from such bank or may otherwise injure the business or good will of such bank.

I hope that this recommendation may receive the serious consideration of Members of Congress as it is made by one of the fairest, most intelligent, and experienced men who have had the honor to hold this important office.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16422) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes; and pending that I ask unanimous consent that time for general debate be not limited, but be divided equally between the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] and myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the District of Columbia appropriation bill, and pending that asks unanimous consent that general debate be not limited but equally divided between himself and the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 16422, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, with Mr. HOOPER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COLE].

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, this engagement to speak has been thrust upon me rather suddenly. It was my pleasure to appear this morning before the Ways and Means Committee on the subject of blackstrap.

Mr. EATON. What is that—tobacco?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Blackstrap, I will inform the gentleman from New Jersey, is the nonedible molasses from the cane mills and also from the beet mills. After the edible sugars have been extracted, both from cane and beets, there is a residue molasses that is called blackstrap.

We are large importers of this cheap molasses. Most of it comes from Cuba, but there is such a large demand for it in our country that it is being shipped in from Europe. Last year a single shipment of 1,500,000 gallons was brought to New York from Holland and Poland.

Blackstrap is used for various purposes. Its principal use in the past had been in the manufacture of stock foods. In these it is a valuable ingredient. To facilitate, and even promote, such use a low duty was placed on it in the last tariff act, the one now in effect. The amount of blackstrap in stock foods varies with the purpose. For fattening steers, I think, as much as 50 per cent is used. For feeding dairy cattle probably not more than 10 per cent. Cattle fed on such mixtures consume an increased amount of corn. That is, it acts as an appetizer. The more corn consumed the quicker the cattle are fattened.

But more recently blackstrap has been extensively used as a substitute for corn and other cereals in the manufacture of industrial alcohol. The alcohol makers have taken advantage of the low tariff on this product and they have absorbed so much of it that the price of it for stock foods has been advancing. Such use of this material for the displacement of corn was not contemplated when the Fordney-McCumber tariff was enacted. It makes this importation a very serious agricultural problem.

It was my privilege this morning to present this problem before the Ways and Means Committee in their hearings on the sugar schedules.

In my remarks before that committee I asked that when this blackstrap molasses is used for the making of alcohol that it shall bear a duty high enough to give the corn farmer a chance to compete with the cane growers of Cuba and the beet growers of Europe. I think we have a right to this protection.

Ladies and gentlemen, if we are not going to protect farm products in the new tariff bill, then for one I am in favor of helping to wreck the whole tariff system.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Gladly.

Mr. SNELL. Has there been any indication on the part of anyone that they are not going to give farm products very reasonable protection in every respect in connection with the new bill?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. None at all.

Mr. SNELL. I do not believe there will be any.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. I agree with the gentleman from New York, and I do not think there will be any opposition to this particular duty for which I am speaking.

Mr. SNELL. Then I would not make the statement I was going to help wreck the whole proposition when there is nobody against it. When everybody is on my side I would keep them there.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Then by unanimous consent I will withdraw my statement.

Mr. SNELL. I will give my consent.

Mr. CLARKE. The gentleman is on the subject of alcohol, which may explain the intemperance of his remarks.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. I hope the gentleman will not withdraw that remark, because I am so heartily in favor of his action in that respect.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Then to please the gentleman from Nebraska I will let the statement stand. I do this the more willingly because I know that the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] is correct, and we are going to get in the new tariff bill protection for farm products. [Applause.]

Of course, I do not want to see the protective tariff wrecked. It is the very basis of our American prosperity. What I said about wrecking the system was not intended as a threat so much as an expression of how deeply we feel on this subject of protection for agriculture. None of us want to wreck the system of protection. It would be like tearing down the roof of our house. But we want to make it certain that the roof shall shelter us all and not some more than others.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. I will.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman enlighten me? I understood him to say that blackstrap comes from cane sugar and beet sugar. They are produced by the farmer. Does not the gentleman, then, want a tariff placed upon one product of the farmer in order that another product of the farmer may be benefited thereby?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. I am glad that the gentleman has asked that question, and I think I can enlighten him. The duty I am proposing will not work injury to any American farmer. It is not a duty for the benefit of the corn farmer at the expense of the cane or beet farmer. On the contrary, it will help the latter as much as the former. The cane farmer and the beet farmer are directly interested in this duty. The blackstrap from their mills is now in direct competition with that from the cheaper mills of Cuba and Europe. If we put a duty on imported blackstrap to that extent, we will be helping the American producers.

What is the effect of these importations of blackstrap on corn? I have not the statistics for last year. When I made a speech on this subject before this body in 1927 I spoke of 102,000,000 gallons of industrial alcohol manufactured mostly from blackstrap. Blackstrap at that time, as I recall it, was displacing 25,000,000 bushels of corn. It may be a much larger amount now. It probably is.

I recall also that after my remarks were printed an industrial chemist wrote me that I had underestimated the displacement of corn. He thought it was then nearer 40,000,000 bushels, and he predicted that it would soon be 80,000,000 bushels, so rapid was the development of such alcohol in the manufactures of America. It is that displacement of corn in favor of a cheap imported product that concerns us, speaking agriculturally.

Mr. HUDSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. I yield.

Mr. HUDSON. Would it not take a considerable duty on blackstrap brought from Cuba, because of the small expense of transportation? I understand that in Philadelphia they use a great deal of it because it is cheap and the transportation cost is low.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. They buy it cheap and get the benefit of the low transportation.

The same question was asked me in the Ways and Means Committee this morning; that is, as to what duty I thought ought to be placed upon blackstrap. My reply was that I am not competent to figure that kind of a duty; that that would have to be figured by an expert chemist, an expert in sugar. The duty ought to be placed high enough to enable the American corn farmer to compete with the Cuban cane planter. At least that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand the gentleman, this blackstrap is molasses?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. And it is used for making industrial alcohol?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Yes; largely so.

Mr. SNELL. Is it not used for feeding purposes?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Yes; very extensively.

Mr. SNELL. What proportion is used for feeding stock and what proportion for industrial alcohol?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. A few years ago nearly all of it was used in the manufacture of stock foods. Its use for that purpose was so extensive that I went before the Ways and Means Committee when the Fordney tariff was under consideration asking that the duty be lowered. At that time I was interested entirely in stock foods. Now, I am interested also in alcohol. [Laughter.]

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman has changed his mind.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Is it not a fact that the use of blackstrap for cattle feeding has increased largely?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Very largely.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Wherever they grow soy beans, and in my part of the country they are growing them very largely and building mills in different towns, and mixing blackstrap with it, for feed for stock.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. It is not our purpose in advocating this duty to interfere with such use of blackstrap.

Mr. EATON. And the gentleman is not in favor of any duty on blackstrap when used as a stock food?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. I will say to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HOWARD] and also the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EATON] that when blackstrap is brought in for the purpose of mixing with stock food it shall retain the present low duty, but when it is diverted to the making of industrial alcohol it shall then bear a duty that is compensatory so far as the corn farmer is concerned.

Mr. HASTINGS. Does the gentleman have any figures as to the selling price of this blackstrap per barrel?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. I heard the statement made this morning before the Committee on Ways and Means that the present price of blackstrap is around 10 cents a gallon, but it has been as low as 4 cents, and the cane growers of Louisiana are very much concerned about the price. It figures in their profits.

Mr. HASTINGS. The cotton growers of the South want to protect themselves against the boll weevil. They use a cheap grade of molasses with a mixture of calcium arsenate. I should think that they would be very much interested in this matter.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. We are asking for a duty on this particular product only when and where it is used to make industrial alcohol.

Mr. LINTHICUM. What! Does the gentleman want to make alcohol more expensive?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. I will say to the gentleman from Maryland that this alcohol is not fit to drink. It is industrial alcohol. I am in favor of making all that can be used industrially.

Mr. IRWIN. How would you go about determining, after this blackstrap is in the country, whether it is going to be used for cow feed or for alcohol? Would you not have to set up some complicated machinery to determine that?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. No. That question came up before the Committee on Ways and Means this morning, and one of the experts made the statement that there would be no difficulty in determining what the blackstrap would be used for, and that the tax could be levied on that portion of it which goes into alcohol without difficulty.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has again expired.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. HUDSON. Would the gentleman plan to protect the Virgin Islands and Porto Rico free from this duty? Everything that can be done to protect the Virgin Islands in their industries, of course, is essential.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. My understanding is that we levy no duties on imports from either Porto Rico or from the Virgin Islands. For such purposes they are considered as parts of the United States. Sugar and blackstrap from the Hawaiian Islands also come in free.

In closing, let me say that I hope that those of you who are interested in agriculture will not forget to keep this matter before the Committee on Ways and Means. The purpose of tariff revision this year is protection for the farmers, but we who want protection for agricultural products are not going to discriminate against any other industry. Whenever a higher duty ought to be levied we are in favor of levying it. But we do insist that, first of all, and most of all, this revision of the tariff shall be in the interest of agriculture. [Applause.]

If it were not for the agricultural interest in the tariff, no special session of Congress would have been considered. We who represent agricultural districts, and I think nearly all of us do, want to keep this matter before the proper committees. Those who represent districts in which corn is grown—and corn is grown in nearly every district in the United States—should make special mention of our special interest in the duty on blackstrap. We want the American farmer who produces corn to be placed at least on a parity with the planter who raises sugar cane in Cuba.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman tell me just how it is proposed to help the farmer by increasing the duty on this blackstrap?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. I have already explained that the blackstrap that is imported from Cuba and from Europe at the present time is displacing from twenty-five to forty million bushels of corn, and the industrial chemists are my authority for the statement that in the near future it may require at least 80,000,000 bushels of corn to produce the industrial alcohol that is needed for the industries of the country.

Mr. LINTHICUM. And you want to displace this blackstrap with corn?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. That is correct. If we can use an American farm product to make industrial alcohol, why not use it in preference to an imported one? We are not unmindful in this of foreigners, but we are simply doing that scriptural duty enjoined on us, providing for those of our household first. Are we not told that those who would do less are worse than the heathen?

There is another advantage, I may add, in this industry for the corn growers. In making alcohol soft corn can be used. In the old days the distilleries of Peoria were great markets for soft corn. We have this soft corn, more or less of it, every year. When we are overtaken by early frosts we have more of it. It does not have a high feeding value. If we can dispose of it to the manufacturers of industrial alcohol, we will be served in at least two ways.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. I will.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. The gentleman is now talking about tariff duties on blackstrap?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Some time ago I saw a newspaper statement that the gentleman had been before the Tariff Commission in reference to tariff duties on corn itself?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman tell us what is the practical situation in reference to corn now, the volume of imports, and whether those imports are increasing or not?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. I think I can give the information that is asked for. The importations of corn are not increasing. We are not concerned about the quantity of corn that is imported at any time. It has never been large, even under the very low tariff which was in existence during the administration of President Wilson. The effect of a tariff on corn is more an effect upon prices. That is, when the price of corn goes up they begin to bring in corn from Argentina, or they merely threaten to bring it in, and that has a depressing influence on prices. It is not the actual quantity of corn that is imported that distresses the corn farmer. It is the effect that such importations have on prices.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Do not we regularly export a large quantity of corn?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Hardly that. We export some corn, but the total amount is small compared with our total production.

Mr. HASTINGS. How much annual exportation is there on the average?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. I have not the figures at hand, but the quantity is small.

Mr. HASTINGS. Was it much more than we import?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Oh, yes. We export more corn than we import, especially if we take into consideration the products of corn. But the amount of corn we export as corn is not very large. Our corn is not as good for export as the Argentine corn. The Argentine corn is a hard, flinty corn. Ours is a soft, starchy corn. American corn does not——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield me two minutes more?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. American corn is apt to deteriorate at sea. It is too soft and absorbs too much moisture. A personal investigation made in Denmark and other countries in Europe convinces me they prefer Argentine corn. It is a flint corn, hard, keeps well, does not absorb moisture, and is therefore much more desirable for their uses. When it comes to competing with Argentine corn in the markets of Europe we are at a very great disadvantage unless we could change to flint corn.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. I will.

Mr. LINTHICUM. As I understand the gentleman's idea is to increase the tariff on blackstrap so as to require them to use corn instead of blackstrap to make industrial alcohol and so dispose of about 40,000,000 more bushels of corn?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. How much per cent does the gentleman propose to raise the duty on blackstrap? How much will the tariff have to be for such purposes?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. That is a matter to be determined by experts. I might express an opinion that would be more or less political, or at least sectional. But the question ought to be submitted to the sugar experts of the Ways and Means Committee. I am willing to accept their conclusions. All we are asking is to have our corn for making alcohol placed on a parity with Cuban cane.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Is corn just as good for the manufacture of this industrial alcohol as blackstrap?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. I think it is better, although I have no precise information on which to base that statement. I have an idea that alcohol is always very much the same, no matter whence it is derived.

I thank you, gentlemen, for listening to these rambling thoughts. I was asked to occupy the floor, awaiting the coming of some more important orator. [Laughter.] That is why I merely rambled on, but I trust I have not wasted your time.

On the contrary, I think I have presented a matter of prime agricultural importance. [Applause.]

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, while the District of Columbia appropriation bill is under discussion I think it is an appropriate time to invite attention to a bill (H. R. 16435) which I have introduced providing for the collection from passengers of half fares on all street cars, busses or other public conveyance in the District of Columbia, where there are no vacant seats, and requiring half-fare tickets or tokens to be issued for sale, and providing a penalty for violation.

I think everyone recognizes the necessity for some such legislation. Everyone appreciates that street cars during all hours of the day are overcrowded and that sufficient cars are not provided for the accommodation of the public. No passenger should be compelled to pay full fare who for miles must remain standing, jostled about, and holding to a strap.

It is intended by this bill to compel the street car companies, through a reduction of fares, to provide more cars. Of course the argument will be presented that the congestion is only at certain hours of the day, early in the morning and late in the afternoon, but from personal experience and observation I know this to be not true. There is congestion at all hours of the day and on practically all car lines. Street car companies are given unusual privileges. Their cars are permitted to occupy the streets and in return they owe adequate service to the public. I think everyone will admit that street cars and busses are overcrowded and that passengers must stand in the aisles, hang on by straps and remain standing oftentimes for miles. We should remedy this situation. Congress should lead the way in our Capital City. This bill provides that only half fares shall be charged or received from any passenger entering a street car, bus, or other public conveyance, where there is no vacant seat, and provides that where tickets or tokens are issued and sold to be used as fares, that half-fare tickets and tokens shall be issued and sold to passengers where no seat is provided, and provides a penalty for violation.

Everyone, of course, will appreciate that where a passenger enters a street car, bus, or other public conveyance, where a seat is not provided, he should not pay full fare. The only question in dispute will be whether the overcrowded condition of cars and busses is general. I maintain that it is, and I think that every person who patronizes the street cars in the city of Washington will be compelled to agree with me that a sufficient number of cars are not only not provided during the early morning and late in the afternoon, but that this congested condition extends throughout the entire day. This condition should be remedied. I am bringing it to the attention of the Committee on the District of Columbia in the hope that a thorough investigation will be made with the result that this condition will be remedied in the interest of the traveling public. My information is that busses do not permit passengers to enter when there are no vacant seats. Street cars should follow this rule or charge reduced fares.

I am attaching to my remarks a copy of the bill referred to.

A bill (H. R. 16435) providing for the collection from passengers of half fares on all street cars, busses, or other public conveyances in the District of Columbia where there are no vacant seats, requiring half-fare tickets or tokens to be issued for sale, and providing a penalty for violation

Be it enacted, etc., That no person, company, or corporation operating a street car line, bus, or other public conveyance for hire in the District of Columbia shall charge, receive, or collect from any passenger in excess of one-half the regular fare when no seat is provided in said car, bus, or other public conveyance for said passenger; and any person, company, or corporation operating a street car, bus, or other public conveyance charging, receiving, or collecting from any passenger a sum in excess of one-half fare where no seat is provided shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and fined in the sum of not more than $25.

SEC. 2. It shall be the duty of every person, company, or corporation operating a street car, bus, or other public conveyance for hire in the District of Columbia, where tickets or tokens are issued and sold, to issue and provide half-fare tickets and tokens to be sold to all passengers at one-half the regular fare, for use by all passengers entering a street car, a bus, or other public conveyance where no vacant seat is provided for said passenger; and any person, company, or corporation violating this section shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and fined in the sum of not more than $25.

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, Congress on the 24th of last May passed what is known as the disabled emergency officers' retirement bill. It passed it over the veto of the President. The compelling voice of the American people was expressed in the terms of the bill. More than seven months have elapsed since the action of the Senate and House, and there has been such a storm of protest from all over the country criticizing the administration of the act that it seems to me the situation should be laid before the Congress, and Members who have been appealed to for help in securing the benefits which the act of Congress intended for these disabled veterans should know something of the circumstances.

I have before me a letter written from Clay Center, Kans., on the 12th of this month. Quoting from this letter, which accompanies a copy of another letter written to the man's own Congressman from Kansas, I read:

I thought perhaps you would like to know how your bill is being murdered by the emergency officers' retirement board, so far as the supposed beneficiaries thereof in Kansas are concerned.

Further along I read:

I have been paid 50 per cent permanent disability for years by the Veterans' Bureau and thought that I had been so rated "according to law." The compensation division of the Veterans' Bureau, including the local regional office at Wichita, has held that my accident was service connected and in line of duty. But the retirement board holds that if my accident occurred at all, it was not service connected, and the line-of-duty status is not shown, although I have drawn compensation, as above stated, for years.

There was published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 16, 1928—whether properly or improperly I shall not venture an opinion—a list furnished by the Veterans' Bureau of the names and addresses of more than 3,000 unfortunate veterans of the World War, who were adjudged under the rulings of the Veterans' Bureau to be 30 per cent or more permanently disabled and who were prospective beneficiaries of the law being enacted. This publication was spread broadcast throughout the land, and it included, according to my correspondent, 40 of the emergency officers from the State of Kansas who had suffered disability in the World War. This man complains to me that although these many months have elapsed since the 24th of May, 1928, but eight members of that body of broken down, crippled, and mutilated Kansas men, whose names had been published as the prospective beneficiaries of the bill, had been retired.

I call attention to the publication in one of the daily papers of the city of Washington of a statement made by the Director of the Veterans' Bureau on the 10th of this month. I read but a line or two from it. Gen. Frank T. Hines said in the Washington Post of January 10:

The statement is made that although the Tyson-Fitzgerald bill for the retirement of disabled emergency officers passed May 24, 1928, the Veterans' Bureau is showing hostility toward this legislation. It is not believed this conclusion is justified by reason of the action taken in the entire group of cases which has been adjudicated.

Then follows the argument of the Director of the Veterans' Bureau in answer to the charge which seems to have been made throughout the country that the Veterans' Bureau is hostile to the act and that its administration has been colored by this hostility.

The director states that the total number of claims acted on was 2,890; allowed with pay, 1,179; allowed without pay—that is, put on the honor roll without retired pay—160; and adjudged not entitled to the benefits of the act, 1,551.

I have before me a statement with reference to the procedure in the Veterans' Bureau from which I desire to quote a number of extracts:

Section 10 of the selective service act of 1917 was a specific contract with the emergency officers of the World War. It provided that in the event of disability incurred in line of duty, they would be provided for on a parity with all other disabled officers of the World War as to retirement or pensions designed and provided for those disabled in the Regular Service. It developed, however, that the huge machinery of the War Department was set in motion against the disabled emergency officers and long, drawn-out, and heart-sickening delay faced these injured, mutilated, and suffering men. To overcome this delay the first measure designed for the immediate relief of these disabled officers was introduced in the first session of the Sixty-sixth Congress by Mr. STEVENSON, of South Carolina, H. R. 4381, June 2, 1919. On May 24, 1928, after nine years, lacking eight days, this long-pending question came to a final conclusion in the passage of this retirement law, but in the meantime over 600 disabled emergency officers had died.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Very gladly.

Mr. PERKINS. I understand that under the act about which the gentleman is speaking the rating must be within one year?

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. That would be one year from May 24, 1928?

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. What happens in case there is no rating within a year and no rating at all?

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. In answering the gentleman's question I might say that shortly after the assembling of this session of Congress Senator TYSON and myself had an interview with General Hines at his office. There we were assured that the administration of the law would be so expedited that there would be no need for any extension of the time. There is an interpretation or construction of the law which probably would save the situation to those who actually make applications within the year, but these unfortunate veterans ought not to be relegated to that uncertainty. The law provides for two classes that shall get the benefits of this retirement, first, those who, at the date of the passage of the act, had been, in accordance with the law, adjudged to be 30 per cent or more permanently disabled and, secondly, those who within a year would be so adjudged. So the act divided the disabled emergency officers into two classes and there are many reasons why this should be so. The Veterans' Bureau has been very cautious, as it should be, in adjudging any veteran to be permanently disabled, especially if he carries insurance, and for the reason no payments of the soldier's insurance can be made under the law unless there is an adjudication of total permanent disability. Consequently, men have been carried for years as temporarily totally disabled who are really permanently disabled, either totally or to some unascertained degree in the hope and expectation—and, of course, that hope and expectation was shared by the man and his family—that he would recover and be entitled to no compensation or very little compensation because of a decrease in his disability or its complete cure. But the carefulness of the Veterans' Bureau brought about this condition, that a man might be—and many of them were—100, 80, or 75 per cent disabled and rated temporarily so, although it was known that a certain percentage—which it was difficult to determine at the time—was permanent disability. Consequently, this retirement act, as I say, divided the prospective beneficiaries into two classes—one class made up of those who had already been, according to law, adjudged to be permanently disabled, and another class made up of those who might be adjudged so permanently disabled within a year.

Now, the law provides that application shall be made by the disabled veteran within a year. Although this law was passed on the 24th of May, it was not until the 30th of June that the Veterans' Bureau issued an official form on which a man must make this application. However, informal applications were to be recognized as fixing the date if followed subsequently by formal applications on the forms prepared by the Veterans' Bureau. But here a very serious charge is made against the Veterans' Bureau.

I do not set myself up as a judge of the merit of the complaint, but the charge has been made, and plausibly, that although for every other purpose the regional offices of the Veterans' Bureau are recognized as the official places for correspondence, for applications, for all sorts of benefits, in this one particular instance there has been a ruling that an application for retirement made to a regional office does not come within the law and that the application will not count until it has been received at the Washington office. It does not make any difference whose neglect it is or how long the application has laid at the regional office.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Very gladly.

Mr. PERKINS. May not that be due to the fact that in section 2 it is provided—that the said director shall establish a register and applications made hereunder shall be entered therein as of the actual date of receipt in order of receipt in the Veterans' Bureau, and such register shall be conclusive as to date of receipt of any application filed under this act.

So there must be some definite place where the director can be considered to have acted at a definite time.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. I think the suggestion made by my friend from New Jersey has merit in it. I believe, however, the practical working out of this law, if the inclination was to be friendly to the persons seeking its benefits, would arrange for the applications received at the various regional offices to be checked and numbered and marked and transmitted immediately to the central office in Washington, because the Veterans' Bureau under the act of Congress now in force and under which it is operating, is divided into all these regional offices and the office is as much the Veterans' Bureau, although it is in Indianapolis or in Cleveland or in a city in the gentleman's own State of New Jersey, as it is here in Washington, and for every other purpose official transactions at the regional office are recognized as transactions with the Veterans' Bureau.

But I do not set myself up as a judge in this matter. I am merely here voicing some of the complaints that are made about the administration, and I am going to read into the RECORD:

In the absence of any formal application blanks the emergency officers themselves acting in strict accordance with standing bureau regulations and procedure filed letters of application known as informal applications with the nearest regional office of the Veterans' Bureau. Subsequent rulings by the general counsel of the bureau, approved by the director, held that date of receipt of retirement applications, informal or otherwise, would be from date applications were received in the central office. This has resulted in the effective dates of retirement being anywhere from a few days to a month or more after the disabled emergency officer filed his informal application with his regional manager, who in all other matters has been recognized as acting for the director. The reaction to this is that most of the men fortunate enough to have already been placed on the retired list are reluctant to protest about having been wrongfully deprived of anywhere from five to eighty dollars. However, the sum total of this saving to the Government from what Congress tried to give to these disabled men will make an appreciable sum and hence a handsome saving to be reported to the Director of the Budget.

I do believe that the Director of the Budget is very conscientious in his efforts to have all of the agencies of the Government thrifty and careful and forehanded in efforts to save even the smallest sums. In the administration there should not be waste, whether it is of a lead pencil or a broom or of more expensive equipment, but where the administration of a law passed by Congress is for either the repayment of a moral obligation or debt, or, if you look at it in another way, the extension of charity or kindness or relief to the suffering, then it seems to me that, perhaps, the influence of the Budget Director may be carried sometimes just a little too far.

The formal application required by the Veterans' Bureau, known as U. S. V. B. 544, did not appear until June 30, 1928, more than a month, as I have said, after the passage of the act.

Now, the first official retirement was not made until the 1st of August, 1928.

Here was a bill that had been before the Congress for some eight or nine years—discussed, checked over, estimates furnished by the Veterans' Bureau, the names of the prospective beneficiaries of the act published broadcast to the world, and the bill advertised as perhaps few other bills have been advertised, with preparation in the Veterans' Bureau coming from the fact that they have been appealed to by those in favor and those opposed to the bill repeatedly for information, for statistics, and for all that would go to make up the arguments for and against the passage of the bill—and yet, although 3,000 names were published of those who were advertised to the world as prospective beneficiaries under the bill, it was not until the 1st of August that a single retirement was made under the bill.

Mr. SWING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Very gladly.

Mr. SWING. The gentleman knows why that was, I assume. The gentleman knows, I am quite sure, that the Veterans' Bureau ignored the clear intent of Congress in specifying two classes of beneficiaries, those who had theretofore been rated "permanent more than 30 per cent" and those who might thereafter and within one year be rated "permanent more than 30 per cent," and treated all applicants for retirement as belonging to the latter class, and as such therefore must be rerated after the act was passed. The bureau thereupon set up a large organization and devoted themselves for months to reexamining applicants, reopening and reviewing and rerating the cases, and making a new decision on each and every case, notwithstanding that some of them had been on their books for years with a rating of "permanent." All of this work, in many instances unnecessary and not called for by the law, is what delayed action in so many of these cases.

The act of Congress makes a direct grant of the privilege of retirement to those who were at the time of its final passage on the Veterans' Bureau rolls as permanently disabled more than 30 per cent, and the bureau had neither the power nor the privilege of rerating those cases in the absence of fraud or clear mistake of law or fact.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. I am pleased to get that statement from the gentleman from California.

Mrs. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. I am glad to yield to the lady from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS. Does the gentleman know how many officers have been retired to present date?

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. I have some figures, but they are not up to date. I read a moment ago the number which General Hines gave to the public press on the 10th of this month. The total number retired up to the 10th of January, when this statement of General Hines was published in the Washington Post, was 1,179; and in addition there were 160 who were placed on the honor roll or retired without retirement pay.

Mrs. ROGERS. That is about one-quarter of the total number?

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. It was as stated by this article, by the Director of the Veterans' Bureau, less than one-half of those whose claims had been acted upon, but only about one-seventh of the total number of claims which had been filed. There were 7,700 claims filed up to the 10th of January of this year, and of those 7,700 claims 2,890 have been acted upon. I am just informed that to-day a total of 7,971 claims have been filed. Of these, 3,708 have been adjudicated, 1,403 have retired with pay, 206 have been retired without retirement pay, and 2,099 have been rejected.

Mrs. ROGERS. One more question. Is it the gentleman's opinion that the Comptroller General will allow the payment of these claims now that the Attorney General has given a favorable opinion on the emergency officers' retirement act?

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. I would not like to risk an opinion. I understand that there have been occasions on which the Comptroller General differs in his legal conclusions from the Attorney General, and does not consider the opinion of the Attorney General binding upon him. I may be wrong about that.

Mr. SWING. The gentleman is not wrong; the Comptroller General is the supreme court of the executive branch of Government, and even at times exercises the power of overruling the acts of the legislative branch.

Mrs. ROGERS. It may be, then, that we will have to appeal to the supreme court of the executive branches.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. If you will pardon a digression, I may say that the gentleman from California, Mr. Watson B. Miller, chairman of the national rehabilitation committee of the American Legion, and I went to the General Accounting Office on December 19, 1928, because we had heard that this was a sort of court of last resort, and because we were so anxious to expedite the administration of this law—we went to the General Accounting Office and there argued for a fair and what seemed to us lawful determination of these questions, so that this act might be administered fairly in accordance with the desires of those who had voted for the passage of the act in Congress.

There has been, so far as I know, no decision yet by the Comptroller General on this argument, but the same matters were, I believe, submitted to the Attorney General and his opinion was delivered Saturday. After the lapse of almost eight months since the passage of the law the questions raised by the bureau against veterans all over the United States were answered Saturday by the opinion from the Attorney General along the lines indicated by my colleague from California.

Mr. SWING. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. I yield.

Mr. SWING. It was a full month ago that the gentleman and I and others presented this argument to the Comptroller General, and at that time the Attorney General's office had notified us that they were about ready to render an opinion. So it seems that they have held up their decision for quite a length of time.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. I will.

Mr. PERKINS. The gentleman has told us when the Attorney General rendered the opinion, but in all fairness to the Attorney General may it be stated when he was asked for the opinion.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. I have it in my papers and I will insert it in the RECORD if I can find the statement from the Director of the Veterans' Bureau when it was submitted.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the gentleman will yield, in the Senate yesterday the Attorney General's opinion was inserted in the RECORD. My understanding is that that will show on its face the date it was submitted to that office.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. I will look and ascertain the date. The opinion of the Attorney General appears in yesterday's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, on page 1962, and it commences with these words:

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of December 1.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Yes; as soon as I finish this statement. "Although these complaints of delay and misconstruction of the law are made from all over the country, and many Members of Congress have been oppressed with the sufferings of many of these unfortunate men, some of them helpless and bedridden, although these months have elapsed since the passage of the bill, it was not until the 1st of December, over five months after the passage of the bill, that the Veterans' Bureau saw fit to seek the advice of the Attorney General.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Before we leave the Attorney General's opinion, do I understand that they are satisfactory to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. I have not had an opportunity, as my colleague knows, to analyze this opinion thoroughly, because it has just been given out; but on a cursory reading I believe it is much more in accord with the law as Congress intended it than the interpretations which have heretofore been put on the law by the Veterans' Bureau. I am inclined to think that it will bring about a very much fairer administration of the act.

In the statement I have before me, to which I have alluded and which was so carefully prepared, it appears that "the present delay—January 17, 1929—now hinges on the decisions from the Attorney General's office." This, of course, was prepared before Saturday, when the opinion of the Attorney General was given out. General Hines, in his letter to me on December 18, 1928, says that he asked the Attorney General for an opinion on November 3, 1928; and again, on December 1, 1928, he submitted additional questions for his opinions about sundry interpretations. Eight months have almost elapsed since the passage of the law, with but little more than four remaining in which to adjudicate the applications in the year allowed by the law.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. With only four months left, and with a limit of a year to make applications, why should not the time be extended a reasonable amount for the applications to be made?

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. In this interview to which I have alluded heretofore, when Senator TYSON and myself called on the director, I understood him to give positive assurance that there would be no reason for an extension of the time.

I am inclined to think that if the application is made within the year there might be an adjudication if this matter should go to court, that it would not make any difference if the actual rating of the man were beyond the 12 months, provided the application had been made within the year and the delay of adjudication were not the fault of the disabled veteran, but I am fearful of the situation, and I do not want to trust it. Something ought to be done to protect these veterans against the delays of the Veterans' Bureau, right or wrong.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Unless the time is extended you are liable to have this situation. Take a man who has had active tuberculosis, moderately advanced, for the past six or seven years, and who has never received a permanent rating. He might not go to a far-advanced stage of tuberculosis and receive a permanent rating until one or two years after this limitation, and you are going to preclude him from having the benefits of this act unless the time is extended.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. I am very much afraid that just such a condition may be brought about. Here are over 7,000 applications that are entitled to consideration. Here is, to my mind, an unaccountable delay by the Veterans' Bureau. General Hines repudiates the idea of hostility, but what explanation can we give for this course of action by the Veterans' Bureau? The very forms were not furnished for more than a month after the passage of the act, and where this law seemed to many of us to be plain upon its face, yet it seemed to the mind of the Veterans' Bureau Director and of those in authority to bristle with questions, all of which seemed to be decided against the right of the prospective beneficiary. Now, after months and months, not until November did the Director of the Veterans' Bureau appeal to the Attorney General for an opinion upon the questions of law, and not until the 1st of December did he supplement it by further questions seeking help to enable him to deal intelligently with this law, if it is as complicated as he seems to think.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I have always found General Hines very willing at all times to do everything possible to make the law fit as liberally as possible to the case and give the relief that Congress intended to give, but it is in the regional offices where I find the antagonism to doing what we want to do for the service men. There is where I have all of my trouble. I have even been advised that boys had been asked as to whether their Congressman were interested in the case, and if the Congressman had tried to look into the matter and assist the boy they seemed to feel that that was just cause for them to put every obstacle in the way of relief.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. It prejudiced the case in the regional office, did it not?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I fear so.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; and if the patient did not have somebody to push his case he would not get a hearing.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. I have had an experience with one office, and I shall not call the name of the office, in which they wrote to the ex-service man and intimated that I did not know what steps to take. I want to join with my good friend from Kansas [Mr. STRONG] in the statement that General Hines is one of the fairest-minded men that I have ever met and had dealings with. He tells you no when you are not entitled to something, and he tells you yes when you are, and that is all that a Congressman wants. The difficulty is not in the Veterans' Bureau, but in many of the regional offices. This does not apply to Florida, because I have found the gentleman we have in control down there deeply interested in the ex-service men.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. I would like now to give a little of the set-up in the Veterans' Bureau machinery for action on these claims. I quote: "Take the retirement rating board and its working personnel. Conceding that this board reports on cases as expeditiously and in as reasonably fair a manner as possible, the thing that is most important, most exasperating, to the individual disabled emergency officer is delay in his case. I shall now tell you where that delay, and, most cruel of all, seems to be. It is centered in the advisory group of appeals, the close personal advisors to the director. All of the retirement machinery established to bring about the final conclusion on each application for retirement might just as well be nonexistent, except as instruments of delay, because of the fact that the director solicits and considers recommendations of the advisory group over recommendations for retirement by the retirement board.

"Disallowals sent by the retiring board to the director are perfunctorily O. K'd without question, except in rare cases. In other words, the advisory group on appeals is asked by the director to 'check' the retiring board and determine if the retiring board might not be in error in allowing the case, but rarely, if ever, to 'check' a disallowance. This action results in, first, further delay; and secondly, often an invited opinion dissenting from that of the retiring board. This precludes the necessity for the director immediately signing the award, and then there starts a 'back-and-forth' movement between the advisory group on appeals, as spokesman for the director, and the retiring board."

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield the gentleman 10 additional minutes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Let me finish this:

Thus we find the sad and inexcusable situation, where a case has been pending in the bureau since August 3, the man's retirement having been recommended by the retiring board, but the advisory group on appeals by its peculiar position and delegated powers has been able to hold it up. So the long-suffering disabled emergency officer, after nine years, is still waiting for justice and relief promised him in 1917, and by mandates of Congress on May 24, 1928, and which should have been given him without further delay or bureaucratic excuses.

I am now very glad to yield to my friend from Wisconsin.

Mr. SCHAFER. Is there any real reason why an emergency officer's case should not go before the advisory group on appeals the same as that of a buck private's case? You could not expect the director to go through the whole of the millions of files, many of them a foot thick.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. My friend is exactly right. What is wanted is impartiality and fairness. The best men in the bureau were selected for the retirement rating board. Why should the decisions of this board be questioned without reason? The complaint is that where the retirement is refused to the veteran the case does not go to the court of appeals, but where the retirement is granted it is referred sua sponte to the board of appeals.

Mr. SCHAFER. If a buck private's case is rejected by the regional or central office board of appeals it does not go to the advisory group on appeals unless the claimant makes the request.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Let it be understood it is only in cases where retirement is granted by the retirement board that resort is had to this advisory group of appeals. It brings delay in the first place and, secondly, it gratuitously injects question and doubts into the case.

Mr. SCHAFER. The bureau in many compensation cases refers the favorable rating of the regional office or of the central office board of appeals to the advisory group on appeals for final determination. In many cases such action is justified. The advisory group on appeals is composed of exceptionally qualified members who give careful consideration to the case.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. I will.

Mr. SIMMONS. Do I understand the gentleman to infer in his statement that the Director of the Veterans' Bureau refers these cases to the advisory group merely for the purpose of delay?

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Oh, no. I said it delays the case and probably saves money. But, of course, there is a hope if not a desire that the advisory board may find some reason to differ with the retirement board. It is not so when the retirement is denied.

Mr. SIMMONS. But the gentleman's statement was this, that he referred it to this advisory group either for the purpose of delay or a difference of opinion. I wanted to know whether or not you intended to assert that the Veterans' Bureau was deliberately delaying the adjudication of these cases.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. I let the facts speak for themselves. They act, apparently, from very good motives.

Mr. SIMMONS. It seems that the trouble is that you are trying to interpret the law after it is passed instead of before. When we discussed this bill before, it was stated that the proper time to find out what it meant was before it was passed, and the officials of the Veterans' Bureau, it was suggested, should be called in order to permit the Congress to find out the facts. The gentleman objected to that and blocked the attempt to secure an interpretation of the bill prior to its passage.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. I am glad the gentleman from Nebraska has brought that up, because we have the opinion of the Attorney General confirming the statements that I made on the floor of this House as to the interpretation when the bill was pending. He says, "This is what Congress understood it was doing," and Congress passed this law with this interpretation before it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Had we had that interpretation authoritatively given by the Attorney General and Veterans' Bureau prior to the passage of the law, instead of after, the delay you are complaining about would not have occurred.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Oh, no. It would have occurred anyway. That did not cause them to postpone the getting up of forms until the 30th of June.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Everyone in this House knows that the Attorney General will not render an opinion on pending legislation, and you can not get a construction of law until the law is passed.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. When I was a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia the Attorney General rendered an opinion that had taken a week or so to prepare—the substance of which was that he was not obligated to render an opinion on the constitutionality of pending legislation.

Mr. SIMMONS. There was nothing to prevent the calling of the officials of the Veterans' Bureau and having them determine what this bill was intended to do. But that was not done. It would have developed the facts.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. No. You do not understand the situation. I am informed that the legal adviser of the Veterans' Bureau advised long ago what is now the opinion of the Attorney General, and that his opinion was snubbed in the Veterans' Bureau.

Mr. SIMMONS. If you had called the legal adviser of the Veterans' Bureau before you when Members of Congress asked that it be done, and you would not do it, you would have had that opinion then instead of now.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Of course, I am very happy to have the gentleman from Nebraska say that I forced the House to pass this bill. But that is not the case. It was passed by the House through a sense of justice and honor. That is what impelled the Members to pass the bill. The opinion of the legal adviser of the Veterans' Bureau was not called for nor would it have been more readily heeded then by the enemies of the bill than it has since been heeded and followed by the Director of the Veterans' Bureau.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. The question is not what was the intention of the Veterans' Bureau but what was the intention of Congress. It turns out that the Attorney General determined that the intention of Congress is exactly what we said and meant.

Mrs. ROGERS. What does it mean when a case is submitted to an advisory group for action? It means delay for the emergency officer. It means delay for the private or enlisted man who otherwise would be rated more expeditiously. In passing upon retirement cases the advisory group must of necessity fall behind in its regular work of acting upon compensation insurance cases for the enlisted men. I want to give General Hines, the Director of the Veterans' Bureau, credit for being entirely sincere and anxious to promptly secure justice to the veterans. He has in my opinion the most difficult position in the Government; but I am sure he does not appreciate fully the lapse of time that takes place in the adjudication of claims; also in the erection of hospitals and other matters. The rating of cases is progressing very slowly at the present time.

Mr. CRAIL. May I ask the gentleman from Ohio if the statement he refers to is in the hearings?

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. I think not.

Mr. SIMMONS. Is it not true that all of these men are now receiving compensation from the Veterans' Bureau, so that the delay is in giving them an increase from the compensation that the enlisted man in the service gets and that which the officer would get under this bill?

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. The delay complained of is the delay of administering this law; the delay in passing upon the claims filed. Delays caused by what seems to be an unwarranted rerating of disabled veterans whom the law provided should be retired.

In some cases reratings have been made under the pretext of this law and compensation reduced, or entirely taken away, so that the law in some instances has been used as a club of misfortune.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman believes that the proper interpretation of this law would include the tubercular and neuropsychiatric cases which have been service connected under the presumptive sections of the World War veterans' act?

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Not all. Congress has set up an arbitrary presumption of service connection for tuberculosis for compensation. In cases where active tuberculosis existed prior to January 1, 1925, the man is entitled to compensation, it being presumed that his disability was incurred in the service. I do not believe that such a case would be entitled to retirement under this law without some further proof. Where a competent and trustworthy physician who is skilled in the treatment of tuberculosis says that the ravages of the disease of tuberculosis, the destruction of tissue, and other evidence indicates a contraction of the disease of tuberculosis before the veteran's discharge from the service retirement should be granted.

Mr. SCHAFER. We were told that this bill was to put the disabled emergency officers in the same standing as the Regular Army and Navy officers so far as retirement is concerned. But where is the Regular Army or Navy officer in the Regular Establishment who will receive retirement pay for disability that shows up seven years after discharge from the service?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. They still get it. When they incur it in the active ranks they get it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HOWARD].

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, on November 6, when the returns from the district which I have had the honor of representing for three terms in this House had been completed, it was discovered by the election officials that Mr. Hoover, the Republican candidate for President, had carried my district by approximately 44,000 votes. The returns also disclosed that while Mr. Hoover's majority was approximately 44,000, I was defeated by a gentleman running on the same ticket with him by approximately 5,400, demonstrating that I had run ahead of my ticket in the first Oklahoma congressional district by 38,527 votes. Of course, at least in my own mind, I can justify the thought that the retirement of myself from the Congress by that vote was accidental and not intentional. However, it was sufficient to place me in the category of being a "lame duck."

Mr. Chairman, I did not rise, however, to discuss election returns; but to discuss the term "lame duck." I note by a report made by the Clerk of the House that there is a considerable number of "lame ducks" in this session, and I thought it might be at least consoling to say to those who are in the same class with myself, whether they have been retired accidently as I was, whether they have retired voluntarily, or whether they have been retired in seeking higher honors, that while they call us "lame ducks," they really, my friends, have cast us into high society; because I remember that not long since the distinguished present Speaker of this House accidentally found himself in the "lame duck" coop.

I know the Speaker is probably saying to himself, like the black-faced comedian, "Why bring that up?" I do not bring it up, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of causing you any unpleasant memories but for the purpose of impressing upon your constituency the wisdom displayed when, at the next election, they rectified that wrong and sent you back to Congress, and to call the Nation's attention to the great loss it would have been to it had they continued to make of you a "lame duck." Not only that, my friendly and neighborly pals of the "lame-duck" class, but others have been in our class. I also call the attention of you more fortunate ones to-day to the fact that unless you resign or die some day every one of you will be in the position we now occupy.

I recall, my friends, that once upon a time the distinguished gentleman who has been elected Vice President of the United States, through accident, similar to what happened to some of us who are "lame ducks," found himself limping back to Kansas looking for a job. I also find that the late great and lamented Champ Clark, Joe Cannon, whom we all loved, CORDELL HULL, Mr. HASTINGS, and Mr. MCKEOWN, from my own State, found themselves at one time in the same position that we now occupy.

I do not call attention to that, my friends, for the purpose of bringing to them any unpleasant memories, but rather to call the attention of the country and their districts to the fact that in political upheavals such as happened in 1928 they make a mistake when they pay so little attention to any part of their ticket except the head of it, as was the case in 1920 and 1928. I further call your attention to this for the reason that the records show that after these distinguished gentlemen I have mentioned had been placed in the class I now occupy, at the next election the people of their districts rectified their mistake and sent them back, and the records will probably disclose that in most instances those who succeeded them for two years mainly represented their constituencies by answering roll calls and visiting the office of the Sergeant at Arms on the first of every month for the purpose of getting their salary checks. As a matter of fact, in every instance, I think their districts only declared a moratorium as to service for their districts or the Nation for a period of two years.

Mr. Chairman, I further want to call attention to the fact that these upheavals, of which myself and some of my colleagues are the victims at this time, come about periodically, and I want to ask the question: Are they beneficial to the Nation? It is true that some good men and some statesmen have come to Congress on these upheavals, but as a usual thing the men who come on occasions like those mentioned come from the minority party in their district, and, in many instances, are only placed upon the ticket to fill it up and get a little advertisement, and then, like the driftwood thrown up by the tide, they find themselves honored and lifted into Congress unexpectedly and without knowledge themselves of why.

As I said, good men sometimes come along with those upheavals, but in the upheaval of 1920, which was the same as the upheaval of 1928, along with the good men and along with the statesmen there came into this House a halfwit and another gentleman whose beard was so long that it would have created a greater impression in a side show than he did on the floor of this House.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. But, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I can not see—while I am not complaining—the application of the words "lame duck" to a man who is retiring from Congress. I have tried to find out why we are called "lame ducks." I have consulted my dictionary. I find that the definition of lame is "to be crippled; to be halt; inefficient." I have not noticed any of the gentlemen who are "lame ducks" in this or in other sessions who are halt, who are crippled, who are inefficient. I have not noted amongst the officers of this House, amongst the Members of this House, amongst the heads and the employees of the Government at Washington one single person who tried to make a defeated Member of Congress appear either lame, halt, or inefficient.

And then, Mr. Chairman, I went further. I looked up the definition of duck. I find the duck to be defined as "a short-legged, web-footed, water fowl." [Laughter.]

I have been in this House for six years. I am fairly well acquainted with every Member. Some of them may be short-legged; none of them that I know of are web-footed. Many of them are so dry that under no conditions would they even take to water.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. No; not now.

Others are so wet that I have never heard of them appealing even for a concoction so weak as water.

So I say that Members of Congress who have been defeated are not lame, Members of Congress who are still Members are not ducks, and why the application? But I guess it will continue and I have no objection, but I have this suggestion.

I looked further into the dictionary, and if you are "ducks" and if we are "lame," then the definition of a young duck is "duckling," and I suggest that if this session of Congress, by reason of the upheaval, is to be called a "lame-duck" session, that when you meet in April and these "ducklings" come in like the "ducklings" in a barnyard, untrained, unacquainted, and timid, that at least you do us the justice of calling that session the "duckling session." The same logic that designates this as a "lame-duck" session would make my suggestion as to the "duckling session" logical. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself one hour. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, this is the appropriation bill for the District of Columbia. It provides the amounts that are necessary in order to carry on the business of the District—schools, roads, lighting, fire and police protection, water, and all of the incidentals of municipal government.

An appropriation bill for a municipality has to follow along certain lines. Our committee got along very well in the consideration of this bill so long as we dealt with routine matters, but there are certain fundamental principles in connection with the administration of a municipality wherein I can not find myself in agreement with some of my colleagues.

CERTAIN ANOMALIES IN GOVERNMENT

For instance, the first anomaly we confront in connection with the District of Columbia is that every year the people of the District are taxed for a greater sum than is used for the purpose of carrying on the business of the municipality, and at that the tax rate is only $1.70 per $100, or $17 per $1,000.

THE PROGRAM OF PARSIMONY

Parallel with this anomaly—this vicious policy of collecting more money than is necessary for the administration of the affairs of the District—we find a parsimony and an incredible meanness in carrying out the planned improvements to make the Capital of the country beautiful or to make it comfortable to live in. We find the schools skimped year after year; the estimates of the commissioners reduced by the Bureau of the Budget and that action indorsed by a subcommittee of the House of Representatives.

THREE THOUSAND ONE HUNDRED AND SEVENTY-EIGHT HOMES WITHOUT SANITATION FACILITIES

We find large areas of the city of Washington without proper sewage facilities, and here is something that strikes at ourselves, that strikes at the very fundamentals of health and happiness in the District. There are 3,178 open privies in the District of Columbia, a shameful record of neglect that can not be equaled in any civilized city in our entire country; open latrines, no sewer connections, no water, depriving many thousands of families in over 3,000 homes of this necessary convenience of civilized society, endangering their own health and jeopardizing the health of every inhabitant within its purlieus against whom the tainted and polluted atmosphere of this section is blown by the varying winds.

I have taken up with the sewer department, not this year but every year, the proposition of what is necessary to be done in order to mitigate and finally remove these conditions. They have laid their estimates before the Budget. Our committee is familiar with the situation, but our hands are tied, because, forsooth, we dare not exceed the magic sum set forth by the Budget which must not be exceeded in the appropriations for the current year—or of any year.

Let me refer to this matter of sewers a little more in detail. I will not burden you with the obnoxious details, but I will take the liberty of putting in the RECORD this report on the latrine situation—I will use the refined term—and the sewer situation.

The estimate of the engineers was reduced this year from $400,000 to $346,000, even in the face of this menacing sanitary situation. Last year 88 of these privies were eliminated—think of it! Only 88 out of 3,178—and permits were granted for 25 more of these stench holes.

I have here in my hand a projected plan of sewers which will relieve the situation, and there is no reason in the world why this plan should not be put into execution.

COLLECTING TAXES NOT EXPENDED

It can not be claimed that the District of Columbia has not the money. Why, it was brought out at the hearings that there is a surplus fund of taxes collected and unexpended that is accumulating and lying dormant in the Treasury Department of the United States from which no human being derives any good except in so far as it may enhance the appearance of the Treasury daily balance. That amount is made up of the unused taxes that are collected from the people of the District. Now, whenever this question of the relations of the District with the Federal Government are brought up a good many of my colleagues shrug their shoulders and say, "Ah, do not bother yourself, the District is paying less than any other city in the country in real estate and personal taxes"—just as though it was a disgrace to have low taxation. Low real estate and personal taxes is not a rock in the harbor, but rather a haven toward which every ship should point. It is something to be desired, something to be achieved. My recollection is that New York City in 1895 had a tax rate of $1.58 on the $100 or $15.80 on the thousand, and the tax rate of New York City did not go up materially until after we launched those tremendously costly improvements, the new subways, the Riverside Drive, the great viaducts, and its wonderful array of bridges and tunnels.

Take the District of Columbia in comparison, and this Congress is the last body in the world that ought to complain about insufficiency of the taxes, because we give them nothing in return. If $1.70 is a sufficient amount to carry on the business of the District, what excuse is there to exact more? There are no costly municipal betterments in the District of Columbia to justify more. In other cities there are.

In New York City, for instance, we are bonded up to our capacity. Hundreds of millions of dollars are spent for subways, bridges, and tunnels. Taxpayers have to pay interest upon these tremendous amounts and in the District they are free. People say it is a good piece of legislation; they "pay as they go."

THE BUREAU OF EEFICIENCY REPORT

Now, on this question of taxation and the fiscal relations of the District, we set the Bureau of Efficiency to work, and they made a report. The other day my distinguished colleague from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS] got up on the floor and asked that it be printed as a public record. Now, I have taken from that report some interesting figures. This is going to affect nearly all of you and I hope you will give me your kind attention.

TAXES IN OTHER CITIES COMPARED

Cleveland, Ohio, with a population of 1,100,000, has a real-estate tax of $13.08 and a personal-property tax of $10.69.

St. Louis, Mo., with a population of 842,000, has a real-estate tax of $11.75 and a personal tax of $4.98.

Baltimore, Md., with a population of 830,000, has a real-estate tax of $11.77 and a personal tax of $4.93.

Milwaukee, Wis., with a population of 544,000, has a real-estate tax of $15.67 and a personal tax of $5.55.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I will be glad to.

Mr. SCHAFER. Where did the gentleman get his figures as to Milwaukee?

Mr. GRIFFIN. This is the adjusted tax rate.

Mr. SCHAFER. I do not think the gentleman's figures are correct. I just paid my taxes, and it does not correspond with his figures.

Mr. GRIFFIN. This is the adjusted tax rate, adjusted so as to bring the comparison in such a form that it can be compared with the Washington tax rate. The difference is due to the difference in the valuation of the property. You will find that explained in the report. I am dealing with the adjusted tax rates.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. The tax rate depends largely upon the valuation.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes; entirely.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. If the property was assessed at 25 per cent value, then that lowers the rate of taxation.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes; that is what the Bureau of Efficiency has done. They have made the equalization, as they call it, because in some jurisdictions, as the gentleman says, the property is only assessed at 25 or 30 per cent of its value, whereas in other jurisdictions it is assessed at 90 per cent, or, perhaps, full value.

Now to continue: New Orleans, La., with a population of 429,000, has a real-estate tax of $11.53 and a personal tax of $9.30.

Cincinnati, Ohio, with a population of 414,000, has a real-estate tax of $16.41 and a personal tax of $12.13.

Indianapolis, Ind., with a population of 382,000, has a real-estate tax of $11.01 and a personal tax of $10.65.

Washington, D. C., with a population of 525,000, has a real-estate tax of $17 on a thousand, on one class, excluding the returns of Federal property, and $17.29 when the Federal property tax is taken into consideration; with a corresponding variation in the personal tax of $8.01 in the first instance and $5.85 in the second instance.

So after seeing how things are done in other cities, and that they are not at all ashamed to have low taxes on real estate, surely it does not become us to complain about the low rate of taxation in Washington. At least it does not justify us to be unjust in our dealings with the District. It does not justify us to be picayune and mean; it does not justify us in denying the public improvements that are necessary in order to make this Capital of the Nation a safe and comfortable place in which to live.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. BOYLAN. Does the gentleman not think that the buildings and the improvements here should be a model for the rest of the Nation?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I am very glad that the gentleman has expressed that thought.

Mr. BOYLAN. The people come here and see these beautiful things, and they are then inclined to emulate them back home.

Mr. GRIFFIN. That, I think, is the aim of every American citizen. The city of Washington ought to be a model city. It ought to be a city with broad streets and avenues, fine pavements, model sanitation, beautiful parks, and handsome buildings.

THE LUMP-SUM PROBLEM

We now come to the question of the lump-sum appropriation, an aggravating problem that has been bothering the people of the District for a good many years. When I tried last year to give my views on this lump-sum proposition before the House, I was shut off rather unceremoniously because it was supposed that I was going to take the usual stand of saying that the lump-sum appropriation of $9,000,000 was not sufficient. I never took that position. I am not saying that it is insufficient. I am not saying that it is either too much or too little. What I am saying, and what I have been persistently saying to those who would listen to me, is that it is an unsatisfactory, unreasonable method of ascertaining or setting a valuation upon the obligation of the Federal Government to the District for the benefits which the people of the United States derive from the District itself.

I will try to present the argument in a logical and coherent manner. This is my argument, and I think it approximates very closely to a mathematical demonstration.

At first blush it seemed that fundamentally the National Government should grant to the District at least the amount of the taxes on Federal property which a citizen deriving the same advantage from the District would have to pay on the property.

That proposition was universally conceded, but the friends and foes of the lump sum were not able to agree on the amount. Some maintained that the Federal Government's indebtedness on a tax valuation and assessment was over $10,000,000.

Last year I tried to work the proposition out myself, and I made a calculation which I put into the RECORD on Friday, April 20, 1928. My estimate of the tax indebtedness of the Federal Government to the District was $7,055,000. The chairman of our subcommittee last year made an estimate, and his estimate was $5,819,210. The lump-sum allowance to the District is $9,000,000. Let us ascertain what the indebtedness of the Federal Government is as a bare tax proposition. Deduct that from the $9,000,000 and what do you get? In my case you get the difference between $7,055,000 and $9,000,000, or $1,945,000. What does that represent? Follow me; I mean the difference between the tax indebtedness of the Federal Government to the District and the $9,000,000 lump sum. It means that that is the valuation of those vague, undefined benefits that the Government is supposed to get from the District. It is an appraisal, if you please. My appraisal last year was $1,945,000. What was the appraisal of our good friend, Mr. SIMMONS, the chairman of the subcommittee? His appraisal last year was that the indefinite, undefined indebtedness of the Federal Government to the District was $3,180,790.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think that is a fair inference from what I said last year. What I said was that if we were to pay taxes on real estate we would reach a sum between $5,000,000 and $6,000,000. And that we were paying $9,000,000, and that whatever else the Government paid above that was to cover that.

Mr. GRIFFIN. The gentleman estimated the tax indebtedness of the Federal Government to the District at $5,819,210.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; but nowhere did I say that the balance of the $9,000,000 was a debt owing to the District government.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Oh, yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, no.

Mr. GRIFFIN. The gentleman surely implied that. That is the measure, as I take it, of what the Federal Government owes the District. That is an example of how indefinite, how vague and uncertain this lump-sum appropriation is bound to be in the very nature of things. At the meeting of the conferees between the House and the Senate last year we agreed that this matter should be referred to the Efficiency Bureau, and they produced this report that I have just referred to, and that report shows that the financial obligation of the Federal Government to the District is $7,440,000, or $385,000 above my estimate.

Now, here is the solution of the entire problem; this is the crux of the problem:

Having now the precise amount of the Federal Government's financial obligation to the District fixed at $7,440,000, we ought to ask ourselves, Is this all that the Government ought to contribute?

Are there no other obligations of the Federal Government to the community which has grown up around the Capital of the Nation—a community which has done so much to make the Capital so comfortable a place in which Government officials and visitors might abide?

Personally, I believe that when the Federal Government pays its taxes on merely its real estate and personal belongings it has not fulfilled its full obligation—but how much more it ought to contribute for those vague and intangible but nevertheless obvious benefits I am now unable to venture an estimate.

It is conceded that such benefits, although vague and indefinite, actually exist and have a material value. While I am not ready to appraise this value the upholders of the lump sum are ready on the instant to say that their value is the difference between the tax obligations of the Federal Government and the magic sum of $9,000,000.

Consequently when last year they maintained that the Federal Government's financial obligation to the District was $5,800,000 they in effect plainly admitted that the difference between that and $9,000,000 or $3,200,000 was the value of the vague and indefinite benefits accruing to the United States.

Now, this year, with the tax indebtedness of the Federal Government fixed by the Bureau of Efficiency at $7,440,000, they rather illogically, it seems to me, maintain that $1,560,000 is the proper Federal contribution to the District taxpayers.

The inexorable laws of logic have no influence on their minds; and the inherent absurdity of asserting last year that the contribution should be $3,200,000, but that this year it should be only $1,560,000, does not dawn on them.

No further elucidation of the illogical inconsistency of the lump-sum theory is needed. The mere statement of the situation answers its absurd pretentions.

Before we can answer the question, therefore, as to the precise financial obligation of the Federal Government to the District we are forced to the conclusion that the Bureau of Efficiency will have to be called in again to submit a report in detail as to the precise nature of what I have called the vague and indefinite benefits which last year were appraised at $3,200,000 and this year at only $1,560,000. Surely this obligation expressed in dollars and cents should not have taken such a spasmodic drop as that in one short year. Its very irregular and spasmodic variation from year to year shows its utter unreliability.

But, however that may be, I want to emphasize the position which I have consistently maintained from the beginning of the controversy. I hold simply that the amount of the Federal Government's contribution should not be fixed inexorably at a hard-and-fast unchanging figure but should be varied from year to year upon some sound formula that would take the problem out of the realms of guesswork and make it a matter of simple calculation each and every separate year.

Furthermore, I want to emphasize what I may take the liberty of calling a novel proposition, namely, that the interests of the taxpayers are not so woven inevitably with the problems of obtaining gratuities as in obtaining justice. By this I mean that they ought not to be taxed to raise moneys which are not spent for their benefit and the benefit of the District.

Here is the outstanding injustice in congressional handling of the District budget: For years the tax rate has been arbitrarily set at a certain figure, and the income derived has not been spent, but has been covered into the Federal Treasury, where it has lain idle and profitless to the taxpayers.

This maladministration of the fiscal relations of the District has been of long standing. By 1925, $5,257,528.75 had accumulated in this dormant reserve, and it required the act of Congress of February 2, 1925, to release it and make it available for public schools and parks.

The next year the same thing happened. A new dormant reserve was started, because the moneys raised by taxation were not spent and were covered into the Federal Treasury, without benefit to anyone except to swell the daily balances of the Federal Government. The next year the same thing happened, and so on from year to year; so that on June 30, 1928, there was lying idle in this dormant fund $6,200,000 of the taxpayers' money from which they never received a cent of benefit. If this condition was not due to obviously stupid mishandling of the finances of the District, it might be very justly denounced as a downright fraud on the taxpayer.

Verily, congressional meddling with District finances has made stepfathers of us all.

By July 1, 1929, this excess or surplus of unused funds will have been increased another $1,000,000, and by July 1, 1930, under even the appropriations of the current bill there will be a further augmentation of this unused income of $1,726,000, making a total of $8,926,000.

Reserving out of this sum $4,000,000, the amount required to be held in reserve under the act of 1922 for the obligations of the "pay-as-you-go policy," and a further $1,000,000 to meet deficiencies and supplementary estimates, there will be lying in the Treasury on July 1, 1930, the end of the period covered by the present appropriation bill an unused balance of $3,926,000 or nearly $4,000,000.

With this unused balance in prospect, what occasion is there to scrimp and pinch and deprive the Capital of the Nation of the sanitary facilities necessary to assure the health of over a half million people?

Why should we be parsimonious, why should we refuse the necessary improvements, improvements that go to the comfort and happiness and health of the people of the District?

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I will.

Mr. ARENTZ. For what purpose is the Emergency Hospital operated? For the benefit of all the people?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Absolutely.

Mr. ARENTZ. People coming in on a visit, people who live here, and people who meet with accidents?

Mr. GRIFFIN. This is the Capital of the Nation.

Mr. ARENTZ. Should the District of Columbia and the Government pay for this hospital and all operating expenses?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Both should contribute.

Mr. ARENTZ. I understand the charity chest is to include an item—I forget the exact amount, but something around $50,000—of a deficit owing to the difference between operating expense and income of the Emergency Hospital. I call that picayunish.

Mr. GRIFFIN. So do I. There is a case, by the way, that comes under the head of what I call the vague and indefinite, but, nevertheless, highly social and moral obligations of the Federal Government to the District taxpayers. Hundreds of thousands of visitors from all over the United States come to Washington; they use the hospitals, the libraries, the parks; their autos wear down the pavements. If Washington was a country town, it would not have this annual influx of strangers who use its facilities without contributing in the form of taxation. The burdens which they impose on the District is a moral obligation of the Federal Government.

Mr. ABERNETHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I will.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I was wondering if the gentleman was going to discuss the intolerable traffic conditions, particularly on Pennsylvania Avenue, where we have for one hour a day a traffic cop and another six hours we do not have any. I was wondering if the gentleman was going to enlarge on that subject?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I did not intend to, although it comes within the field, and perhaps we ought to consider it in the consideration of this bill under what the gentleman from Nevada refers to as picayunish. For instance, they have cut off several policemen in this bill.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I notice there on Pennsylvania Avenue a traffic cop will work along, and then he will go to dinner and nobody is there to take his place, or a man goes off to supper.

Mr. GRIFFIN. They have got to eat.

Mr. ABERNETHY. I understand they have; but what is going to happen to the traffic while they are eating?

Mr. GRIFFIN. You know some people go along and make a formula for themselves and say we have got to conform all human conduct to this particular formula. If traffic lights are set up on certain streets in Washington they say no police are necessary to be contiguous to them; therefore, they say, we will reduce the police force. If there were no fires during the last year they will say we have too many firemen, and they will say that having no fires last year we will take off a few firemen.

Mr. BOYLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I do.

Mr. BOYLAN. I would like to call attention to the fact, with which the gentleman perhaps is familiar, that in the District jail, having an average daily population of 550, there would be no resident physician, no nurses, no hospital facilities, no emergency facilities but for the generosity of a philanthropic woman of the city of Washington providing so they can pay the salary of a doctor and nurses. Does the gentleman know those facts?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I do.

Mr. BOYLAN. Is the city of Washington depending on charity and holding out the hat to get somebody to do something they should do for themselves?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes. That is one of the things underlying my arraignment of the stepfather government we have here in the District.

But I want before I close to show that there is absolutely no necessity from the state of finances for the exercise of this contemptible shortsightedness and meanness in the administration of the affairs of this big city.

I said there will be a balance of $4,000,000 in this reserve; certainly enough to cover some improvements and meet some of the objections that are made here on the floor. I know at least that it is sufficiently large to remove any occasion for pinching and shaving and depriving the inhabitants of the Capital of the improvements and accommodations that are necessary to their health and happiness.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. How much of that $2,600,000 will be left after Congress passes my bill for purchase of land for the community center down here?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Your bill calls for an expenditure of $2,600,000?

Mr. UNDERHILL. That is only for half of it. The bill to which you refer and which the committee introduced lets out two squares fronting Pennsylvania Avenue in order that those two squares can be increased in value by reason of the Federal building program on one side and the District of Columbia building program on the other side, and after you get around to the price of those two squares you will find that the price will be greater than that of the four squares would have been, and then some.

Mr. GRIFFIN. The actual balance on June 30, 1930, will be $10,200,000. I have eliminated from consideration the $4,000,000 to carry out the pay-as-you-go policy and $1,000,000 in addition to pay for the deficiencies carried in the supplemental estimates.

Mr. UNDERHILL. So far as the Federal Government goes in taking the land in the District, you will find that $4,500,000 incident to their taking this land is not within three or four or five hundred per cent of what they will have to pay, because when the Federal Government and the District government attempt to buy land for public improvement in Washington they jack up the price of the land several hundred per cent.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I share the gentleman's view in connection with this great civic center, but I am particularly concerned that Congress should provide to-day for the health and safety of the people of Washington. I think the building of sewers to accommodate these three thousand-odd families who are without sanitary accommodations is a more pressing necessity than civic centers.

Another point I neglected to mention was the sewer in Rock Creek Park. That is where you send your children to play. After every storm the slime from the surrounding hills and connecting sewers is swept into the creek, and in the summer season I wonder how much of that pollution lingers on the banks of the creek to menace the health of the little children.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. About 95 per cent of that pollution to which the gentleman refers comes from the State of Maryland. That was shown in the hearings a couple of years ago. I do not recall whether the gentleman was a member of the subcommittee at that time.

Mr. GRIFFIN. It is a situation that we have to confront here; a situation that we have got to handle here nevertheless.

Now, aside from the question of the civic center, which I claim should give away to considerations of public health and happiness, I want to summarize this for your mature deliberation:

What apology can be made to the world for the existence of 3,178 open privies polluting the atmosphere of a civilized city?

What excuse can be made for insufficient sewers in Rock Creek Park so that every heavy rain causes them to overflow their repulsive drainage into that beautiful stream that is the playground of the children of this District?

What excuse can be made to the parents of 5,000 children in 221 part-time classes in our public schools?

What excuse is there for defective paving and lighting of the streets of the city whose condition would shame the capital of the most backward nation? [Applause.]

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York reserves the balance of his time.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LETTS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. LETTS. Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose to bring to the attention of the House a bill which I introduced in the first session of this Congress. It is H. R. 8226, a bill to authorize the Inland Waterways Corporation to construct and operate warehouses and elevators on the Mississippi River. In order that the provisions of this bill may be better understood, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting at this point a copy thereof.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill referred to is as follows:

H. R. 8226, Seventieth Congress, first session

A bill (H. R. 8226) to authorize the Inland Waterways Corporation to construct and operate warehouses and elevators on the Mississippi River

Be it enacted, etc., That the Inland Waterways Corporation is authorized, out of any money hereafter made available therefor, to construct, maintain, and operate warehouses and elevators for the storage of agricultural products for interstate or foreign commerce at such locations upon the Mississippi River as the corporation deems most beneficial for the producers and shippers of such products and most advantageous for the development of the transportation system operated by the corporation.

SEC. 2. Before commencing the construction of any such warehouse or elevator, the corporation shall obtain the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture of the plans and specifications of such warehouse or elevator.

SEC. 3. The corporation shall, out of the revenues derived from the operation of such warehouses and elevators, to the extent that such revenues are sufficient therefor, pay the expenses of maintaining and operating, and provide for the amortization of the costs of constructing such warehouses or elevators. Any amounts accumulated for the purpose of such amortization shall be held by the board subject to such disposal as the Congress shall hereafter direct.

SEC. 4. The corporation in the operation of such warehouses and elevators—

(a) Shall not be subject to any provision of the interstate commerce act, as amended, or to regulation by the Interstate Commerce Commission;

(b) Shall be subject to the provisions of the United States warehouse act, as amended, without making application as therein provided, except the provisions of such act relating to the issuance of a license to a warehouseman, to the suspension or revocation of such license, and to the furnishing of bond by a warehouseman.

SEC. 5. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the construction, maintenance, and operation of such warehouses and elevators upon the Mississippi River above St. Louis the sum of $40,000,000.

Mr. LETTS. The purpose of this bill is twofold. It is apparent that if the barge line which is authorized and now operating on the Mississippi River is to be a success facilities must be afforded for the loading and unloading of freight. Riverside elevators and warehouses will supply such need in part. The plan set up in this bill is in aid of producers of agricultural commodities. It will afford them a place where their products may be stored, dried, and cared for, thus enabling such producers to hold such crops for future and better markets. It will enable such producers also to avail themselves of water transportation or rail transportation, as they may elect.

It is proposed that such warehouses and elevators are to be administered under the Federal warehouse act. Such law provides for issuing a form of negotiable warehouse receipt which constitutes a specific, definite contract between the depositor and the warehouseman and also carries full information as to grade, weight, and condition of the grain. In other words, it gives all the information that a banker, whether in Iowa or New York City, needs in order to determine whether he can afford to make a loan. It furnishes the producer of grains so stored a high form of collateral, which he may take to his local banker, who in turn will find them acceptable for rediscount purposes at the metropolitan banks, the Federal reserve banks, and intermediate-credit banks.

The country bank can not loan to advantage against wheat or corn in the farmers' bin or crib. In fact, it should not and does not, but it loans on what the banker knows about the farmer and his moral responsibility. This does not furnish paper which is available to the local banker for rediscount purposes. With warehouse receipts, issued under the United States warehouse act, as collateral, a bank with limited capital can extend its loaning ability and make itself a better financial agent.

This plan has received the support of the Iowa Bankers' Association at two or three different times within the last few years, and I have been advised that the bankers of Iowa would receive warehouse certificates as collateral for loans up to 80 or 85 per cent of the value of the crop stored.

The plan has been twice indorsed by resolutions adopted by the Mississippi Valley Association. I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point the resolution adopted by such association on November 23, 1926, assembled in convention at St. Louis, and the resolution adopted by that association at its annual meeting at St. Louis in 1927.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to further extend his remarks in the RECORD as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following are the resolutions referred to:

Resolution adopted by the Mississippi Valley Association at its 1927 annual meeting at St. Louis, November 15, 1927

As a constructive measure for farm relief and as a necessary part of the machinery of barge operation we believe in the plan proposed by the Iowa Bankers Association and heretofore approved by the Mississippi Valley Association to the effect that the Government erect large capacity grain elevators or commodity warehouses, as may be required—to be operated under the Division of Warehouses of the Department of Agriculture, at the main line rail crossings of the Mississippi and other rivers as soon as suitable for barge operation.

Resolution

Whereas the combined exports and imports of this country for the past 12 months has reached the amazing total of around $10,000,000,000; and

Whereas our farmers as a rule have not shared in this unprecedented tide of commercial activity; and in consequence the black rot of discontent now permeates the rural population of our country, especially so in its Mississippi Valley section, where the major crops are grown; and

Whereas the situation has become so acute that Congress has been importuned to take steps to render governmental aid to the stricken farmers, and in response to such appeal Congress, irrespective of party affiliations, has now under consideration various measures for so-called "farm relief," the fundamental purpose being to enable the farmer to realize better prices for his products, both for domestic consumption and for export; and

Whereas the item of transportation on the farmer's exportable surplus of grains has been materially reduced through the use of the Government owned and operated Federal Barge Line on the Mississippi River below St. Louis, and the operation of which above St. Louis is now scheduled for 1927, and to which operation the river bank grain storage elevator facilities are absolutely necessary, if the barges are to benefit the farmers, and no adequate elevator facilities as herein contemplated are now in existence at any point on the river between St. Louis and St. Paul; and

Whereas the use of such storage facilities will not only aid the railroads in the orderly movement of crops at the harvest period by conserving their grain equipment; will not only stimulate the erection, in close proximity to the farms upon which the grains are grown, of conversion mills, and thereby make available to the farmers at the lowest cost the resultant by-products in the form of commercial stock foods, with their intensive secondary fertilizing ingredients—but such will likewise, through the medium of the well-known Government bonded warehouse receipt, make liquid much of the farmers' paper now classed as "frozen assets" in the hands of the country banker: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Mississippi Valley Association in annual convention assembled this 22d day of November, 1926, at St. Louis, That we urge upon Congress as a measure of constructive and permanent relief for at least a part of the farmers' troubles, the simultaneous erection by the Government at all upper Mississippi River crossings by the main lines of the Granger roads, of a system of big capacity storage elevators, to enable the surplus grains that leave the farm to be most advantageously moved, without lost motion, by either barge or rail, to ultimate destination, domestic or foreign; and that similar aid to agriculture be extended at all such points on the lower Mississippi, and all other rivers as soon as they shall be used for commercial navigation;

That until such time as the system can be transferred to private operation to the best advantage of the Government such elevators be operated by the Government, preferably as a division of the Department of Agriculture, under the provisions of the United States warehouse act of 1916–1919, to the end that regulation negotiable warehouse receipts shall be issued to the depositors of grains, thereby providing a form of liquid security that will enable the farmer to finance his crop requirements to the best advantage; and

That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States and to each Member of Congress, and that the executive committee of this organization be instructed to take all necessary steps to secure its adoption by Congress at its forthcoming session in December of this year, and at all subsequent sessions, until the purpose of this resolution shall have been finally accomplished.

Mr. LETTS. The Iowa Bankers' Association is at this time continuing its interest in this matter, and only a few days ago a meeting was held in my home city of Davenport at the instigation of Mr. J. K. Deming, president Consolidated National Bank of Dubuque, who now heads the committee of the Iowa bankers with respect to this particular subject. That meeting was presided over by Mr. Lee J. Dougherty, president of the Guaranty Life Insurance Co., of Davenport, Iowa, and was attended by the following persons: R. I. Clysbee, Clinton; H. W. Seaman, Clinton; Fred Kleeberger, Clinton; O. A. Reynolds, Dubuque; J. A. Kerper, Seippel Lumber Co., Dubuque; J. K. Deming, president Consolidated National Bank, Dubuque; Charles Bond, Burlington; R. W. Baxter, Schoff & Baxter Grain Co., Burlington; and A. F. Petersberger, Milton Hult, R. W. McCreery, Bert Dow, Louis Bein, and C. R. Miles, Davenport.

In 1927 the Iowa bankers made a statement of purpose of its "river development committee," which has been headed up by Mr. Deming, of Dubuque.

I wish at this point to read that statement of purpose:

In these days of seemingly high marketing expenses it becomes apparent that attention could well be spent to consider ways and means to develop better inland waterways facilities. Water transportation has always been cheaper than other ways. Observations show that our river ports need better barge facilities if inland water transportation ways are to reach their maximum practicalness. The barge accommodations should be accessible as may be needed for river boats and also railroad connections. A number of Iowa river cities have already begun, through their own local appropriate civic organizations, giving attention to developing better barge and warehouse facilities. And now it is the hope that the Iowa bankers, working through this committee, will take time by the forelock to work and cooperate with other agencies to make all Iowa river railroad ports better able to handle farm and other commodities originating in Iowa for shipment to points outside or even for State importation so that greater economy in the transportation of such commodities will result and inure to our farmers, business men, and all other Iowans. It would seem that a greater Mississippi Valley waterways system is in the making. If that is so, then Iowans should be enabled to get their share of the benefit. Thus the work to which this committee can direct its attention becomes important for the future welfare of Iowa, which should not lag while any great Mississippi Valley waterways system is in the process of origin or development.

The bill to which I have referred is designed as a form of farm relief and at the same time to be in aid of river transportation. Let me suggest that at the present time many producers of cash grain, who are renters with little equipment and no money, often find it necessary to sell their grain when harvested to pay interest, taxes, store bills, and other charges. By being required through the exigencies of their situation to sell their products immediately when harvested they are compelled to take the cheapest price of the year. By storing and using the receipt of a bonded warehouse as the basis for credit they may borrow and discharge their obligations and carry the certificate and sell on a better market.

It has been stated upon good authority that a proper use of the barge line will reduce the freight charges on agricultural commodities of the Mississippi Valley about 10 cents per bushel. The discussion of matters pertaining to agricultural relief has developed the general belief that the domestic price for American farm products, where a surplus exists, equals the world price less freight. If it is true that the price of the surplus so exported and sold in a foreign market has the effect of fixing the domestic price, then it must necessarily follow that such domestic price can be increased upon the whole crop through the use of water transportation in handling the surplus. It perhaps is needless for me to say that 10 cents a bushel on farm products can easily be the difference between success and failure.

While the Panama Canal has been a boon to the country as a whole and to the world, its operation has put us who live in the Mississippi Valley under a severe handicap. Manufactures in Davenport, Iowa, and Moline, Ill., to supply their trade on the west coast, ship by rail to New York and by water through the Panama Canal and up the west coast and save considerable money by thus avoiding rail freight from the Mississippi River to the Pacific coast. It is therefore apparent that we in the Mississippi Valley are, because of the Panama Canal, under a handicap as regards our competition with eastern industry the amount of the freight between the Mississippi River and New York City. A successful use of the barge line, giving us the benefit of the Panama Canal, will take us out from under such handicap.

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LETTS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. What is the difference in time on a shipment by water and by rail?

Mr. LETTS. The time through the canal is very much longer.

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. The gentleman does not know what the difference in time is?

Mr. LETTS. No; I would not know exactly, but is very much more. It is true, however, with respect to many things such as farm implements, which are manufactured in large quantities in Moline and some parts of which are manufactured in my city of Davenport, that time means very little. It is only a question of getting your order in early enough.

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. What are the charges on a certificate from the time it is issued until the time a farmer gets his money? He indirectly pays for it, does he not?

Mr. LETTS. The farmer would pay the warehouse charge, which is comparable to the charge that is made by the warehousemen who are operating as individuals or as corporations. There is no purpose for the Government to furnish this service free of charge to the farmer.

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. There would be a charge made from the time the wheat is stored until the time the wheat is sold, would there not? There must be interest paid, must there not?

Mr. LETTS. Oh, yes. The farmer would have to borrow on his certificate and pay the interest. It is simply a facility. It is not offering him anything in the way of a dole or anything that would take any money whatever out of the Treasury of the United States. It would simply put the Government into the business of running a warehouse or an elevator which would, in my judgment, be entirely proper in this case, because I believe it is a facility which naturally belongs to the operation of the barge line. It would increase the business of the barge line and at the same time offer the farmer a proper place in which to store his grain.

It is the history of our part of the country that in the early days, when the railroads first came out there, that elevators were built in these river towns, and they were designed to take care of shipments of grain that would come to the river. The river in those days was extensively used, but as the railroads have developed and taken control of the business out through that part of the country, they have rendered these storage elevators on the river worthless and have carried the grains into Chicago. They have done that, I venture to say, in the interest of their own business. The long haul is the thing the railroads have sought and striven for all these years, and while the Mississippi River is the breaking point, the rate, as I understand it, is fixed by taking the rate to the river plus the short rate from the river into Chicago. It has made a very satisfactory piece of business for the railroads, and the railroads have prospered. I am not here fighting the railroads.

I want the railroads to be reasonably prosperous. I think they are necessary to our business life, but they ought to work in conjunction, in my judgment, with the experiment which the Government is putting on in operating this barge line, which represents a considerable investment on the part of the Government. We need some commodities, which ought to be floated down the river, to take care of the expenses of the downward journey. The boats bring up coal, salt, and commodities of that kind which can be handled in bulk and where time is of little or no consideration in the matter.

Mr. BOYLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LETTS. Certainly.

Mr. BOYLAN. Is it not the gentleman's experience that the railroads discourage water-borne traffic?

Mr. LETTS. It is my experience that they have done that.

Mr. BOYLAN. And they are not going to cooperate in any way because they fear this competition, do they not?

Mr. LETTS. They fear the competition of water transportation, and yet I am happy to say that at least one of the great transcontinental railroads, through its president, has announced the purpose of his company to cooperate with any practical movement of this kind for the development of the inland waterways system.

The bill which I introduced in December, 1927, was referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. No hearings have been held, chiefly for the reason that many of the friends of agriculture advised me against urging a hearing on the bill. This was done upon the belief that the measure of farm relief here presented was somewhat less in its scope than was desired and that it would be regarded as an interference with a full and complete consideration of the plan set up in the McNary-Haugen bill. I have never at any time wished to be in opposition to the sincere efforts of this House to come to the best solution of the difficulties involved in the farm problem. I do not now claim that this bill presents a full program for farm relief. Certain economic difficulties have arisen with respect to agriculture and its relation to industry and business in general. The plan herein suggested corrects some of the inequities that have arisen and is not in conflict with any theory or plan respecting cooperation and cooperative marketing. Indeed, it is fully in accord with any proper development of prevailing thought with respect to such matters.

If an extra session of the new Congress is called and its activities are limited by the organization of only a few committees, Ways and Means, Agriculture, and, perhaps, one or two others as has been suggested, I shall reintroduce this bill and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Agriculture so that it may have its proper consideration in conjunction with other proposals.

Grain elevators as now constructed are equipped with cleaning and drying facilities so that it is entirely conceivable that grains properly stored may be safely kept for a long time. The surplus in crops produced in the Middle West is not great and taken year by year such surplus would not distress the farmer. Most of our grains can safely be carried over from year to year. A surplus produced in a good year would be a blessing if carried over for use in a lean year. The difficulty in the situation is that of marketing. As I have intimated, many producers of cash grain find it necessary to dump their products on the market immediately when harvested. Thus is the case of the renter who has the grain but not the stock to eat it up and who is not financially able to carry the crop for a better market. He is at the mercy of his prospective purchaser, who, in many cases, is his neighbor, one who owns his own farm, has a bank account, and has his farm well stocked and who has not produced enough grain for his own purposes. This dumping process has been referred to as the glut in the market. It may be removed in a measure by avoiding the necessity for the immediate sale of cash grains. This can be accomplished if the grains may be held over as is contemplated in this bill and a warehouse receipt used for credit purposes.

In addition to the benefit which this plan would afford the farmer, I call attention to the fact that the Government is making a great experiment in the matter of river transportation and my proposal is in aid of that experiment as well as in aid to the farmer. The country is expecting a full and fair trial of the barge line. Much money has been spent in improving the channels of our inland rivers and much more should be expended in developing such waterways. It is a hope of the Middle West that the construction of the St. Lawrence seaway will give them a port for ocean-going vessels at Chicago and that the great Mississippi, the Ohio, the Illinois, and the Missouri Rivers may become useful arms of the sea. It is the hope of the Mississippi Valley that the handicap which has been placed upon her products through the economic use of the Panama Canal may be removed and that our corn and wheat and other products may be put on a fair and equal level of competition with other sections of the country.

To my mind the bill is worthy in all respects save one. I admit that it puts the Government in business—a thing not to be desired—and yet if the Government is justified in operating and owning a barge line it is justified in carrying on another business which is necessarily an auxiliary to it. When the Government has completed its experiment and determines to turn the barge line over to private industry, it may, if it wishes, make the same disposition of its grain elevators.

I trust the Congress will adopt this plan, which seems to have the approval of the bankers of Iowa as expressed in two annual meetings and of the Mississippi Valley Association, which is composed of many men of learning and thought, men who have studied the river, men who knew the old river, knew the business that was transacted on the river and realize the possibilities that are before us, men who realize what the saving in freight expense would be if the Mississippi River and its tributaries could be again harnessed and put to work for the benefit of the people who live in the contiguous territory. [Applause.]

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Chairman, during the temporary absence of the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN], I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BOYLAN].

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I notice in the public press that there is quite a controversy going on between the Secretary of the Treasury and some political bishops about the use of an extra fund of $25,000,000 for the enforcement of prohibition. This is cited just to show the fanaticism of some men who are interested in prohibition enforcement.

I might say one of these political bishops claims to be the original "Hoovercrat" and also that he carries in his vest pocket the control of a great, sovereign State. Furthermore, I notice in the daily press that the Christian Herald, of New York City, has awarded him the prize for the most outstanding religious work for the year 1928.

I would like to suggest to the Christian Herald that instead of awarding him the prize for outstanding religious work they should amend it and properly say they have awarded it to him for outstanding political work.

The good Secretary of the Treasury says that if he used this additional $25,000,000 it would endanger the Budget. Well, these political bishops do not care anything about the Budget, especially when it comes to the enforcement of their particular fanatical ideas; that does not amount to anything.

The distinguished Secretary of the Treasury says that it would not help the courts; that it would not help the border patrol or the Coast Guard. Oh, that is immaterial. What do they care about the courts or the border patrol or the Coast Guard, so long as they get the additional $25,000,000 for prohibition enforcement?

The Secretary says, in part:

> I beg to acknowledge receipt of your telegram of January 18, in which you suggest that the appropriation of $25,000,000 for the Prohibition Bureau as contained in the so-called Harris amendment to the first deficiency bill be made available so as to be expended by the Secretary of the Treasury—

And so forth.

He goes on to say:

> As I pointed out in my letter of January 12 to Senator WARREN, prohibition enforcement does not solely rest upon the Bureau of Prohibition, but its success depends largely on the cooperation afforded by the Coast Guard, the Customs Service, and the border patrol, and what is even of more importance, on the possibility of bringing to trial cases prepared by the Prohibition Bureau and ready for trial.

Then he goes on to say that the courts are congested and that this would interfere with the Budget.

> Such a program—

He says—

> would break down the safeguards of the Budget system and the effective and proper control which Congress exercises over the expenditure of public funds.

Well, this does not mean anything to these political bishops, and, furthermore, Doctor Doran tells the Woman's Christian Temperance Union practically the same thing—

My department can not use this money because it has to be coordinated with various other branches in order to secure proper enforcement.

However, this does not mean anything to these political bishops. They only see one thing and that is enforcement of prohibition.

This is along the same line as something that has been done in one of our sovereign States, a State that has very many excellent Representatives in this House, and a State that usually is progressive and alert and in the forefront of anything tending toward the development of its resources or for the betterment of its people, and yet this great sovereign State has been so carried away by this prohibition-enforcement business that they send to prison for life, gentlemen, for life, a woman convicted of selling a pint of whisky! What a travesty on justice!

I have here in my hand a beautiful cartoon illustrating the development of civilization in the United States, particularly in the State of Michigan. This cartoon is from the Washington Daily News of Thursday, January 10, 1929. It depicts a poor, forlorn woman, the mother of 10 children, in the custody of gigantic bailiffs, arraigned before a judge armed with instruments of torture, who sentences her for life to the State prison for the selling of 1 pint of liquor. How very creditable all this is to the State of Michigan.

They sentenced the woman to prison for life, gentlemen—think of it—for selling 1 pint of liquor. With your permission I would like to have the cartoon inserted in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting the cartoon.

Mr. TILSON. Oh, no, Mr. Chairman; he can describe it as accurately as he pleases by words, but when it comes to putting it in the RECORD that can not be allowed.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Connecticut object?

Mr. TILSON. Yes; I object.

Mr. BOYLAN. I regret that the gentleman objects, as this is a very edifying and instructive cartoon. It would be well for the people of the United States to read the RECORD and see the cartoon. I regret exceedingly that the distinguished leader of the majority should press his objection.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman will realize that cartoons are not published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It is not a discrimination against the cartoon to which the gentleman refers; it is simply not done.

Mr. BOYLAN. My purpose is an educational one. [Laughter.] This cartoon illustrates the progress and development of civilization in the State of Michigan, and I am sure the gentleman would like to have the people of the country enlightened on that subject.

Mr. TILSON. I have no objection to the gentleman using all his eloquence in describing the cartoon. He may use all of his fine powers of description to describe it so accurately that the people can see it in their mind's eye, but to reproduce the cartoon itself in the RECORD, no.

Mr. BOYLAN. The gentleman knows that this is the day of tabloids, that the people do not want to read much, they want to look at the pictures. But since the gentleman insists on his objection I will not press the matter. [Laughter.]

Now, I would like to read a letter from Henry H. Curran, president of the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment, on the occasion of the ninth anniversary of prohibition. It is as follows:

Now that nine years of prohibition are up, an accurate inventory of the blessings which it has showered upon us indicates that we have outdone Captain Kidd, because we now have not only the smugglers and pirates of the days of golden doubloons but we also boast a complete equipment of bootleggers, hijackers, racketeers, gunmen, and even the lowly but useful kibitzers. We are also blessed with speak-easies, hooch on the hip, bubbling vats, and steaming stills in the kitchens of the land, a bumper crop of drinking drys, and an interesting transformation of the churches of religion of yesteryear into the town halls of tyranny of to-day. And I nearly forgot the nightly movie of father and mother sitting up beside the family lamp and wondering whether daughter will get home from the hipmobile party in time for breakfast.

All of those things we have in the United States. No other nation in the world has them, except possibly Finland, which still staggers under prohibition, just as we do. Many of the other nations tried prohibition, but did away with it as soon as the racketeers and all the rest began to appear. Only the plain Finns over there and the poor fish over here still flop feebly in the net of the prohibitors.

Some day it will be different. We got ahead a little when President Coolidge first gave us leave to be opposed to the eighteenth amendment, and then a little later on told us that we might even say so. Much obliged. Some of us have been saying so for some time, with or without leave. Now, about 50,000,000 Americans are saying so nearly every day as they conduct their own little individual daily American revolutions against prohibition, even to the extent of rolling their own in the home if they can not obtain the ready-made product.

And all this about a glass of wine; sinners all! Next it may be a cup of coffee that incurs the ire of the prohibitors, or a cigarette, or the theater and the movies, or the short, short skirt and the long, long trousers.

All in all, it seems to me that on this ninth anniversary of prohibition day we should all give credit to the prohibitors for these blessings they have conferred upon us—and maybe there's more in the bag that we do not know of even yet.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman 10 minutes more.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Has the gentleman seen any signs of prohibition in this country?

Mr. BOYLAN. I can answer the gentleman by saying that I have not. That is further emphasized by the fact that distinguished visitors from foreign lands visiting our shores after staying here several months say that they have seen absolutely no signs of prohibition, and they further say that they can get a better cocktail or highball here in the United States than they can at home. [Laughter.]

Now here is another letter that I would like to insert in the RECORD from Mr. C. C. Hanch, of Chicago, in relation to the practical solution of the liquor problem. It is not a cartoon, merely a 2-page letter, and with the permission of the House I would like to include it in my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to insert the letter indicated in his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter follows:

JANUARY 14, 1929.

Hon. JOHN J. BOYLAN,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: On July 25, 1928, I wrote to you in part, as follows: "As a practical solution for the liquor problem I submit the following: Leave the eighteenth amendment alone. Amend or repeal the Volstead Act and provide by Federal law for the manufacture of old-fashioned, wholesome pre-Volstead beer, nonintoxicating in fact, and its sale to householders by the case and in reputable eating places by the bottle or glass, under suitable governmental regulation and taxation. Abolish the saloon in fact and not in theory, as has been done under the Volstead law. Provide by Federal law, under suitable regulation and taxation, for the manufacture of pure wines and intoxicating liquors by authorized concerns and for their sale by licensed druggists on prescriptions of physicians, who are members in good standing of a local, State, or national medical society, the by-laws of which limit its membership to ethical and reputable practitioners. Provide for the issuance of sacramental wines under proper and reasonable regulations. Home making (which is not manufacture) of wines and ciders for household uses and not for sale shall be permitted."

Since the above was written, 15,000,000 votes were cast for Hon. Alfred E. Smith on a personal platform pledging an amendment of the Volstead law giving a scientific definition of the alcoholic content of an intoxicating beverage and 21,000,000 votes were cast for Hon. Herbert C. Hoover on a party platform which made no reference whatever to the Volstead Act. Mr. Hoover said that he did not favor the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, that our country has deliberately undertaken a great social and economic experiment which must be worked out constructively and that grave abuses have occurred which must be remedied.

Since my solution was presented, a prominent citizen has offered a prize of $25,000 for the best and most practicable plan to make the eighteenth amendment effective. Over 23,000 plans were submitted. The selection of one plan by any committee of men is an unimportant incident, but the cross-section of public sentiment disclosed by the contest is very significant. The largest single group, consisting of 5,340 contestants, urged modification of the Volstead Act, while only 744 suggested modification of the eighteenth amendment.

My proposed solution is both constructive and practicable. It will compose the liquor controversy without having saloons or nullifying or violating the eighteenth amendment. It will promote temperance and discourage hip-flask toting. It will conserve public health by removing most of the incentive for production and consumption of poisonous liquors. It will materially reduce violations of the statutes and result in much greater respect for law. It will meet the reasonable demands of organized labor—the working man's club. It will also aid materially in solving the farmers' problem by affording a market for surplus fruits and grains. This statement is supported by the fact that in 1918, according to Government statistics, $110,000,000 worth of farm products were consumed by breweries. In June, 1918, grain was being used in the brewing of beers at the rate of approximately 4,500,000 bushels per month. This consumption of surplus farm products was stopped by the Volstead Act, not by the eighteenth amendment.

Unfortunately the public has been led to believe that the Volstead Act and the eighteenth amendment are the same thing or at least inseparably connected. A recent check of 56 men in various walks of life disclosed that only 1 of the 56 knew the difference between the Volstead Act and the eighteenth amendment. Probably half or more of the voters privately believe that the Volstead Act is unreasonable and unwarranted without realizing that they have no just grievance against the eighteenth amendment if it is properly interpreted.

This alone accounts for the fact that the Volstead Act never has been and never can be successfully enforced. The only possible way to enforce the Volstead Act effectively would be to have a vast army of efficient and honest men for that purpose. Very few men who are both capable and honest will accept the job of enforcing the Volstead Act, unless they are prohibition zealots. The number of available zealots is small as compared to the number of men required to enforce the Volstead Act. If a man is both capable and honest he can readily obtain other employment more remunerative and less self-degrading than the work of enforcing the Volstead Act. Therefore, aside from prohibition zealots, the only people available as a rule to enforce the Volstead Act are those who are not both capable and honest. No matter how attractive the work may be to a prohibition zealot, the average man who is both capable and honest is not attracted by the job of pocket patting, snooping, spying, violating the law in order to procure evidence and similar activities which are more degrading to those who employ them than to those who are the victims.

Grave abuses will continue so long as the present system lasts. It must be amended and worked out constructively by the majority which is temperate in action and speech. It can not be done by catering to the intemperate drys or the immoderate wets.

A reply will be appreciated.

Very truly yours,

C. C. HANCH,

Mr. BOYLAN. In conclusion, gentlemen, I want particularly to invite your attention to the fanaticism that seems to possess some people when they come to discuss the problem of prohibition. It seems as if every law or rule or course of conduct is disregarded when this sacred subject is mentioned.

I do not say that for the mere purpose of saying it; it is not my say so, but it is evidenced by the fact, as I stated to you, that these two political bishops have it in their mind when they sent the most insulting communication by telegraph to our distinguished Secretary of the Treasury merely because he did not agree with them in seeking from Congress an additional appropriation for the enforcement of the prohibition law.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Does the gentleman refer to the clerical gentleman named Cannon?

Mr. BOYLAN. He is one of the political bishops I refer to—the leading Hoovercrat of the South, he styles himself.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. May I call the gentleman's attention to a remark by a great statesman in New York. We had a Cannon here who proposed to control the destinies of the Government. And this statesman said, "He is not a Cannon; he is not even a toy pistol."

Mr. BOYLAN. I think the distinguished gentleman who said that spoke in modesty, because I think he was certainly a real Cannon, and this Cannon that I speak of, I think, would fall under the gentleman's appellation of the toy pistol or popgun.

Mr. Chairman, when distinguished men, men of broad learning, men who perhaps have traveled and been able to get away from their own little environment, men who are able to get out and rub shoulders with the world, men who probably have traveled over it—when such men take such a narrow viewpoint and stand it is indicative to my mind that it is due not to their real intellectuality, or their own personal thought, but that they take the position they do because of an association with which they are connected; an association, I am sorry to say, that wields a great influence over many members of the legislatures of the different States of the Union, and possibly, I may say, over some Members of this House; but, gentlemen, I feel that this thing will be carried so far by them that there will have to be a reaction. I welcome the day when the Members of this House will be able to throw off this octopus which is saddled on their shoulders and will exercise their own thought and be actuated by the dictates of their own conscience in the treatment of this and other subjects. I believe that no civic organization, no matter how laudable its purposes, should be held to be above the Congress of the United States, to be sort of a supergovernment, and yet this particular organization flaunts its power and delights in laying the lash on the backs of those who will not agree with their views. This is indicated by the insulting telegram sent by them to our distinguished Secretary of the Treasury. But from what I know of him I think he is going to stand up, he is not going to be at all perturbed by any admonition he may receive from this association. I sincerely trust that the Members of this House will follow his example in voting on this proposed legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KVALE].

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for time for the purpose of reading into the RECORD an article which lately appeared in the New York Times. That article is as follows:

WHO WAS THE FIRST PRESIDENT?

Seymour Wemyss Smith, editor of the Financial Digest, who has striven for three years to win national recognition for "The President we forget," John Hanson, is planning to carry his fight to the floor of the United States Senate, he announced recently. Mr. Smith maintains that John Hanson preceded Washington by eight years and that he has been overlooked in history's rush.

"John Hanson," Mr. Smith explains, "was the first President under the original Constitution—the Articles of Confederation—and was elected in November, 1781. There is an oil painting of him in Independence Hall at Philadelphia. George Washington," Mr. Smith goes on, "was the first President under what was known in his day as the 'new Constitution.' He was inaugurated in 1789, seven years after the close of Hanson's administration.

"It is a strange fact, indeed, that Hanson's name is not only unfamiliar to the average reader, but is not listed in the Britannica, the Americana, and other standard encyclopedias. He is likewise absolutely unknown to the majority of students of American history."

In one of several articles on John Hanson, which Mr. Smith has published, he says:

"The guns at Yorktown were thundering a month before John Hanson took office; the Articles of Confederation had just been signed; the first steps in the organization of the United States of America had been completed.

"And it was during the administration of President John Hanson that the first bank was chartered by Congress, that the United States Post Office Department was established, that the Consular Service was organized. It was John Hanson who officially thanked George Washington for his services as commander in chief of the Colonial forces.

"Yet John Hanson is forgotten. Hundreds of lesser figures have lived in history's undying pages. The United States has passed by its first Chief Executive, the stalwart guide who was at the helm of the ship of State during its initial voyage.

"In point of accomplishment few men in our history have done more, Hanson was elected President by Congress soon after the signing of the Articles of Confederation and a few weeks after Cornwallis had turned his sword over to Washington. Moreover, he was himself responsible for the terms of the settlement whereby the different States gave up their various claims to the vast lands in the West, thereby making possible a firm and lasting Union.

"John Hanson was a native of Maryland, his ancestors having come to this country from Sweden in 1655. His father, Capt. Samuel Hanson, became prominent in the life of his Colony and John Hanson himself, born on April 3, 1715, was one of the most prominent men in the Southern Colonies before the Revolutionary War, having served from 1757 to 1768, in the Maryland Assembly.

"At the beginning of the Revolution, the Province of Maryland had little cause for unrest, as the colonial governor, Sir Robert Eden, was a popular figure and the people had a representative government which satisfied them very well. John Hanson was one of the first prominent men in the Colony, however, to see that the Colonies must stand united in their resistance to the tyranny of George III and his militaristic advisers. Hanson was a delegate to a conference held at Annapolis in 1774 to consider the situation and he was a member of a committee appointed to act for the Colony, and later was its chairman. For three successive terms he represented Maryland in the Continental Congress.

"Then came the opportunity which brought John Hanson to the fore and resulted in his election as first President of our country. It was in 1777 that the plan for the Union of States was first proposed and within 15 months 12 of the States had agreed to form the new nation according to the plan as outlined. But one State opposed the Articles of Confederation as first proposed. That State was Maryland, and John Hanson was responsible for taking this stand, his attitude resulting in one of the greatest steps forward in American history and making possible the expansion of the United States on a sound economic basis.

"Under the original Articles of Confederation each of the States made claims to extensive Western lands. New York, Connecticut, Massachusetts, and Virginia, for instance, claimed ownership of what is to-day the States of Michigan, Wisconsin, Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio. In other words, each of the larger States wished to be a sovereign power with vast possessions outside of its own borders. This would inevitably have resulted in bitter conflict, possibly civil war soon after the beginning of the new country. It would have greatly retarded expansion and reduced the great Midwestern States to the position of mere Colonies.

"John Hanson and Daniel Carroll, his associate on the Maryland delegation in the Continental Congress, absolutely refused to enter the new country under the above conditions and Hanson suggested the alternative plan. Maryland offered to give up forever its claim to western lands and to sign over its territories to the Federal Government if the other States would follow suit. One by one they fell into line and finally, in March, 1781, the 12 other States having already signed away their claims, John Hanson attached his signature as Delegate from Maryland, with the understanding that the new lands ceded to the Federal Government would be used to create new States as the expansion westward warranted.

"A few months after the signing of the Articles of Confederation, the British Army suffered severe reverses, and finally, in October, 1781, Conwallis surrendered at Yorktown. And as he passed over his sword, the English commander was actually giving up the last claim which Britain had to its vast American Colony.

"Then on Monday, November 5, 1781, John Hanson was elected President by Congress—his formal title being 'President of the United States in Congress assembled,' and in that capacity he not only presided over Congress but was in fact, as well as in name, the country's Chief Executive. In the brief interval between the signing of the Articles of Confederation and the election of Hanson, Congress had temporarily elected Thomas McKean, chief justice of the Pennsylvania Supreme Court, to preside over its sessions which were being held in Philadelphia. However, it was distinctly understood that he was serving in a temporary capacity and when Hanson was elected he was actually the first President of the United States.

"On November 29, 1781, John Hanson, over his signature as 'President of the United States in Congress assembled,' sent a message to 'Lewis the Sixteenth, King of France and Navarre, our great, faithful, and beloved friend and ally.'

"On Monday, March 11, a bill establishing the United States Post Office Department was read to Congress, this marking the beginning of our present system, forbidding the competition of private mail carriers and providing the franking privilege on Government correspondence.

"When the Congress assembled on April 15, it was announced that President Hanson was ill and unable to be present. During the five previous months the first national bank had been chartered, the Consular Service had been established, the Post Office Department had been organized, and scores of lesser matters had received the attention of the venerable Chief Executive, now in his sixty-eighth year.

"A motion to name a temporary chairman to preside over Congress during President Hanson's illness was made by John Morin Scott and was voted down; also a resolution by Samuel Livermore providing for a Vice President. A third motion to fill the vacancy was made by Thomas Bee, of South Carolina, and was adopted. It read:

"'That whenever the President—John Hanson—for the time being shall be prevented by sickness or otherwise from attending the House, one of the Members present shall be chosen by ballot to act as chairman for the purpose of keeping order only, but that all official papers shall nevertheless be signed and authenticated by the President as heretofore.'

"It is significant that Daniel Carroll, associated with Hanson as Maryland's Representative, was chosen for the place.

"Hanson returned to his duties a few months later, but he was tired with his work of the previous years, and in November, 1782, he retired as President and died in the following year. Elias Boudinot followed Hanson as 'President of the United States in Congress assembled.' John Hancock was elected to succeed Boudinot, but owing to poor health was unable to act, and Nathaniel Gorham, of Massachusetts, had the title for a brief period before the new Constitution went into effect.

"It is strange, indeed, that John Hanson, the stalwart statesman and first President, has been so greatly overlooked, particularly in view of the fact that the records of Congress prove the accuracy of the above facts."

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOOPER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 16422, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. LOZIER, at the request of Mr. CANNON, for three days, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. MURPHY, at the request of Mr. COOPER of Ohio, on account of sickness.

INAUGURAL CEREMONIES

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate Joint Resolution 180, authorizing the granting of permits to the Committee on Inaugural Ceremonies on the occasion of the inauguration of the President elect in March, 1929, and for other purposes, an identical House resolution being on the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate Joint Resolution 180, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk reported the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman to say that a similar House resolution has been reported from the committee?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this is surely emergency legislation, and I think there should be no objection to it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate Joint Resolution 180

Resolved, etc., That the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks of the National Capital is hereby authorized to grant permits, under such restrictions as he may deem necessary, to the Committee on Inaugural Ceremonies for the use of any reservations or other public spaces in the city of Washington under his control on the occasion of the inauguration of the President elect in March, 1929: Provided, That in his opinion no serious or permanent injuries will be thereby inflicted upon such reservations or public spaces or statuary thereon; and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may designate for such and other purposes on the occasion aforesaid such streets, avenues, and sidewalks in said city of Washington under their control as they may deem proper and necessary: Provided, however, That all stands or platforms that may be erected on the public spaces aforesaid, including such as may be erected in connection with the display of fireworks, shall be under the supervision of the said inaugural committee, and in accordance with the plans and designs to be approved by the Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia, the officer in charge of public buildings and grounds, and the Architect of the United States Capitol: And provided further, That the reservations or public spaces occupied by the stands or other structures shall after the inauguration be promptly restored to their condition before such occupation, and that the inaugural committee shall indemnify the War Department for any damage of any kind whatsoever upon such reservations or spaces by reason of such use.

SEC. 2. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to permit the committee on illumination of the inaugural committee for said inaugural ceremonies to stretch suitable overhead conductors, with sufficient supports wherever necessary, for the purpose of connecting with the present supply of light for the purpose of effecting the said illumination: Provided, That if it shall be necessary to erect wires for illuminating or other purposes over any park or reservation in the District of Columbia the work of erection and removal of said wires shall be under the supervision of the official in charge of said park or reservation: Provided further, That the said conductors shall not be used for conveying electrical currents after March 8, 1929, and shall, with their supports, be fully and entirely removed from the streets and avenues of the said city of Washington on or before March 15, 1929: And provided further, That the stretching and removing of the said wires shall be under the supervision of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, who shall see that the provisions of this resolution are enforced, that all needful precautions are taken for the protection of the public, and that the pavement of any street, avenue, or alley disturbed is replaced in as good condition as before entering upon the work herein authorized: And provided further, That no expense or damage on account of or due to the stretching, operation, or removal of the said temporary overhead conductors shall be incurred by the United States or the District of Columbia.

SEC. 3. The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy be, and they are hereby, authorized to loan to the Committee on Inaugural Ceremonies such hospital tents, smaller tents, camp appliances, ensigns, flags, and signal numbers, etc., belonging to the Government of the United States (except battle flags) that are not now in use and may be suitable and proper for decoration, and which may, in their judgment, be spared without detriment to the public service, such flags to be used in connection with said ceremonies by said committee under such regulations and restrictions as may be prescribed by the said Secretaries, or either of them, in decorating the fronts of public buildings and other places on the line of march between the Capitol and the Executive Mansion and the interior of the reception hall: Provided, That the loan of the said hospital tents, smaller tents, camp appliances, ensigns, flags, and signal numbers, etc., to said committee shall not take place prior to the 23d of February, and they shall be returned by the 9th day of March, 1929: Provided further, That the said committee shall indemnify the said departments, or either of them, for any loss or damage to such flags not necessarily incident to such use. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to loan to the inaugural committee for the purpose of caring for the sick, injured, and infirm on the occasion of said inauguration, such hospital tents and camp appliances, and other necessaries, hospital furniture and utensils of all descriptions, ambulances, horses, drivers, stretchers, and Red Cross flags and poles belonging to the Government of the United States as in his judgment may be spared and are not in use by the Government at the time of the inauguration: And provided further, That the inaugural committee shall indemnify the War Department for any loss or damage to such hospital tents and appliances, as aforesaid, not necessarily incident to such use.

SEC. 4. The Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized to permit the Western Union Telegraph Co. and the Postal Telegraph Co., the Chesapeake & Potomac Telephone Co., and radio-broadcasting companies, to extend overhead wires to such points along the line of parade as shall be deemed by the chief marshal convenient for use in connection with the parade and other inaugural purposes, the said wires to be taken down within 10 days after the conclusion of the ceremonies.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I understand that this is substantially the same resolution that has been agreed to on the occasion of former inaugurations. Is that correct?

Mr. ZIHLMAN. This resolution, I am informed, is in identical form to the resolutions that have been adopted for the past 20 years.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I think it is in regular form. I just want to ask the gentleman from Connecticut if he does not think, however, that really we ought to postpone the passage of this resolution until after the counting of the votes in February, in order that we may know absolutely who was elected and who will be inaugurated? [Laughter.]

Mr. TILSON. If the gentleman thinks there is any serious doubt on that question there might be something to his proposition, but even so we shall have to inaugurate somebody, and we might just as well make preparation for it. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Yes; but, of course, just what sort of an inauguration that person would want might also enter the question. [Laughter.] However, to speak seriously, the gentleman from Connecticut is not a member of the inaugural committee of the House?

Mr. TILSON. No; the chairman of the Committee on Rules was made the chairman of that committee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. At some of the inaugurations that I have witnessed there has been discrimination, so to speak, against those who were assembled at the Capitol stand in the matter of the parade. I do not think in the last two or three inaugurations that that has been the case. I understand that for this inauguration there will be constructed a platform at the east front of the Capitol which will accommodate quite a large number of people. That, of course, is exclusively under the control of the Congress. This resolution, I take it, deals more with matters down the Avenue and permits generally in the District of Columbia away from the Capitol Grounds. I think that those who have some responsibility in connection with the Capitol end of this proceeding ought to obtain from whoever may be in charge of the parade and its direction a very clear understanding that that parade will be formed at such a place on Capitol Hill as that it will pass the stands erected here for the benefit of the guests of the Members of Congress.

That has not always been done in the past and created a great deal of disappointment on the part of holders of tickets. I hope it will be done this year.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

A similar House resolution was laid on the table.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, which was ordered to lie on the table:

STATE OF MINNESOTA,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

I, Mike Holm, secretary of state of the State of Minnesota, do hereby certify that I have compared the annexed copy with record of the original instrument in my office of joint resolution memorializing the President of the United States and the Congress of the United States relative to the passage of H. R. 7729, approved January 17, 1929, and that said copy is a true and correct transcript of said instrument and of the whole thereof.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State, at the capitol, in St. Paul, this 17th day of January, A. D. 1929.

[SEAL.]

MIKE HOLM,
Secretary of State.

A joint resolution memorializing the President of the United States and the Congress of the United States relative to the passage of H. R. 7729

Whereas there is now pending in the Congress of the United States H. R. 7729, a bill to divest goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured, produced, or mined by convicts or prisoners of their interstate character in certain cases, which bill, if passed and approved by the President, will effectively cripple and destroy the twine and farm machinery industry now operated by the State of Minnesota at the State prison in Stillwater, Minn., for the reason that said plant can not be successfully operated if the products produced therein can not be sold to farmers in States outside of Minnesota; and

Whereas for many years past the farmers of the States of Minnesota, Wisconsin, Iowa, Nebraska, North Dakota, South Dakota, and Montana have saved many millions of dollars by reason of the operation of said twine and farm machinery industry by the State of Minnesota because they have been able to purchase said products at prices materially lower than the same could be purchased from any other source; and

Whereas the farmers of the Northwest, including the States above named, have for many years been laboring under many serious economic disadvantages and in particular have suffered seriously from high prices of all their requirements by reason of which the agricultural industry is seriously depressed. The fact that farmers in such States have been able to obtain twine and farm machinery manufactured and sold by the State of Minnesota constitutes the only real practical farm relief which has been extended to them; and

Whereas the farmers of the Northwest and of the State of Minnesota have by their constant watchfulness and support of the twine and farm machinery department of the State of Minnesota preserved the same from efforts which have been made from time to time by competitors and others to throttle and destroy said industry; and

Whereas said bill should be amended so as to permit twine and agricultural machinery to be manufactured and sold by any State upon its own account as distinguished from said products being manufactured by a contractor and that such products be permitted to be transported and sold in any other State or Territory: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, That the Congress of the United States be, and is hereby, urgently petitioned to amend said bill as above indicated; be it further

Resolved by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, That in case said bill is not so amended as to except therefrom twine, farm implements, and machinery manufactured by the State of Minnesota, that we most earnestly urge upon the President of the United States that said bill be returned to Congress without the Executive's approval, and that the same be vetoed unless the same be so amended; be it further

Resolved, That a duly authenticated copy of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, to the presiding officers of the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, and to each of the Senators and Representatives from the State of Minnesota in the Congress of the United States.

W. I. NOLAN,
President of the Senate,
JOHN A. JOHNSON,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Passed the senate the 15th day of January, 1929.

G. H. SPAETH,
Secretary of the Senate.

Passed the house the 16th day of January, 1929.

JOHN I. LEVIN,
Chief Clerk, House of Representatives.

Approved January 17, 1929.

THEODORE CHRISTIANSON,
Governor of the State of Minnesota.

Filed January 17, 1929.

MIKE HOLM,
Secretary of State.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the annual meeting of the Sentinels of the Republic, favoring the adoption of the so-called Garrett resolution, proposing a constitutional amendment giving to the people of the United States a controlling voice in the matter of ratifying future amendments to the Constitution; the abolition of useless governmental bureaus and commissions and those representing Federal activities in fields properly belonging to the States, "such as the Board of Vocational Education, Home Economics Bureau, Children's Bureau, and Women's Bureau," and the repeal of the provision in the Federal estate tax law which allows an 80 per cent credit for State inheritance taxes paid, "because the admitted purpose of that provision is to coerce the States to levy inheritance taxes to the amount of the credit given," which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate a memorial of the Sentinels of the Republic, remonstrating against the adoption of the so-called uniform marriage and divorce amendment to the Constitution, "taking from the States the control of the marital relations of their citizens"; the so-called equal rights amendment "which in effect prohibits any legislation by the States recognizing distinctions between the sexes and invalidates all laws for the protection of women"; any amendment to the Constitution to permit Federal taxation of State securities; the proposed child-labor amendment to the Constitution; any amendment to the Constitution giving Congress the power to regulate hours and conditions of labor; the establishment of a Federal department of education, or the enlargement of the functions of the existing Federal Bureau of Education; the so-called Newton bill (H. R. 14070) to provide a permanent child-welfare extension service under the Children's Bureau; the so-called George-Reed bill (S. 1731–H. R. 12241) or any similar measure for further Federal aid for vocational education; the passage of the "so-called '50-50' or 'Federal aid' legislation by which the Federal Government assumes control of the States in their purely internal affairs"; the creation of new and useless bureaus and divisions in the Government, "such as the proposed division of safety in the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the Department of Labor"; pending legislation to impose woman suffrage on Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands, "in violation of the right of self-government in this matter already conferred on these dependencies"; incorporation by act of Congress of organizations for general humanitarian and political purposes "under the supposed authority of the 'general welfare' clause of the Constitution"; the passage of the so-called Norris bill (S. 3151) or any similar measure "which would take from the Federal district courts jurisdiction of suits arising under the Constitution or laws of the United States and suits between citizens of different States, which by the Constitution are placed under the judicial power of the United States," as being "an attempt to relieve the judicial branch of the Federal Government of responsibilities which properly belong to it"; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas presented a paper in the nature of a petition of the Arkansas Manganese Ore Co., praying for the retention of an adequate tariff duty on manganese ores, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of England, Ark., praying for the passage of the bill (S. 4689) to provide for the making of loans to drainage or levee districts, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

He also presented a petition of members of the Pemiscot County Court, of Caruthersville, Mo., praying for the passage of the bill (S. 4689) to provide for the making of loans to drainage or levee districts, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

DUTY ON ALFALFA SEEDS

Mr. ASHURST presented the following telegram, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD:

YUMA, ARIZ., January 23, 1929.

Senators HENRY F. ASHURST and CARL HAYDEN,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

We respectfully submit the following resolutions:

"Whereas climatic and irrigation conditions force the farmer of the Yuma project to grow alfalfa seed during the hot months instead of hay; and

"Whereas due to this fact about one-tenth of the alfalfa seed of the United States is produced in Yuma County; and

"Whereas the other legumes, namely, red clover, sweet clover, and alsike may be used as substitutes for alfalfa; and

"Whereas importation of seeds of these leguminous plants is erratic, depending on production in other countries, which fact presents a constant menace to profitable production in the United States: Be it

"Resolved, That regulation and high tariff are essential to the upbuilding of agriculture in the alfalfa seed-growing sections of the United States; and be it further

"Resolved, That the agricultural interests of this section do earnestly solicit consideration and protection in behalf of this leading industry and do request the enactment of immediate legislation increasing the duty on alfalfa, red clover, sweet clover, and alsike seeds to 8 cents per pound; and be it further

ALLEGED CONSPIRACY AGAINST INDIAN COMMISSIONER BURKE

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I wish to submit a special report from the Subcommittee on Indian Affairs, and ask that the report may be read. It is very short.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the report (No. 1490), as follows:

SURVEY OF CONDITIONS AMONG THE INDIANS OF THE UNITED STATES
JANUARY 23, 1929

Mr. FRAZIER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, submitted the following special report of the subcommittee appointed by the committee to make a survey of the conditions of the Indians of the United States under authority of Senate Resolution 79, Seventieth Congress:

"Whereas on the 1st day of February, 1928, the Senate of the United States passed a resolution authorizing and directing the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate to make a general survey of the conditions of the Indians and of the operation and effect of the laws which Congress has passed for the civilization and protection of the Indian tribes; to investigate the relation of the Bureau of Indian Affairs to the persons and property of Indians and the effect of the acts, regulations, and administration of said bureau upon the health, improvement, and welfare of the Indians; and to report its findings in the premises, together with recommendations for the correction of abuses that may be found to exist, and for such changes in the law as will promote the security, economic competence, and progress of the Indians;

"Whereas the following subcommittee was appointed under the above resolution, to wit: LYNN J. FRAZIER, chairman; ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, Jr., W. B. PINE, BURTON K. WHEELER, ELMER THOMAS;

"Whereas pursuant to said resolution your committee, within the limits of its authority, sought to make the investigation called for therein and has held hearings in the States of Washington, Oregon, California, Utah, and has been and is now holding hearings in the District of Columbia;

"Whereas on the 7th day of January, 1929, in the course of a hearing being at that time conducted by your committee, Charles H. Burke, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, interrupted the proceedings with the request that he be permitted to make a statement. Permission was granted, and the following statement was made:

"'Commissioner BURKE. Referring to the testimony brought out before the committee this morning, I, Charles H. Burke, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, charge a conspiracy on the part of Senator W. B. PINE, of Oklahoma, to destroy me because James Hepburn, a certain Oklahoma politician, was not appointed Superintendent of the Five Civilized Tribes. Senator PINE is using his political appointees now in the Department of Justice, namely, Selby and Parmenter, to aid him in carrying out this dastardly conspiracy; and Senator PINE is cooperating with John Collier, a notorious Indian agitator, who is actively engaged in a campaign trying to destroy me and the Indian Service';

"Whereas in view of the seriousness of the charges, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, Mr. Burke, was requested by the committee to produce evidence, if any he had, in support thereof, the committee agreeing to subpœna any witnesses requested by said commissioner and to defray their expenses to Washington. Thereafter Mr. Burke, represented by his counsel, E. O. Patterson, Solicitor of the Department of the Interior, appeared before the committee and he, the said commissioner, personally testified and was permitted to and did call before the committee such witnesses as he desired to substantiate the said charges as above set forth.

"After hearing all of the evidence in the case and after considering the brief filed by Mr. Patterson, counsel for Mr. Burke, the committee is of the opinion that there is not a scintilla of evidence to support or substantiate the charge of conspiracy, or any other charge as set forth or made by Commissioner Burke before the Subcommittee of Indian Affairs against Senator PINE or against Messrs. Selby, Parmenter, or Collier: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Subcommittee on Indian Affairs, which has under investigation the charges made by Commissioner Burke as against Senator PINE as above set forth, finds that Hon. W. B. PINE, of Oklahoma, is entirely innocent of the charges so made by said Commissioner Burke.

"Senator PINE and Senator THOMAS were not present and took no part in the findings of the committee.

"Respectfully submitted.

"LYNN J. FRAZIER, Chairman.
"ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, Jr.
"BURTON K. WHEELER."

PROHIBITION ENFORCEMENT

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, during the debate the past few days on my amendment to the first deficiency appropriation bill having to do with prohibition enforcement, several Senators referred to the fact that business is so congested in the Federal courts that all the appropriation could not possibly be made use of and would not accomplish much good. I realize that there is congestion in some districts, but I do not agree that all the appropriation could not be used effectively. Mr. President, I introduce a bill providing for the granting of authority to United States district judges to designate United States commissioners to determine and decide cases involving first offenses against the prohibition law and make needful rules for procedure thereabout.

The bill provides that the accused when brought before a commissioner shall demand a trial in the district court as at present, or he may elect a trial before the commissioner, but should either the accused or the United States be dissatisfied with the judgment of guilt or innocence an appeal as of right may, within 24 hours after the judgment, be entered in writing with the commissioner, which may be tried in the district court. If either is dissatisfied with the sentence fixed, a protest may be filed and the judge shall review the sentence and confirm or alter same.

This bill was prepared by Judge Samuel H. Sibley, of the northern district of Georgia, one of the best men as well as one of the ablest judges in the United States. I am proud of the fact that it was on my recommendation that President Wilson appointed him. In his letter to me Judge Sibley refers to the relief of the district courts from this petty criminal work which takes only common sense to handle. He states that the accused is often poor, and that delays and expenses are unjust to him as well as to the Government.

Judge Sibley, in his letter to me, says:

> The troubles in the way grow out of the constitutional provisions guaranteeing a jury trial and requiring that judges hold office during good behavior and at fixed salaries. The act submitted aims, so far as possible, to avoid these difficulties by making the commissioner a mere arm of the original court, similar to the position of an auditor or master or referee in bankruptcy on the civil side, with his every act taking finality only by consent of the accused or by order of the district judge. The jury trial is assumed to be waivable.

Judge Sibley cites certain decisions which prove to his satisfaction that the measure is constitutional, and believes that if United States commissioners could handle the class of cases referred to we would get rid of much of the congestion in the courts and in the jails and save unnecessary expense.

I ask that the bill may be read at length and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (S. 5494) to provide a procedure before United States commissioners in prosecutions of misdemeanor offenses against the prohibition laws, was read the first time by its title, the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the judges of the several district courts shall have power, when and for such time as they deem expedient, to direct that first offenses against the prohibition laws of the United States be tried as herein provided before such of the United States commissioners in their several districts as they may from time to time designate; and make needful rules for procedure thereabout.

SEC. 2. Such commissioners shall, in all such prosecutions as shall arise in the territory that may be assigned to them, respectively, proceed as follows: The accused on being brought before the commissioner may demand a trial in the district court, when proceedings shall be as now practiced. Or he may elect a trial before the commissioner, whereupon the commissioner shall have prepared an information as in the district court, upon which the election to try before the commissioner shall be entered, and after a reasonable time to prepare for trial, pending which bail may be taken, he shall in lieu of a preliminary hearing fully try the case, being empowered to compel the attendance of witnesses and the production of evidence and to report to the court for punishment all contempts before him which shall be treated as contempts of the district court; and he shall make in writing his judgment upon the case, and in the event of plea or judgment of guilty shall give sentence according to law. The information, judgment, sentence, and other proceedings shall, after 24 hours from the completion of the case, be filed, together with a brief report of the evidence, in the clerk's office of the proper division of the district, and constitute a record of the district court therein.

SEC. 3. Should either the accused or the United States be dissatisfied with the judgment of guilt or innocence, an appeal as of right may, within 24 hours after the judgment, be entered in writing with the commissioner, which shall be tried de novo as soon as may be in the district court. And if either is dissatisfied with the sentence fixed, a protest thereto may be filed in like time and manner, whereupon the judge shall review the sentence as soon as practicable and after such hearing as he shall allow, confirm or alter the same as may seem just. A sentence not protested shall be by the clerk promptly submitted to the judge and by him confirmed without further notice or hearing, unless he shall specially order the same, after which he may alter such sentence.

SEC. 4. If an appeal or protest is entered the accused shall be granted bail or committed as on a preliminary hearing. Otherwise the sentence may be at once executed. If the trial develop that the case is a second offense, the commissioner shall treat it as a preliminary hearing only, and discharge or commit accordingly.

SEC. 5. The district court may order cases pending therein on indictments or information for offenses mentioned in section 1 to be transmitted to the commissioner for hearing as herein provided, upon consent of the accused.

Mr. HARRIS. I present Judge Sibley's letter bearing on this subject, and ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES COURTS, NORTHERN DISTRICT OF GEORGIA,
Atlanta, Ga., July 10, 1925.

Senator WILLIAM J. HARRIS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR HARRIS: I beg to submit for your consideration an outline of an act looking to the relief of the district courts from some of their petty criminal work. The district courts in this State are overwhelmed with what is virtually police-court work, and handled with the informality and dispatch of such a court. It takes only common sense to deal with these cases and they are not such as ought to occupy the attention of a Federal judge or take the time of his court. The accused is often poor, comes a long distance with his witnesses, and in a crowded court is delayed several days, and perhaps misses a trial altogether. These expenses and delays are unjust to him. On the part of the Government, witnesses are now required to attend before a commissioner and then attend before the district court and perhaps have to attend through a term or two, making a similar burden of expense for the Government. It would be better for all concerned if a trial could be had at once before the commissioner, instead of a preliminary hearing, subject fully to correction and superintendence by the judge, where that was desired by the parties or appeared to be necessary to the judge. Indeed most guilty persons will admit their guilt if tried at once. Often it is after conference with lawyers and friends, with time, perhaps, to concoct a defense, that they decide to take a chance of trial in court. Most commissioners are capable of dealing with the run of these cases, and every consideration of economy, speed, and substantial justice seem to me in favor of their doing so.

The troubles in the way grow out of the constitutional provisions guaranteeing a jury trial and requiring that judges hold office during good behavior and at fixed salaries. The act submitted aims, so far as possible, to avoid these difficulties by making the commissioner a mere arm of the original court, similar to the position of an auditor or master or referee in bankruptcy on the civil side, with his every act taking finality only by consent of the accused or by order of the district judge. The jury trial is assumed to be waivable. On this point attention is called to these cases:

In Capital Traction Co. v. Hof (174 U. S. 1) it was recognized that a jury trial allowed on appeal was a sufficient fulfillment in civil cases of the constitutional guaranty.

In Callan v. Wilson (127 U. S. 540) the holding was that in a criminal case the jury trial must be afforded from the beginning and an appellate trial was not sufficient.

But in the Shick case (195 U. S. 66) it appears to be established courts here without question. (See Logan v. State. 86 Ga. 266; Lamar v. Prosser, 121 Ga. 153.)

By the Congress, in dealing with offenses in the national parks for which the same punishment is provided as for first offenses under the prohibition law, that is, a maximum fine of $500 or maximum imprisonment of six months, final trials before commissioners have been authorized. Perhaps these offenses are considered as mere petty offenses in which no jury trial is necessary. (See, however, as to Hot Springs Reservation, act of April 20, 1904, sec. 6, 33 Stat. 188, amended 34 Stat. 1218 and 36 Stat. 1086; as to Glacier National Park, act of Aug. 22, 1914, sec. 6, 38 Stat. 700; Mount Rainier Park, act of June 30, 1916, sec. 6, 39 Stat.; Crater Lake Park, act of Aug. 21, 1916, sec. 6, 39 Stat.)

The proposed act leaves it optional with the judge in each district to use or not use the plan, and leaves to him the selection of the commissioners fitted for the duty, with the right to assign them territory.

It was thought best to allow to the Government the right of appeal from the judgment of guilt or innocence, or the sentence, as well as to the accused, both to emphasize the subordinate status of the commissioner and his trial, and because a commissioner might go wrong in a particular case of importance, or because important evidence might appear on the trial to exist and not be at hand, which ought to produce a different result. Full control of the sentence in all cases is left to the judge, so that it is his discretion at last finally fixing the punishment. Only first offenses are triable before the commissioner. If it should develop on trial that a second offense was involved, he should simply bind over the accused, as now practiced.

It was thought well to let cases beginning in the district court be referred, in the discretion of the court, to the commissioner, if desirable.

As to compensation, fees for the commissioner under the present fee bill would probably be sufficient.

Judge Morton, of Massachusetts, expressed similar views in his speech before the judicial section of the American Bar Association July 7, 1925.

I would be glad if you would go over the matter and advise me whether you think it workable and desirable.

Yours truly,

SAML. H. SIBLEY.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I also wish to call attenton to a statement in regard to this measure:

Objection to Senator HARRIS's plan has been made that it would be unconstitutional, on the theory that police powers have not been granted to Congress among the powers enumerated to it by the Constitution.

But it was declared in Sims's case (7 Cushing, 731) that "the commissioners of the circuit courts of the United States are officers exercising functions of justice of the peace under the laws of the Commonwealth," and that "Congress might appoint justices without commissioning them as judges during good behavior or giving them fixed salaries."

That would take such justices from under the constitutional requirements as to Federal judges. Congress is empowered by the Constitution to give to them the jurisdiction and functions that it pleases.

The Supreme Court has decided (1 Wheat. 304, 337) that "Congress can not vest any portion of the [judicial] power in State courts, only in courts established by itself," but it can establish any form of court it sees fit to try offenses against Federal laws.

Hence, one available and most promising plan to forward and secure prohibition enforcement in more satisfactory fashion is to adopt the Harris plan.

I also present an article from the Atlanta Constitution of Saturday, January 5, 1929, by Sam W. Small, who was with the Anti-Saloon League for many years, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Constitution, Atlanta, Ga., Saturday, January 5, 1929]

SENATOR HARRIS OFFERS THE BEST PLAN YET TO PROMOTE EFFECTIVE PROHIBITION

By Sam W. Small

WASHINGTON, January 4.—The common sentiment here at Washington is that Mr. Durant's effort to purchase a prize solution of the prohibition problem has added absolutely nothing of value to the desired solution.

The reason is obvious. There is no practical solution as long as the law remains as it is.

The Volstead Act was outlined by the late Wayne B. Wheeler, general counsel and legislative agent of the Anti-Saloon League. He labored zealously and meticulously to draft into the act all the knowledge and experiences of his long career as the league's prosecutor of liquor-law violators in Ohio and as adviser of the league's prosecutors in other States of the Union. He had become the shrewdest antiliquor lawyer in the country and easily baffled the ablest and highest-paid lawyers who appeared for the liquor interests, even in the Supreme Court of the United States.

And he had the political backing to force his drastic law through both Houses of Congress and over the veto of President Wilson.

FIRED TO GO THE LIMIT

In our many years' association in the work of procuring the national prohibition amendment Wheeler had come to appreciate my life-long studies of the Federal Constitution and to regard me as a trustworthy conferee on its terms and the interpretations given to them by the Federal Supreme Court.

While he was framing the act for Representative Volstead to lay before the Judiciary Committee of the House Wheeler frequently called me into consultation. That is how I come to know personally how the first draft of the act was prepared and in what particulars it was changed in committee and on its passage through the Houses of Congress.

The constitutionality of its provisions was carefully studied in the conferences between Wheeler, Volstead, myself, and others—so carefully, indeed, that they have been consistently upheld by the Supreme Court in practically all the cases based upon the act that have come before it up to date.

Wheeler was determined to go the full limit that the Constitution would allow. He hated liquor and the supporters of the traffic in it with a spiritual ferocity such as I have never known another man to have against any person or practice. He felt it his duty to God to hate them just that way!

DOUBTS THAT ARE NOW VERIFIED

While having no doubts of the constitutionality of the provisions of the act, I did express serious doubts of the practical wisdom of some of them and of the ability of the Government to enforce them.

Those doubts have been verified substantially by the experiences of the people and the Government during the past eight years.

I argued strongly in our conferences against the definition of "intoxicating liquor" as being any liquor containing more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol. I felt that such definition was drastic and indefensible, both scientifically and experimentally, and that it would shut off from the people beverages not in fact intoxicating and would arouse great and troublesome opposition to the amendment and the enforcement act.

I also doubted the wisdom and practicality of making the mere police offenses against the act triable of juries in the Federal district courts, and advocated what has since been proposed from many sources—that those offenses be made simple misdemeanors triable and punishable with fines by commissioners of the Federal district courts. Only to-day Federal Judge Cant, of Duluth, declares that such offenses should be so dealt with by such commissioners or carried into the State courts.

SENATOR HARRIS SEES THE NEED

In a former session of Congress our Senator HARRIS, seeing the need for certain and speedy punishment of local distillers, home brewers, bootleggers, and road rum runners, proposed an act to confer police jurisdiction upon United States court commissioners, with as many of them in each judicial district as circumstances should suggest, and with authority to summarily try such small-fry offenders against the prohibition law.

Everyone at all conversant with the judicial features of prohibition enforcement knows that the greatest weakness lies in the failure of juries to convict and the judges to properly punish such as are convicted or lay down on pleas of guilty.

Senator HARRIS can do no greater service to the people of the entire Nation than to press his plan above mentioned upon the action of Congress. If he can succeed in having it enacted he will do more for the better enforcement of the amendment and the Volstead Act than has yet been done or than could be done under any of the plans submitted for the Durant prize. I have heard more commendation given to Senator HARRIS's plan than to any other remedy that has been proposed for present slack enforcement conditions.

THE PLAN IS CONSTITUTIONAL

Objection to Senator HARRIS's plan has been made that it would be unconstitutional, on the theory that police powers have not been granted to Congress among the powers enumerated to it by the Constitution.

But it was declared in Sims's case (7 Cushing, 731) that "the commissioners of the circuit courts of the United States are officers exercising functions of justice of the peace under the laws of the Commonwealth," and that "Congress might appoint justices without commissioning them as judges during good behavior or giving them fixed salaries."

That would take such justices from under the constitutional requirements as to Federal judges. Congress is empowered by the Constitution to give to them the jurisdiction and functions that it pleases.

The Supreme Court has decided (1 Wheat. 304, 337) that "Congress can not vest any portion of the [judicial] power in State courts, only in courts established by itself," but it can establish any form of court it sees fit to try offenses against Federal laws.

Hence one available and most promising plan to forward and secure prohibition enforcement in more satisfactory fashion is to adopt the Harris plan.

RELIEF OF HAY GROWERS IN CERTAIN TEXAS COUNTIES

Mr. SHEPPARD submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 4818) for the relief of hay growers in Brazoria, Galveston, and Harris Counties, Tex., which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

MANUFACTURE OF STAMPED ENVELOPES

Mr. BROOKHART submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 144) relating to the manufacture of stamped envelopes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, House bill 16129, to provide for the acquisition of a site and the construction thereon and equipment of buildings and appurtenances for the Coast Guard Academy, was referred, evidently by mistake, to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. It comes entirely within the jurisdiction of the Commerce Committee, and I ask that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds may be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

INCREASING LIMIT OF EXPENDITURE FOR INDIAN SURVEY

Mr. FRAZIER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 303), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the limit of expenditure to be made under authority of Senate Resolution No. 79, Seventieth Congress, agreed to February 1, 1928, providing for a general survey of the condition of Indians in the United States, is hereby increased from $30,000 to $60,000.

GRANVILLE AND DOROTHY M. PEARSON

Mr. DALE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 304), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate is hereby authorized and directed to pay from the appropriation for miscellaneous items, contingent fund of the Senate, fiscal year 1928, to Granville M. Pearson and Dorothy M. Pearson, son and daughter, respectively, of Granville W. Pearson, late an employee of the Senate under the direction of the Sergeant at Arms, a sum equal to one year's compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10472) to authorize the appointment of Master Sergeant August J. Mack as a warrant officer, United States Army.

LOAN OF WAR DEPARTMENT EQUIPMENT TO AMERICAN LEGION

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, on the calendar is the bill (S. 5013) to authorize the Secretary of War to lend War Department equipment for use at the eleventh annual convention of the American Legion, for its national encampment at Louisville during the coming summer. The House has just passed and sent to the Senate a bill in exactly the same words, omitting only the name of the director of the convention. Its consideration will lead to no discussion I am sure. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Military Affairs may be discharged from the further consideration of the House bill, that the bill (H. R. 15472) may be substituted for Senate bill 5013, and that the House bill may now be considered and passed.

Mr. WARREN. I have no objection provided it leads to no debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 15472) to authorize the Secretary of War to lend War Department equipment for use at the eleventh annual convention of the American Legion, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized to lend at his discretion, to the Eleventh National Convention Corporation, American Legion, for use at the eleventh national convention of the American Legion to be held at Louisville, Ky., in the months of September and October, 1929, 10,000 cots, 20,000 blankets, 20,000 bed sheets, 10,000 pillows, 10,000 pillowcases, and 10,000 mattresses or bed sacks: Provided, That no expense shall be caused the United States Government by the delivery and return of said property, the same to be delivered at such time prior to the holding of the said convention as may be agreed upon by the Secretary of War and the American Legion, Department of Kentucky, through the director of the Eleventh National Convention of the American Legion: Provided further, That the Secretary of War, before delivering said property, shall take from the said Department of Kentucky, the American Legion, a good and sufficient bond for the safe return of said property in good order and condition, and the whole without expense to the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, Senate bill 5013 will be indefinitely postponed.

REGULATION OF IMMIGRATION

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, there are on the calendar two bills, the bill (S. 5093) to authorize the issuance of certificates of admission to aliens, and for other purposes, and the bill (S. 5094) making it a felony, with penalty, for certain aliens to enter the United States of America under certain conditions in violation of law. Both measures have the unanimous indorsement of the Committee on Immigration, and, also, they have been indorsed by the Secretary of Labor and the Commissioner of Immigration. I desire to ask unanimous consent for their immediate consideration.

Mr. WARREN. I shall have no objection, provided they lead to no debate.

Mr. BLEASE. I do not think there will be any question about the passage of these bills.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, may I ask the calendar numbers of the bills?

Mr. BLEASE. They are Calendar Nos. 1483 and 1484. There is a unanimous report from the Committee on Immigration, and the bills are indorsed by the Secretary of Labor and the Immigration Commissioner. There are going to be some matters along this line taken up in the House on Friday. I had a talk with Chairman JOHNSON last night and he asked me to get the measures over to the House before then if I possibly could.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Will the Senator be willing to withhold his request for half an hour to enable us to read the bills?

Mr. BLEASE. That will be agreeable to me. The Senator will find the reports with the bills.

Mr. BLEASE subsequently said: Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] does not now object to the consideration and passage of the two bills which I asked to have considered a few moments ago. I now ask unanimous consent for the consideration of Senate bill 5093.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON in the chair). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill referred to by the Senator from South Carolina?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 5093) to authorize the issuance of certificates of admission to aliens, and for other purposes, which was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an alien who has been lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence and who has continued to reside therein since such admission, shall upon his application to the Commissioner General of Immigration, in a manner to be by regulation prescribed, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor, be furnished with a certificate made from the official record of such admission. Such certificate shall be signed by the Commissioner General of Immigration and shall contain the following information concerning such alien: Full name under which admitted; country of birth; date of birth; nationality; color of eyes; port at which admitted; name of steamship, if any, and date of admission. Such certificate shall also contain the full name by which the alien is then known, his signature, and his address. A photograph of the alien shall be securely attached to the certificate, which shall bear an impression of the seal of the Department of Labor.

SEC. 2. Such certificate shall be prima facie evidence of the lawful admission of such alien. A fee of $3 shall be paid by such alien to the Commissioner General of Immigration for each such certificate. The moneys so received by the Commissioner General of Immigration shall be paid over to the disbursing clerk of the Department of Labor, who shall thereupon deposit them in the Treasury of the United States, rendering an account therefor quarterly to the General Accounting Office, and the said disbursing clerk shall be held responsible under his bond for such fees.

SEC. 3. This act shall take effect July 1, 1929.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BLEASE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill No. 5094.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. 5094) making it a felony with penalty for certain aliens to enter the United States of America under certain conditions in violation of law, which had been reported by the Committee on Immigration with an amendment, in section 2, page 2, line 9, after the word "hereunder," to insert the words "the clerk shall notify the marshal who has the prisoner in custody and he," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That any alien who has been arrested and deported in pursuance of the provisions of the immigration act of February 5, 1917, or the immigration act of 1924, and who thereafter shall enter the United States in violation of law shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not to exceed $1,000 or by imprisonment for a term of not more than two years; and upon payment of the said fine or at the expiration of the term of said sentence shall be taken into custody upon the warrant of the Secretary of Labor and deported in the manner provided in the immigration act of February 5, 1917.

SEC. 2. That upon the conviction of any person or persons under the provisions of the above section, the clerk of the said court shall promptly notify the Secretary of Labor thereof, and of the terms, place, and date of the expiration of the said sentence; and upon the payment of any fine imposed in lieu of imprisonment hereunder, the clerk shall notify the marshal who has the prisoner in custody and he shall detain the prisoner for a period not to exceed five days if so much shall be necessary for his or her apprehension and being taken into custody under warrant of the Secretary of Labor as heretofore provided.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TIMBERLANDS IN YOSEMITE NATIONAL PARK

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, there is pending before the Congress, now in the hands of the conference committee of the two Houses, a bill which empowers the Secretary of the Interior to condemn any and all lands held in private ownership in national parks. It has been represented that there are certain timberlands in the Yosemite National Park which are likely to be logged out during the ensuing year. That is offered as the reason why urgency in that matter is necessary.

I am this morning in receipt of the following telegram:

LOS ANGELES, CALIF., January 22, 1929.

Hon. THOMAS J. WALSH,

United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Referring to a dispatch from Washington in the Los Angeles Times of to-day, stating that the lumber company owning lands in Yosemite Park plans to begin operations within the park on April 1, next, I beg to advise you on behalf of Arthur H. Fleming and myself, who control the company referred to, Yosemite Lumber Co., that that company does not plan or intend to operate within the park at any time this year, and will not do so. We have so advised Senator SHORTRIDGE.

ROBERT C. GILLIS.

I ask that the telegram be referred to the committee of conference on the bill to which I have referred, the Interior Department appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so referred.

FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15848) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and prior fiscal years, to provide urgent supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON in the chair). The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] to suspend paragraph 3 of Rule XVI for the purpose of proposing the amendment relating to tax refunds, which has heretofore been read.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, on yesterday, when the Senate took a recess, we were discussing the question of tax refunds. I want to call the attention of Senators this morning to this situation: During the last eight years the Treasury Department, under its back-tax system, has collected $3,900,000,000, in round figures. The department has engaged in that work an army of back-tax attorneys and agents. How much that army of tax attorneys and agents cost the Government I do not know, but I think that during the time I have stated it may be safely estimated that the cost to the Government for that service has been not less than half a billion dollars. Frequently heretofore, when this subject has been brought up, the Internal Revenue Bureau has replied that it is true the service has cost a great deal of money, but that the refunds amounted to only about one-fourth, or 25 per cent, of the money actually collected.

Now, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that in connection with the collection of Federal back taxes no citizen knows when he is going to finish paying such back taxes. If he sells a piece of property he has to figure in making the contract the probable amount of back Federal taxes that may be assessed against the transaction. If he transfers stock he has got to make similar careful calculations. This puts the average taxpayer in an embarrassing and oftentimes in a hazardous situation. He is constantly under the menace of a re or back assessment. It is unfair and unjust to the plain, everyday, average taxpayer and business man. Frequently that situation interferes with the free sale of stocks or other personal property, and also of real estate, because the taxes are at times quite excessive. In other words, under our present system of the collection of back Federal taxes no man knows when his is going to get through paying the Federal reassessments.

A Federal agent goes to Richmond, for instance, and decides who, in his judgment, should pay additional back taxes. No one ever knows when he has finished paying. So the question of back Federal taxes has come to be one of the serious questions in business in this country. If it were necessary, if good results came from this system, all well and good; if the gentlemen whose returns are reexamined have not been paying the proper amount of taxes, all well and good; but let us see what is the practical result of this system that has been going on in the Treasury Department for a number of years.

Mr. President, I will give the figures according to the admissions of department officials found in the testimony. Keep in mind that the amount collected since the institution of the system of back taxes is $3,900,000,000. What have they paid out according to their own figures? Let us add together the amounts they have paid out and see what the sum is. In the first place, they admit that up to 1928 they have refunded in cash under this secret system $935,000,000. We appropriated $130,000,000 more for 1929, and all of that sum is practically gone, and they are now asking for a deficiency appropriation of $75,000,000. The amounts paid out in cash up to 1928 and the appropriation for 1929, together with the deficiency appropriation now proposed, aggregate over a billion dollars. It is admitted in the testimony that they have allowed in credits and abatements $1,679,000,000, but that sum of $1,679,000,000 was allowed in credits from 1923 to 1928. They leave out 1921 and 1922. They say that the amount has been less each year, and that, in a way, is true. They paid out in 1923, in credits, $306,000,000. Assuming, according to the testimony of Mr. Bond, that the amount is lessening each year, then they must have paid out not less than $306,000,000 for 1922 and $306,000,000 for 1921. That adds $612,000,000 more. Department officials say the payments are continuing to lessen. The credits for 1928, according to their testimony, were $199,000,000; and, assuming that for 1929 they have allowed in credits only $150,000,000, the aggregate of those several sums is $3,506,000,000.

Now, listen to this: They have collected $3,900,000,000 in all this time; they have paid out in credits or in actual cash $3,506,000,000. In other words, when we take the expenses of running this vast machine under the appropriations which have been made year by year for the purpose of collecting back taxes from the American taxpayer and add them up it will be found that such expenses have amounted to more than $400,000,000 during that period. It will be found, therefore, that, instead of the system of collecting back taxes netting the Government money, the Government is losing money under the back tax and refund system combined.

In addition to that, it is all done in secret. All these sums are paid out in secret; nobody knows anything about them. When I asked the question on behalf of the committee as a member of the committee I was informed that it was against the law for any Treasury official to tell what the sums were, to whom they were paid, or anything about them. In other words, the bureau says to the Congress of the United States, "We demand $75,000,000 as a deficiency appropriation for this year," and when the question is asked, "What are you going to do with it?" the reply comes, "It is none of your business; you furnish us the money;" and it is proposed by this bill to furnish them the money under circumstances like that.

Why, Senators, we can not let this thing continue. These refunds are constantly mounting. To my mind we are violating our trust when we permit such a system to go on.

Now, Mr. President, I come to the next proposition.

The Secretary of the Treasury has written a letter in which he makes certain defenses of this system, and I want to call attention to that letter.

The first defense that the Secretary of the Treasury enters in this letter is that, he says, the proposed change is revolutionary. To my mind it is a revolutionary thing for this bureau to back-assess American taxpayers and collect out of them in reassessments $3,900,000,000, less the expenses, and pay it all out to other taxpayers secretly. I say that that is a revolutionary system; it is an un-American system; it is a system that none of us should vote to keep in vogue; it is a system that none of us can defend. Mr. Mellon, with all his ability, can not defend it. It is revolutionary, it is true; but the revolutionary part of it is in the conduct of this system and not in its abolishment.

We ought to abolish this secret system. We ought to abolish this system that is so fraught with danger to the American people—a system which each year turns over to taxpayers, we know not how, we know not to whom, we know not in what amounts except in two or three cases, this enormous sum of money. It is done within the four walls of the bureau, with nobody having any supervision of it, and, indeed, no one has ever appeared who has said, "I did it, and here are my reasons." The commissioner says he does not do it. The Secretary says he has nothing to do with it.

To be sure, we gave a supervision to the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation. We have seen their reports. They have never examined but one case, and they said they would not interfere with that, though $57,000,000 was paid out in that one case. Why, Senators, let me call your attention to the fact that greater amounts are involved and are being paid out every day by this secret committee or committees in the Bureau of Internal Revenue than are being passed upon, perhaps, by all the courts in the country. I doubt if the aggregate of every dollar passed upon by all the Federal courts in this country in the last eight years anything like reaches the enormous sum of $3,506,000,000 that has been paid out in this department within the same eight years.

But what is Mr. Mellon's next excuse? The next excuse is that the Board of Tax Appeals is now overburdened and that we ought not to give it any more jurisdiction.

The Board of Tax Appeals now has jurisdiction to pass upon and determine the cases where the taxpayer needs redress. Why should it not have jurisdiction of all the cases? Why should the Treasury Department, with this record of inefficiency, continue its present system? And, let me ask, what sort of a back income-tax system have we when the Secretary of the Treasury and his agents admit that they have made $3,506,000,000 of mistakes in the last eight years and they have to refund this enormous amount either by giving credits or by paying out the actual cash?

Are you satisfied with such a system? Is there a Senator here who is satisfied with it? If so, I should like to have him speak out here and now. I want to see who it is that is satisfied with a system of this kind. It is a system that can not be defended; and I take it that no Senator will rise in his place and undertake to defend this system.

The Secretary says, however, that the proposed change will give too much work to the Board of Tax Appeals. The Board of Tax Appeals is not complaining of it. We have heard nothing from the board against it. I have no doubt that it can do this work, and do it well. We have established that board to pass upon tax questions of exactly this kind where the taxpayer is involved. Why should it not pass upon the questions where the Government is involved as well? What reason can be advanced for not giving this board or some other board of similar character this power? This one is already established. It ought to have this jurisdiction. If it can not do all the work, we can add to its personnel or to its staff of assistants.

I wish to stop here long enough to say that I was not so certain when the Board of Tax Appeals bill was first proposed that the Board of Tax Appeals could do the job; I did not know but that it would be too much under the influence of the department; but apparently the Board of Tax Appeals has functioned well. Its members are seemingly trying to do their duty in an honest, straightforward way. I think one of the most noted cases that the Board of Tax Appeals had before it was the case where the Government—the Treasury Department, if you please; the Bureau of Internal Revenue, if you please—sought to collect from the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] in back taxes a sum amounting, as I remember, to $10,000,000. It may have been eleven millions, but I think it was $10,000,000. Whatever the sum, it was a very large sum; and they were actually forcing him to pay it in when he took the matter to the Board of Tax Appeals, and the board determined not only that that back assessment was wrong, but that the Senator from Michigan was entitled to a refund of something like a million dollars.

I say that in this case and in other cases the Board of Tax Appeals has shown itself to be a fair-minded, uninfluenced, and unbiased judicial body, seeking to do its full duty by the people and by the Government. For heaven's sake, if we have a body of that sort, why can we not confer this power upon it? The work of that board is in the open. It is in the open light of day. There is no secrecy about it. Every taxpayer has the right to go before it. The Government has the right to have its agents there and its attorneys there in a fair, frank, open, honest way. There is no secrecy about it. They can make their proof. Both sides of the controversy have every right. Why should we not give this additional authority to that board? It is perfectly willing to take that authority.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GEORGE. Let me ask the Senator if his amendment would place any additional burden by way of expense upon the taxpayer?

Mr. McKELLAR. In my judgment it will save the taxpayer a very considerable sum. They have over 200 lawyers alone, according to this record, in the solicitor's office looking after tax refunds.

Mr. GEORGE. And it would not result in delay?

Mr. McKELLAR. Instead of delaying, it would expedite matters. I am glad the Senator has brought up that subject, because I want to take it up at this time.

I am talking about the Board of Tax Appeals now. The excuse the Secretary uses is that the Board of Tax Appeals is overburdened. That is an excuse that has been made in every case we have ever had. Whenever we want to give additional jurisdiction to a board that is already functioning and doing its duty, the excuse is made, "Oh, well, they have too much jurisdiction now. They have too much business before them. They can not do it."

The Board of Tax Appeals can do it, and at very little added expense. I doubt if it will be necessary to incur any expense, except for clerk hire and perhaps a few experts; but it would be infinitely less expensive than to keep up this enormous and expensive establishment that they now have in the Treasury Department.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to call attention to the fact, and—if the Senator from Georgia will give me his attention—to answer his question fully by saying that in the course of an investigation of this proposed amendment, as chairman of a subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee, I consulted with the board. I find, after consulting with them, that they are peculiarly well equipped to take care of the duties which are proposed to be conferred upon them. Their accountants and attorneys are all familiar with the very subject over which we propose that the board shall have additional power. I am informed by a member of the board that while they may need additional accountants and clerks for purely technical duties on account of the additional work that will come to them——

Mr. McKELLAR. In examining the files?

Mr. BLAINE. In examining the files—that between $50,000 and $100,000 will meet all the additional expense; and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue could be relieved of that much of the burden, and thus the expense of the commissioner would be reduced.

So the cost to the Government will be no greater than at present. In fact, in my opinion, by coordinating all this work on tax appeals, credits, and refunds, there will be a tremendous saving in expense, and it will expedite the actual work that the Tax Appeals Board now have before them.

Mr. McKELLAR. Absolutely.

Mr. BLAINE. In other words, the coordination of all these matters into one board will greatly aid in the efficient administration of the tax laws.

Mr. McKELLAR. Absolutely; and I thank the Senator for his contribution to this debate.

I want to say, further, that the Secretary next gives as an excuse that the proposed change will cause delay and the payment of additional interest. Think of it. Here is an official charged with making these refunds under the present law who is paying out the Government's money in millions, and paying out interest on it in millions. Here are the only two cases we have. I will call attention to both of them in a moment. One of them is the Steel Co. case, which has been unsettled for more than 10 years. Under the Secretary's department it has been delayed for more than 10 years. It has been delayed long enough to bring about an interest payment in the one case of $10,000,000; and the Secretary of the Treasury is saying that the adoption of an open system like this, where the thing can be done in order, where it can be done openly, where it can be done aboveboard, and expeditiously is going to result in the delay of claims, and an increase of interest payments, he says, of $13,500,000.

Why? The Secretary of the Treasury has just paid out, because of the delay in settling the one Steel Co. case, $10,000,000 in one case; and if the facts in other cases are as they are in that case, a very large part of these appropriations that we are making pell-mell, without any knowledge as to what we are doing, is being paid out in interest to certain large taxpayers of the country. I say that his excuse of it saving the Government interest is ridiculous and absurd, in the face of the undisputed facts. The idea of a man talking about these things being delayed, when the record shows many thousands of them have come over from 1917, and are still unpaid and unsettled.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am interrupting the Senator in a sympathetic spirit. I would like to know at what stage of the procedure for refunds a case would go from the commissioner to the Board of Tax Appeals.

Mr. McKELLAR. As soon as the commissioner settles it. If he settles it against the Government it goes before the Board of Tax Appeals as a matter of course. If the commissioner settles it against the taxpayer, the taxpayer, under rules and regulations established by the Board of Tax Appeals, can, by petition, take it there and have it settled. In other words, every right of the taxpayer and of the Government can be speedily settled in this way.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then the Senator's amendment simply means this, that after the department has, in the regular course of procedure there, settled a controversy between the Government and a taxpayer, either party to that controversy may ask that it be transferred to the Board of Tax Appeals?

Mr. McKELLAR. If it is decided against the Government, it goes before the board as a matter of course; if it is decided against the taxpayer, the taxpayer can take it up. Every case involving over $10,000 goes to the Board of Tax Appeals if it is decided against the Government.

I am now coming to the next excuse offered by the Secretary.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, before the Senator passes to another subject, will he submit to a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will, gladly.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I would like to have the attention of the Senator from North Carolina. The Senator from Tennessee has answered the question of the Senator from North Carolina by saying that this would speed up the making of refunds where it was proper that refunds should be made.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think it would.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I understand that at the present time the Board of Tax Appeals has about 20,000 cases on its docket undisposed of. How would it speed up the making of a refund to put a case at the foot of that docket of 20,000 pending cases after the administrative officials had decided that the refund ought to be made?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator has not kept up with the evidence, I am sure, or he would know that the great number of cases technically before the bureau now is the result of the fact that every large taxpayer—the Assistant Secretary, Mr. Bond, limits it to the large taxpayer—when he pays his initial taxes on his own report of what is due, at that very time files a claim for a refund, not that he is entitled to a refund, but because he hopes that some change in opinion in the department, some change in some ruling of the department, within the next five years, as the limitation is now, will enable him to ask, under such a ruling, for a refund in whole or in part.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. They would still continue doing that; would they not?

Mr. McKELLAR. Not at all. They would have to file their claims before the Board of Tax Appeals. They would not do it unless the Board of Tax Appeals failed to do their duty, and I do not believe they would fail.

Mr. GLASS. May I ask the Senator why every taxpayer does that now?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will give the Senator the answer of Mr. Bond. Mr. Bond says that the large taxpayer does it out of abundance of caution, for the purpose of taking advantage in the future of any change in ruling whereby the taxpayer can possibly get something back which he did not at the time of payment think he was entitled to.

Mr. GLASS. Does not the Senator know perfectly well that he does it because the Government itself has instituted a system of jeopardy assessments, assessing taxpayers twice as much as they know the taxpayers ought to pay?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes, Mr. President; sometimes there are jeopardy assessments, of course.

Mr. GLASS. That is why any taxpayer with three grains of sense ought to make such reservation, when the Government is trying to take every advantage of the taxpayer that it can.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes, Mr. President; and it just goes back to the iniquities of the present system. I am complaining of the system, this system of the Government undertaking to reassess all the taxpayers of this country, keeping their cases before them for a period of five years, and then saying to the taxpayer, "We have not attended to your matter, we have not examined into your matter; it is true it has been nearly five years, but unless you waive the statute of limitations we are going to put a jeopardy assessment against you." It is all wrong and it ought to be abolished. There ought to be an end to that iniquitous system. The matter ought to be closed up within one year, unless there is fraud on the part of the taxpayer. I think the system is indefensible.

Mr. GLASS. What I protest against is the criticism of the taxpayer by the Senator, rather than criticism of the Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not criticizing the taxpayer. I have been standing here two days trying to protect the taxpayer against the iniquities of this system.

Mr. GLASS. Why should the Government be permitted to make these jeopardy assessments against taxpayers?

Mr. McKELLAR. It ought not to be. For the past 8 or 10 years I have been striving to correct that matter. I have offered an amendment to every revenue bill brought before the Senate to reduce the time limit within which these reassessments could be made. I think the taxpayer ought to know at some time that he has finished paying taxes to the Government.

To illustrate the effect of allowing the Internal Revenue Bureau to wait five years to take such action, let me take the return of the Senator from Pennsylvania five years ago.

Mr. GLASS. The limitation is two years now.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The limitation is three years now.

Mr. McKELLAR. Three years.

Mr. GLASS. I think if he will examine the law the Senator will find it is two years.

Mr. McKELLAR. My amendment making it one year was voted down, and my amendment making it two years was voted down.

Mr. GLASS. I do not refer to the Senator's amendment, but I know that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] had an amendment attached to a revenue bill reducing it to three years, and I know that last year I had an amendment attached to a revenue bill reducing it still further to two years.

Mr. McKELLAR. Five years ago it was five years, anyhow, and I am going to give my illustration. A young man from the tax office would come to the Senator from Pennsylvania and say, "We have allowed nearly five years to pass by since you paid your taxes for 1923, and the time limitation will be up in a few days. We will make a jeopardy assessment against you unless you agree to waive the statute of limitations." In that way an assessment is made, and they go back year after year. The period of limitation of three years is virtually valueless. And may I add that interest is running against the Government all the time. The limitation of any number of years would be valueless. The taxpayer never knows when he gets through paying taxes under this system. It is a wrong system, an indefensible system.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BINGHAM in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to see if I can elicit some information from the Senator from Tennessee on a point which I think very important. When complaints have been made to the department about these excessive refunds, the answer has generally been that the making of the refunds was the result of this great number of jeopardy assessments, which the department was forced to make in order to protect the Government. It is easy to see that where there is a jeopardy assessment the taxpayer may be very grossly wronged.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is true.

Mr. SIMMONS. And may be required to pay a very exorbitant amount of money to the Government without warrant of law. I want to ask the Senator whether he has made any investigation and is now in a position to afford the Senate any information as to what part of these enormous refunds about which he has been speaking is due to jeopardy assessments?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will give the Senator the best information I have, and that is from Mr. Bond himself. Heretofore, as I have already stated, the bureau has taken the position that they had paid out only $935,000,000 in refunds, and that was about one-fourth of what they had collected in the way of reassessments, and therefore this scheme of collecting back taxes was a money-making scheme. I asked Mr. Bond for the amount of credits, which is just the same as cash; they are allowed on taxes for future years, and amount to exactly the same thing as cash. Mr. Bond did not think he had the information, but I wrote him a letter and called his attention to the information, and told him where he could get it. Thereupon he gave me the information covering six years. But when he gave it to me he wrote me a letter in which he undertook to explain the very thing the Senator is now asking, and I hope the Senator will let me read Mr. Bond's letter. I want to say that, in bringing this matter up, I am not attacking Mr. Bond, or Mr. Blair, or anybody else. I am trying to get the facts before the Senate, because I believe the present system that we have in this country of collecting back taxes is an infamous system, and that it ought to be abolished. The taxpayer ought to know, after a reasonable time, anyhow, when he has finished paying his taxes. It is a let and a hindrance to every honest taxpayer in the land. The big taxpayer can get by under this system because the bureau regards his payment of taxes as provisional, as stated by Mr. Bond, and he can file his claim for refunds when he pays his tax, and knows he will receive 6 per cent interest on whatever he gets back. But the average taxpayer pays his tax as a payment, and he wants it to be final.

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course there are two ways by which the taxpayer gets the benefit. One is by the department simply making an estimate and abating so much, and the other is by actual refunding.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course a rebate, if it is the result of a jeopardy assessment, would be in the same category, and would be equivalent to a refund.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will tell the Senator what Mr. Bond said.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. From what page is the Senator about to read?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am reading from the RECORD of January 14, page 1670. I intend to read Mr. Bond's letter. I think that is due him. He is a conscientious man. He just has a bad system, a secret system to deal with, that is bringing the department into disrepute, and has already brought it into disrepute. But I think his explanation ought to be read at this time, and I am going to read it. His letter states:

JANUARY 14, 1929.

MY DEAR SENATOR MCKELLAR: I inclose a memorandum from Mr. Mires, assistant to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, which gives you most of the information which you requested in your letter of January 11. I regret that in the limited time it has not been possible to furnish more complete information. For the reasons that I explained at the hearing before the Senate Appropriations Committee the law does not permit me to give you the names of these taxpayers, even if it were possible to prepare the list within the time available.

I must point out to you in connection with this information that it is my opinion it is very misleading to submit a total of statements and credits. The reasons are several.

He states just one. What he is talking about is the item of $1,679,000,000 for the six years from 1923 to 1928, inclusive. Here are his reasons:

Many taxpayers included questionable items in their returns under the 1917 and 1918 acts and filed claims for abatement at the same time to protect their interests. As soon as these claims had been passed on many were promptly allowed and the tax abated.

That does not come into these figures, because he does not give us the figures for those years. But those abatements need not be considered. It would make the sum a very much larger sum if they should be considered.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Surely the Senator does not mean that. The figures that are given show the amounts abated in these particular fiscal years. That is, the Steel Corporation abatement or refund will show in the fiscal year 1929, although it has reference to the 1917 tax.

Mr. McKELLAR. They were not included in this.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes; they would be.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; they are not included in the figures I have given of $3,506,000,000. I read Mr. Bond's letter:

Many abatements have been made by reason of court decisions and in conformity thereto.

The amount that has been abated by reason of court decisions would be comparatively infinitesimal.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I would like to have the Senator give the figures if he has them.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I submit——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. GLASS. I submit that the Senate would like to hear Mr. Bond's letter. If we are to have a speech after every sentence of Mr. Bond's letter, I confess my inability to keep track of it.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I agree with the Senator; if he refers to a speech and not a question. Will the Senator from Tennessee permit me to ask a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator. I happen to be reading Mr. Bond's letter and surely there is no rule against my commenting on it.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. In the decision of the Supreme Court as to the amount to be deducted in the case of income from insurance, over $35,000,000 of refunds was involved.

Mr. McKELLAR. Compare $35,000,000 with $1,679,000,000 and it will be found that my statement is fairly accurate.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That is only one case out of a great many.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; that is the one specifically referred to in the letter.

2. Many abatements have been made by reason of court decisions and in conformity thereto.

And, of course, they should be excluded.

3. In the earlier years of the bureau when the work was congested it was often necessary to make many jeopardy assessments to protect the interests of the Government against the running of the statute of limitations and in these cases an amount sufficiently large to protect the Government was necessarily named, the excess being abated after the correct figure had been later determined.

4. Many abatements are made on the recommendation of collectors because assessments have proven to be uncollectible and this is the only way in which the collector can be relieved of his responsibility under his bond.

5. Many abatements are made because it is found that the tax should be assessed to a different person or corporation after the case has been carefully examined and the abatement is in effect a transfer of the assessment to another name.

6. At certain times it has been necessary to make assessments of the same tax to all of the corporations of a consolidated group or to a large number of transferees under section 280 of the 1926 act, and in these cases when the tax has been paid in full by one of the parties the assessment against the others are abated.

7. With respect to the year 1923 the revenue act of 1924 contained a retroactive provision which reduced the assessments by 25 per cent for the year 1923 and this excess had to be abated on all outstanding assessments.

I do not have the amount of that, but it was not as large as it was in the insurance cases, as I recall.

These are the principal reasons why these figures on abatements and credits seem to me to have no real significance and would be misleading. I trust that if the figures are used this statement of their lack of value may be read at the same time.

I am giving Mr. Bond's statement just as he wrote it, and to which I do not agree, because if the amount of abatement made under the exceptions noted by Mr. Bond amounted to a great deal, they would be placed here so we could have the information.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, if I may interrupt the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. I call attention to the fact that the inquiry made by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] has been answered neither by the Senator from Tennessee nor by Mr. Bond's letter. What the Senator from North Carolina inquired was what proportion of the refunds or rebates applies to jeopardy assessments, and there is no word in Mr. Bond's letter to indicate what the proportion is, nor has the Senator from Tennessee told us what the proportion is. I conjecture that a very great proportion of it is due to the fact that the Government levies these unconscionable jeopardy assessments against a taxpayer, in which event it ought to be made to refund—in fact, it ought to refund without being made to do so and putting the taxpayer to the inordinate expense and trouble of having to hire actuaries and lawyers to recover his money.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator is absolutely right about that.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am frank to say that neither what I have said nor what the Assistant Secretary has written answers the question as the Senator from North Carolina asked it. He wanted accurate information. Neither the letter nor anything I can say gives that accurate information. The Assistant Secretary, if he had accurate information, did not give it. He ought to have it if the books are kept properly in the Treasury Department. He ought to have that information there, but he did not give it to me.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator did not ask for it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, yes; I did ask for it.

Mr. GLASS. It does not appear so here. I have read every word of the testimony.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Secretary ought not to wait to be asked for it.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; he ought not. Mr. Bond was given every opportunity to make every excuse and give every reason why the large credits were paid out, and I am giving the best he had to offer. I am giving the Senate every excuse that he offered in the very words in which he offered it.

I can not get the information because when I, as a member of the Appropriations Committee, asked the question I met with refusal on the ground that "the law says we must not give you that information."

Mr. SIMMONS. It is not necessary to give any names to give the information.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the hearings are examined, it will be seen that time and again the officials of the Internal Revenue Office replied, "We can not give you the information because it is against the law."

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. I apologize for interrupting the Senator so often, for the reason that I was a member of the subcommittee and being obliged to leave town I did not attend the meeting of the committee at which Assistant Secretary Bond and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue appeared. But to cover that disqualification of mine, I have read every line of testimony taken. Neither the Senator from Tennessee nor any member of the subcommittee asked for the information that the Senator from North Carolina desires, and I do not find that the Senator from Tennessee discussed with any one of the experts of the Treasury one solitary provision of the proposed amendment that is here now. Yet the Senate is expected to enter into these abstruse questions of taxation and procedure without the opinion of an actuary in the Treasury Department.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to say in answer to what the Senator said that if he regards as an abstruse question the matter of the Bureau of Internal Revenue collecting $3,900,000,000 in back taxes, with an army of back-tax collectors going all over the country examining the books and papers of every income-tax payer in the country, if he regards it as an abstruse question when it is undisputed that that is done, and then when the facts are shown that they have been paid back in refunds and credits during the same period the enormous sum of $3,506,000,000—if he regards that as a vague, indefinite, abstruse question, then I disagree with him. I do not think it is. I think we have the facts on which we ought to base a change of the system. Any system of back-tax collecting which results in the collection from taxpayers of the enormous sum of $3,900,000,000 and the paying back to certain other taxpayers in secret of $3,506,000,000, I think needs revision. I do not concede that it is an abstruse question.

The Senator from Virginia complains that we have not got the amount of abatements, and that the jeopardy abatements ought to be given here. Why, if it is important, does not the Secretary give it to us?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, the Senator regards it as important, does he not?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, I do not think it is very important. I doubt it very much.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I think it is very important.

Mr. McKELLAR. I doubt if it makes $100,000,000 difference in the figures.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Why not ask for the specific information?

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. I have regarded as an abstruse proposition the fact that the Internal Revenue Bureau collects hundreds of millions of dollars every year from taxpayers in excess of what is really due. On the contrary, if there has been any Member of this body within the period of my service here who has oftener protested against that practice than I have, I do not know who he is. I have said in the present discussion that I regard as the chief vice of the whole system the taking from taxpayers of money that the Government has no right to take. I say when that is done it is the business of the Government to pay it back, whether it be the Steel Corporation or the Tobacco Corporation or the individual taxpayer. That is what I say about it.

There is nothing abstruse either about the collection of that money or about the paying back, but there is a great deal of abstruseness about the system of assessment and the system of paying back, and the actuarial processes involved, and I say that the Senate can not determine those matters in a random debate here.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; but we can give a board that is already instituted, for the very purpose of passing upon similar cases, jurisdiction over those cases to see that it may be done.

Mr. GLASS. How much assurance can the Senator give to the Senate that the actuaries employed by the board will be any more capable than actuaries employed by the Internal Revenue Bureau?

Mr. McKELLAR. It will be done in the open, at any rate. It will not be done in secret.

Mr. GLASS. The question of the openness of it has been brought to the attention of the Senate over and over again, and the Congress is responsible for the secrecy and not the Internal Revenue Bureau.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not propose to let it be responsible any more if I can prevent it. If it is the fault of the Congress, then I propose that the Congress shall correct that fault.

Mr. GLASS. That is another question.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. On the 4th of January, 1929, there was published in the Washington Post an editorial, which was inserted in the RECORD as of date of January 5, making particular reference to the case of the Endicott-Johnson Shoe Co., shoe manufacturers, in which, after a prolonged contest, that company recovered $851,808 as excessive taxes paid the Government. It appeared that in order to make the recovery the company expended $306,682 to lawyers and tax experts. There is something fundamentally wrong with a system, whoever may be to blame for it, which permits that sort of condition to arise and that sort of case to occur.

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not hear the Senator clearly. Does the Senator mean to say that the Government spent for attorneys——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Oh, no; the taxpayer, in order to secure his rights and to recover a tax of $800,000 plus wrongfully levied and collected by the Government, was required or found it necessary to expend, in payment for the services of lawyers and tax experts, the appalling sum of $306,682.

Mr. McKELLAR. To get it back?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; in other words, to recover back what was wrongfully exacted from the taxpayer by the Government. Of course, there is a great deal of technical knowledge necessary in the assessment and in the collection of these taxes. An ordinary Senator can not make his tax return if he has any income. He usually secures the assistance of a deputy collector of internal revenue for that purpose, and if he does not do it he is more than likely to make mistakes, and he may make mistakes even if he does secure such assistance. It does appear that a process of simplification could be advanced by some one and, if legislation is necessary, let it be presented to the Congress and enacted into a law that would obviate the difficulty to which I am referring, and which would make unnecessary such cases as that of the Steel Corporation, which the Senator has been discussing, drawn out over a period of almost half a generation, involving all sorts of disputes and controversies, and never reaching a satisfactory end. The case of this shoe company emphasizes the assertion that there is need for a careful study of this subject and a simplification of the revenue laws and of the methods of administration. I realize that one administration may change its rules and regulations, but there ought not to be a hardship imposed upon the taxpayer because the Federal officer does not understand his business.

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree with the Senator from Arkansas and thank him for his interruption and for his facts.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. Just one moment. I agree entirely with what the Senator from Arkansas has stated. One of the best ways to get a simpler system would be to allow a reasonable time, say, six months or a year, in which the Government would have the right to scrutinize the tax returns of its taxpayers, and that be an end to it, except in cases of fraud, and stop this enormous refunding of taxes.

Mr. HEFLIN, Mr. REED of Pennsylvania, and Mr. SIMMONS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield in a moment. I wish further to say that this system has brought about a new occupation in this country; it is the business of securing tax refunds, which has grown to be an enormous business, running into the billions of dollars, as we have seen. Some lawyers and some accountants, and some who are neither lawyers nor accountants but who have inside information, go to the taxpayer and make contracts with him, so I am informed.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall yield in just one moment. These men go to the taxpayer, and, on a percentage basis, they make large fees out of the business, so I am told.

Mr. SIMMONS. They take such cases on a contingent basis.

Mr. McKELLAR. They take them on a contingent basis. In the case cited by the Senator from Arkansas, there is no telling what fee the man to whom he referred received. He probably had an agreement for one-half of the amount recovered; apparently he had an agreement for half or one-third of it. Is it not a travesty upon justice and upon the taxpayers of the country that the Government pursues such a course as to make this practice possible?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The man to whom the Senator from Tennessee refers evidently did not have an agreement for half of the amount, because the total sum paid lawyers and experts did not quite equal one-half of the $808,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. It may have been a third of it. Probably it should be figured out on that basis.

I was impressed with the excuses given by Mr. Wayne Johnson in the telegram which he sent here. How much more informative, however, it would have been if Mr. Johnson had told us what sort of a contract he had with the United States Steel Co. under which he and his associates recovered $57,000,000 from the Government in that case. I should like to know. I am told that the most lucrative business in which a lawyer or an accountant can engage in the city of Washington is that of securing tax refunds.

Mr. HEFLIN and Mr. REED of Pennsylvania addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield, and, if so, to whom?

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Alabama first asked me to yield. When I shall have yielded to him, I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I have been asking the Senator to yield to me for 10 minutes.

Mr. McKELLAR. But even before the Senator from Pennsylvania rose the Senator from Alabama asked me to yield to him, and I now do so.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. "Truth crushed to earth shall rise again." [Laughter.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] is to be commended by every patriot in the country for the fight he is making. He is waging an honest and fair fight for an open and a fair field to the American taxpayers and to the Government of the United States. The Senator's amendment should become a law, and I hope it may. We should have a record vote on it, and let the people of the country see who is on the side of the big taxpayers who have been compelled under law to bear their share of the burden of Government and then have their taxes handed back to them through a side door of the Treasury Department. The Senator from Tennessee is seeking to have this thing done in the open instead of having clerks single out a given file, reaudit it, and dig out what they think should be rebates, credits, and refunds, so that a big taxpayer may get half a million dollars or five million dollars or ten million dollars returned to him, as the Steel Trust got $26,000,000 at one clip.

Mr. McKELLAR. They got $57,000,000.

Mr. HEFLIN. The Senator from Tennessee states that the Steel Trust got $57,000,000. The Senator from Tennessee is asking that the doors shall be opened and that a court constituted by Congress—and that is what the Board of Tax Appeals is—shall determine these cases so that the public can be present and can ascertain how their money is being taken out of the Treasury and given back to favored taxpayers.

The Senator from Tennessee is not seeking to impose any burden upon any taxpayer; he does not want to withhold a dollar from the overrich. If they have paid it in when they should not have paid it in, the Senator from Tennessee wants it returned, and I want it returned.

Mr. President, the people of this Government—and it is their Government—have a right to know why every dollar in taxes has been returned to the taxpayer. The Senator from Tennessee, the able and brilliant and brave fighter from Tennessee, is asking for an open, fair fight on this question, so that the truth may be known to the public; I am with him, heart and soul, in the fight, and we are going to fight to the finish for the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. McKELLAR. I can not yield to the Senator from North Carolina at the moment, because I promised the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] to yield to him next.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, nothing that I could say could compare with the tribute that has just been paid by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN]. So I think I will withhold my remarks until later.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will be very glad to answer any question the Senator may desire to ask if I can do so.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee a question. The magnitude of the figures as to refunds and rebates which the Senator has given is really appalling.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is shocking.

Mr. SIMMONS. I join in saying that the Senator is rendering the country a service in bringing this matter to the attention of the Senate; but I think if the Senator has or can secure information with reference to what percentage of the total he gives as to rebates was because of jeopardy assessments that it would be enlightening to the Senate, and, as a mere matter of justice to the department, it ought to be done.

I myself am surprised, I wish to say to the Senator, that the department has not furnished those figures, because the department generally, as I understand, has defended its action with reference to refunds by alleging that a large part of them were due to jeopardy assessments.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator from North Carolina will permit me to interrupt him for a moment, I should like to say that I have already sent to Mr. Bond, who is a very courteous and delightful and intelligent gentleman, and asked him to furnish the information for which the Senator has asked, because I should like to know and the Senator would like to know, as I imagine every other Senator would like to know, what portion of the total are jeopardy assessments.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, there is another thing——

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. Let me finish my interrogatory, if you please. There is another thing which has not been brought to the attention of the Senate, though, of course, it is a matter of common knowledge, namely, that the courts have rendered a great many decisions. It would be unjust to the department, and we ought not to want to be unjust to them——

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no.

Mr. SIMMONS. It would be unjust to the department merely to enumerate in making this estimate the refunds made directly to the parties to actions in the courts, because when a court renders a decision upon a question raised as to rebates the department, I think in justice to the taxpayers, has adopted the rule of applying that principle to all other taxpayers who come under the rule laid down by the court. In order to ascertain how much of this money was returned under decisions of the courts we ought to find out not only the amount returned to the litigant under a particular decision but the amount returned to all the taxpayers of the country as a result of such decision.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope the Revenue Bureau will give us the information.

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope the Senator, therefore, will enlarge his inquiry.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will be very glad to do so.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Will the Senator from Tennessee permit just a sentence or two in an effort to answer the question of the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. As the Senator will remember, a claim in abatement would lie only in case of a jeopardy assessment. So long as claims in abatement were permitted by the successive revenue laws they could only be made where there had been jeopardy assessments; so that a very large part, I should say probably three-quarters, of the refunds shown in the table submitted by the Treasury were probably made on claims in abatement following jeopardy assessments.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think that is true as to goodly part of them, anyway.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator's second question was as to the amount which had been paid as the result of court decisions. If it is possible to compile that information, even approximately, we would all be glad to have it, but it would be very difficult, and I think quite impossible. In the Steel Corporation case, for example, the Treasury was confronted with four different rules for the calculation of invested capital under the excess profits law. One was a decision of the Court of Claims, one was a quite contrary decision by the Board of Tax Appeals, one was a Treasury regulation, and the last, as I recall, was an amendment to the Treasury regulation. So four different rules were urged. The settlement is a sort of compromise among all four of those rules, in which I think the Government got very much the best of it, but I do not know that my opinion is worth anything as to that. It would be very hard in that case to say how much of it was ascribable to a court decision; that is what I meant. I have tried to answer the question.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I will answer the Senator from North Carolina in this way: So far as court decisions are concerned, the United States Steel Co. had filed a case in court to recover this money, and if it thought it would have gotten better results in the court than it could get in the department it would have been a very foolish company if it had not undertaken to prosecute in the court; but it did not do that. It knew its business.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The suit in the court was for $161,000,000, including interest.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes. It was like the case of a man getting a finger scratched and suing for $5,000 damages under the old system. The Steel Corporation probably asked for everything. Does the Senator know what taxes they paid in 1917?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes; about $217,000,000, as I recall.

Mr. McKELLAR. And they got back $57,000,000. I think that is doing pretty well. I do not know whether the Steel Corporation got that much back because we have no means of telling what sort of contract the company had with its lawyers and accountants.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I have no idea as to that.

Mr. McKELLAR. But I imagine, even if the corporation paid its lawyers and accountants the proverbial 50 per cent in cases taken on a contingent-fee basis, that it made a pretty good dividend out of that particular refund. But oh, what pickings for lawyers and accountants the present system affords!

Mr. President, if I may I wish to call attention to the last excuse given by the Secretary of the Treasury. He says—and I quote—

> The real issue is whether the income tax is to be administered by the executive branch of the Government in accordance with every precedent and every sound principle of government, or is to be turned over to the judicial branch. I have no hesitation in prophesying that the latter course spells the complete breakdown of the income tax. Any tax that can not be administered save by means of litigation and court decisions can not long survive.

Mr. President, no such question is involved as that in the proposal which I have made. The Board of Tax Appeals is a part of the Treasury Department; it is a part of the machinery by which back taxes can be adjusted, at least to a very considerable extent. The Secretary recommended the creation of that board; it was upon his recommendation that it was established. If he was right in recommending it as an administrative body in connection with a portion of these claims, why in the name of heaven is it not proper and right for it to pass upon them all or such of them as are of any importance? The Board of Tax Appeals is not connected with the judicial branch of the Government at all; it is in the administrative branch, in the very department of the Secretary of the Treasury and it is not proposed to take it out of his department. I am astonished at the Secretary taking such a position.

Now, I come to the next excuse.

The Secretary says:

> I have no hesitancy in prophesying the breaking down of the whole tax system.

As a matter of fact, the proposed change does not affect the ordinary revenues under the income tax. The income-tax payers of this country voluntarily, upon their own motion and on their own figures, pay in over $2,000,000,000 every year. The only thing that is affected in any way by this proposal is the back-tax system; and I want to say that if ever a system has been shown to have broken down under the present management, the back-tax system of the Federal Government has absolutely broken down. It brings no money into the Treasury. It probably is a drain upon the Treasury when we take into consideration refunds and credits and the costs of the system on the one side and the amounts secured from other taxpayers on the other.

I want every taxpayer to have his dues, whether he is large or small; but I know that under this system the great body of the tax refunds made and the tax credits given are to the very large taxpayers. The ordinary, everyday taxpayer is being hounded in this country by hordes of back-tax accountants and agents going all over the country seeking to recover additional assessments from him. So I say that the Secretary of the Treasury is mistaken about the system breaking down. The back-tax system has nothing to do with the system of income taxes except to make it unpopular; to make it so that the taxpayer knows that when he pays his honest taxes, on figures given by himself, they may be ripped up at any time within 5 or 10 years, regardless of the statute of limitations, because the officials of the department disregard the statute of limitations in the way I have stated.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Does the Senator propose a statute of limitations in his amendment?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; but it ought to be done. If I had my way, I would fix the statute of limitations at not exceeding one year, except, of course, as to fraud cases.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. That is rather short.

Mr. McKELLAR. Even if the taxpayer commits a fraud upon his Government, the Government ought to find it out during one year after he has committed it. Then we would have a system by which a taxpayer would know when he had finished paying his taxes. It is a stench in the nostrils of every decent taxpayer in this country that he does not know now. It makes the system little short of infamous. Every taxpayer complains. They say openly, "I do not complain of paying an income tax. I am glad to pay it; but I never know when I get through paying it, because here comes a tax collector and examines my records, and he says that I owe him so much more one year, and two years afterward another collector comes back and examines the same books, has to go through them, taking a lot of time, taking my attention away from my business, and makes another assessment; and then, if they have not got enough, they come along and say, 'Your time is nearly out; you must agree to waive the statute of limitations fixed by the Government and give us a chance to go into your accounts again.'"

Senators, it is wrong. It is an outrageous system. It ought not to be permitted by the Congress, in my judgment, and we ought to take steps to do away with it, and now.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I understand the Senator to hold, then, that there should be a statute of limitations?

Mr. McKELLAR. A very short statute of limitations.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Perhaps a year would be too short; but there ought to be, in my humble judgment, a statute.

Mr. McKELLAR. And the Government ought to say to them that the department is not allowed to disregard that statute by agreement. It ought not to be permitted.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, right there——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do.

Mr. HEFLIN. They have gone back over a number of years to the war, to 1917. They are still considering old cases.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why, they have 12,000 of them.

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes. They are digging back in there and getting out money from the Treasury and giving it to their favorites, and I, for one, think they have given out millions that ought never to have come out of the Treasury.

Mr. McKELLAR. There are only two cases that I know anything about. We have paid out now, we have appropriated in the last eight years, over $1,050,000,000 for refunds, and there are only two cases that we know anything about. One is the Steel case that I talked about yesterday. The other is what is called the X Tobacco case. The agents of the Government were so afraid to give out information that they would not mention the name of the company.

You remember that I told you yesterday how the United States Steel Corporation got its name into print. They said it was through Mr. GARNER giving it out. They did not criticize Mr. GARNER, but they seemed to think that he had made a great error in giving the name of this taxpayer that had been refunded in secret $57,000,000 of the people's money, nobody knows how or why, or any reason for it, and we do not know to this day; but there is another taxpayer, just one other, that we have any information about. All honor and credit to Congressman GARNER for bringing out the facts!

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It is apparent that the Treasury Department practices its policy of secrecy better than the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. Infinitely better. I started to say something further, but I can not even make a remark about it. Anybody else can talk about what is done in the Senate in secret session, but, of course, a Senator can not, so I can not do it.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do.

Mr. GLASS. Why can not the Senator make a remark? If a Member of Congress can literally violate the law, why may not the Senator violate a propriety?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not want to violate it. It may be proper and right for me to do it, but I do not want to.

Now, let me come back to the Tobacco case. The witness before the committee puts in the X Tobacco case. The only information we could get about the Tobacco case was that it was designated as the "X Tobacco case."

The facts in the X Tobacco case were somewhat different. The X Tobacco case was thus stated by Mr. Parker as follows:

"Senator McKELLAR. Suppose that they had followed your suggestions made there, would it have made any difference in the amount paid to the tobacco company?

"Mr. PARKER. Well, this case is one where the refund was almost entirely due to the allowance of what is known as special assessment. That is the relief provision under the revenue act.

"Senator McKELLAR. Yes.

"Mr. PARKER. The courts have since held that it is a discretionary provision within the power of the commissioner, and the commissioner evidently in this case thought that this was a right determination.

"Senator McKELLAR. In other words, the Tobacco case was settled primarily upon a matter of discretion?

"Mr. PARKER. I do not think the taxpayer would have had any rights in this case in court."

Here the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is given a discretionary power to refund any taxes that he thinks are unjust. Five million dollars was returned to this tobacco company.

Mr. HEFLIN. And the witness admits that he does not believe that a court of justice would have done it?

Mr. McKELLAR. He not only admits it but this agent of the Government testifies that the taxpayer could not recover, and in another place he says it was admitted that he could not recover; and the only reason why it can not be gotten back by the Government is that the discretionary power being in the hands of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, it can not be reviewed by the courts. Having been exercised, it can not be reviewed by a court under well-known principles.

Who knows whether that $5,000,000 was properly or improperly paid? That was a special assessment; and they want the money to pay claims of this kind! These are the only two the names of which we have, and we got them by accident.

I continue reading:

Senator McKELLAR. In other words, the Tobacco case was settled primarily upon a matter of discretion?

Mr. PARKER. I do not think the taxpayer would have had any rights in this case in courts.

Senator McKELLAR. Would not?

Mr. PARKER. He would not have now; at that time this other decision had not been rendered. He probably could not have enforced the collection in the courts.

Senator McKELLAR. And about $6,000,000 was paid out by the Secretary of the Treasury, or by the Internal Revenue Bureau, to the American Tobacco Co.—or, was it the American Tobacco Co.?

Mr. PARKER. Let us call it the X Tobacco Co.

They are asking for a $75,000,000 deficiency appropriation to pay claims of this kind without giving us a word of information in regard to them. How in the world can any Senator defend his vote in favor of the appropriation under circumstances of that sort?

Senator McKELLAR. To the tobacco company, in order to conform with your idea of secrecy, about $6,000,000 was paid out for which that company had no legal right to recover, according to your judgment?

Mr. PARKER. They had a legal right. The commissioner had legal authority.

And it can not be reviewed.

Mr. President, here are the only two cases the names of which we have. It is a matter of discretion. Nobody can change it. Ought there to be no supervision of that discretion?

Are we going to give an officer of the Government that discretion in the future? That may have been entirely right; that payment may have been perfectly proper; but, if it was proper, why should it not be open? Why should it be done in secret? Why should it be kept in secret? Why should the name of the company that receives it be kept secret? Is that the way to conduct a republican form of government? Is that the way in which we should carry out the affairs of this Government? I say it is not. I say it is undemocratic. I say it is revolutionary to have such a system.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Perhaps the Senator in the course of his argument has discussed the remedial legislation that has been presented to Congress. If he has not done so, I should like to have him name the proposals that have been made and state the history of the legislation that has been proposed.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be very glad to do so.

I think I began in 1923—or perhaps it was in 1922—to call the attention of the Senate and the country to this system of tax refunds that were just constantly mounting and have been doing it ever since. If the Senator will permit me, I will show him how they have mounted. I have a statement right here of the refunds. Just listen to this:

The refunds in 1917, where there was so much trouble and so many jeopardy assessments, and everything of that sort——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am calling the Senator's attention to the legislation that has been proposed to deal with this matter.

Mr. McKELLAR. I know, and I am going to answer that.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. What hearings have been held? What opportunity has been given to the Congress, other than the Senator's present motion, to remedy the conditions of which he complains?

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be delighted to answer.

In 1917 there was a refund of $887,000, less than a million dollars.

In 1918 it ran up to $2,000,000, and that seemed to be a good, big sum.

In 1919 it went to $8,000,000.
In 1920 it went to $14,000,000.
In 1921 it went to $28,000,000.
In 1922 it went to $48,000,000.
In 1923 it went to $123,000,000.
In 1924 it went to $137,000,000.
In 1925 it went to $151,000,000.
In 1926 it went to $174,000,000.
In 1927 it was $103,000,000.
In 1928 it was $142,000,000.

This year we have already appropriated and spent $130,000,000, and they are asking for this $75,000,000 more.

That is only the amount of refunds. That is less than one-third of it. The credits amount to the other two-thirds, or more.

So I think it was in 1923 that I first offered an amendment requiring some sort of supervision, some sort of open supervision—not a secret system of payments; anything that was open and aboveboard. If it was right that the Government should pay back these sums, they ought to be paid back; but the people ought to know what is becoming of these enormous sums of their money that are collected by taxation in the way I have described. So I offered an amendment that year——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. To what bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. To the deficiency bill, to put a limitation on it, to put some restriction on it; and it was defeated. I was just run over. Everybody just said, "Why, no, no. Leave it to the department."

In 1924 I made the fight again, and the result was the same.

In 1925 the same thing happened, and every year since. Heretofore we have not had the facts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Has any special bill been introduced looking toward legislation along this line?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I introduced a bill some time during the present session, which was referred to the Judiciary Committee and unanimously reported, to give the supervision of tax returns and tax credits and tax abatements to the Board of Tax Appeals, which the Secretary himself had recommended and which was a bureau in his department.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Is that bill on the calendar?

Mr. McKELLAR. That is on the calendar with a favorable report.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Why does not the Senator try to get action on it?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have been striving since yesterday afternoon at 5 o'clock with all the ability and with all the earnestness of which I am capable to get action, and there is but one way to get action—that is to have it put on this bill as an amendment, because otherwise it will be strangled in the House or it will not be signed by the President; and we will have no law in that regard. We might as well be perfectly frank about it; the only way we can get it into the law, the only way we can change this system, the only method by which we can bring about an open and an honest administration of this matter is by putting that measure on this bill as an amendment. I asked the committee to put it on, but they turned me down. I am now asking the Senate, and a point of order is made against it——

Mr. GLASS. Does the Senator say that he presented this matter to the committee?

Mr. McKELLAR. Indeed, I did.

Mr. GLASS. This amendment of h

Mr. McKELLAR. Indeed, I did.

Mr. GLASS. I see no record of it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, yes.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator is mistaken about it.

Mr. McKELLAR. It was turned down in the committee immediately after the Harris amendment was adopted. Of course it was turned down. It had already been reported, and I offered it before the committee. I took all this proof on it. I offered it there, and the committee turned it down and refused it on the ground that it was legislation.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator now states that the Committee on the Judiciary considered a bill which he had introduced seeking to remedy the conditions about which he is complaining, and unanimously reported it?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And the Senator can not get action?

Mr. McKELLAR. I can not get action. Suppose the Senate should pass that bill; what good would it do? It would go to the House, and in the short session it would go by the board.

Mr. GEORGE. As I understand it, the Senator's amendment incorporates that bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. It incorporates that bill, and a point of order is to be raised against that amendment by the chairman of the committee, on the ground that it is legislation on an appropriation bill, and for that reason it is not in order, and in order that I might even discuss it on the floor I have had to move to suspend the rules. Yesterday the Senator from Wyoming, the moment I offered the amendment, made a point of order, and the Vice President ruled it out of order, but under a provision in the rules I moved to suspend the rules, according to the RECORD, and it is now here before the Senate on my motion to suspend the rules and to put the amendment on this appropriation bill. Otherwise I could not even have discussed the question.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Was a report made by the Judiciary Committee?

Mr. McKELLAR. They reported it favorably.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I hope the Senator will put the report in the RECORD in connection with his remarks.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is in the RECORD, and has been in the RECORD several days.

The Senator knows that when one moves to suspend the rules, it requires a two-thirds vote. I have to get two-thirds of the Senate in order to put the amendment on this bill. It is the only chance that we have to put it on the bill, and I am going to do everything in my power to get that done.

Mr. GLASS and Mr. WARREN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. McKELLAR. I believe the Senator from Virginia rose first.

Mr. WARREN. I have a question to ask the Senator; but the Senator may proceed.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield to the Senator from Wyoming in just a moment.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, the point I make is that when the Senator appeared before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations he did not discuss one single, solitary aspect of this proposed amendment. As far as I have been able to determine, he did not ask a single question of the Treasury experts that would enable the Senate now to determine what, if any, breakdown of existing processes this amendment involves. He did not give us any information himself, or elicit any information from the Treasury experts, that was not already immediately available to members of the subcommittee. He has presented this matter here without giving the subcommittee which considered the matter an opportunity to examine into the actuarial aspects of his proposition, and here we are confronted by a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury saying that the adoption of this amendment would break down his system of income-tax collection. I do not know that that is true, but my grievance is that the Senator from Tennessee, when he appeared before the subcommittee on this particular matter, afforded us no opportunity to determine in advance whether or not it was true. He did not ask a single, solitary question of the Assistant Secretary of the Treasurer or the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that would have enabled the subcommittee to determine whether or not it would be judicious to adopt this amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. GLASS. Just another word. The Senator from Massachusetts said——

Mr. McKELLAR. I would like to reply to that.

Mr. GLASS. Very well, the Senator may if he does not want me to interrupt him further. The Senator has the floor. I just wanted to respond to the interrogatory presented by the Senator from Massachusetts as to whether or not any of these matters had been examined into by a committee of the Senate.

The Senator will recall that one of the most searching and thorough examinations into the Internal Revenue Bureau ever held, at least within my observation or experience, was directed by this body to be made by a special committee, known first as the Watson committee, but I believe the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] retired from it, and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] became chairman of the committee. That committee made a thorough investigation of every aspect of income-tax payments and income-tax refunds, and the Senator from Michigan made an elaborate, detailed report to this body, with which nothing has ever been done. He proposed, with his report as a basis, to have these things opened to public inspection, and the Senate would not even agree to that.

If the Senator from Tennessee wants publicity, just let him propose by a simple amendment to this bill of one sentence to let us have publicity. Instead of that, he presents a bill here which the committee had no opportunity to inquire into, and is asking the Senate to operate as a body of actuaries and tax experts upon a proposition of that sort.

I do not care anything about the United States Steel Co. The Steel Co. is perfectly able to take care of itself, and to hire all the lawyers in the United States. I do not care a continental about the steel company, except that I believe that inherently a wealthy corporation is as much entitled to the protection of the laws of this country and to be dealt with justly as is an individual. It is the individual taxpayer I am concerned about.

I long ago called the attention of the Senate to the fact that a little clerk up in the Internal Revenue Bureau positively maneuvered the Government into a position where it might plead the statute of limitations against a taxpayer in my State. I had to appeal personally to the Secretary of the Treasury to get him to cancel the order.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is a fine system!

Mr. GLASS. It is not a fine system; it is an outrageous system.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad to hear the Senator talk that way about it.

Mr. GLASS. What I am complaining about is that the Senator is trying to go about its correction in the wrong way.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. In just a moment. I want to have something to say. The Senator from Virginia talks about the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, and says that we ought not to go contrary to it.

Mr. GLASS. I said nothing of the kind. I said I did not know whether we should or not. I apprehend the Senator from Tennessee does not know any better than I whether we should or not.

Mr. McKELLAR. Perhaps not, but I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that yesterday we had a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury advising against the system proposed in the Harris amendment, and the Senator from Virginia, as I recollect, disregarded the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. GLASS. Yes; I did; and I would disregard this recommendation if I knew whether I should or not.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope the Senator will look into it.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator has not told me anything that convinces me that I should.

Mr. McKELLAR. Perhaps not. The Senator says I did not bring this matter up before the committee. We will see whether I did or not. I read from the proceedings of the committee:

The subcommittee met, pursuant to call, at 10 o'clock a. m., in the committee room, Capitol, Senator FRANCIS E. WARREN presiding.

Present: Senators WARREN (chairman), CURTIS, PHIPPS, KEYES, OVERMAN, and McKELLAR.

Also: Hon. Henry Herrick Bond, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury in charge of fiscal offices; David H. Blair, Commissioner of Internal Revenue; and others.

The subcommittee thereupon proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15848) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and prior fiscal years, to provide urgent supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. Senators, we have a quorum present, with those who have left their votes with us, so we will proceed to business. We have before us the urgent deficiency bill, which does not attempt to take up matters that will come up in the second deficiency bill. The amount is some $84,000,000; $75,000,000 is for the refund of taxes collected illegally or by error, and $5,000,000 is for the Post Office Department for carrying the mail by air under contract, so that the ordinary urgent deficiencies are reduced to a little over $4,000,000.

We have the Commissioner of Internal Revenue before the committee this morning, and I will ask Mr. Blair to inform us about the matter of the refund of taxes.

Thereupon Mr. Blair testified, and Mr. Bond testified, and the other gentlemen testified. Nearly all of the hearing is taken up with the testimony about these refunds of taxes, and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] made a statement, which appears somewhere—I can not lay my hands on it just at the moment, but it is here—to the effect that my amendment was before another committee, and ought to be considered there, and should not be considered before the Committee on Appropriations. That is the very contention that is being made here, that it is not in order, and the only way by which it can be held in order is by a suspension of the rules; and I have moved to suspend the rules. They disregarded my amendment and did not report it.

Mr. GLASS. There are 56 pages of inquiries and answers, and I ask the Senator from Tennessee to point to one single, solitary question directed to the experts of the Treasury Department as to whether his proposed amendment would create confusion and disturb existing processes down there.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why ask the men who are opposed to it any such question as that? I did not ask it.

Mr. GLASS. How does the Senator know they are opposed to it?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WARREN. Since the Senator is reading from the testimony, I wish he would read it all.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; it would take too long.

Mr. WARREN. Will not the Senator wait a moment? I did not break in on him.

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be delighted to hear the Senator.

Mr. WARREN. There was nothing before us but a bill introduced by the Senator, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, with no intention, as far as was shown by the face of the bill, of offering it as an amendment to the appropriation bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; but it——

Mr. WARREN. Wait a moment. Under our rule we could not consider and put onto this bill as an amendment a measure of that kind, and bring it in here, without having it immediately sent back to the committee unacted upon. The Senator did not ask for anything of that kind. He asked to have certain witnesses brought in, and everyone he asked for was brought in, and every Senator sat in his place and let the Senator from Tennessee occupy the entire time asking the witnesses questions. He was particular to ask questions that would suit his particular purpose, and did not seem to care anything about other matters than that. We had a later meeting of the subcommittee, and the chairman addressed the Senator from Tennessee and asked if he had an amendment to bring before them on the subject, and he said no, that he would take up the matter in another way.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; the Senator held——

Mr. WARREN. I state the fact that I addressed the Senator and asked him if he had an amendment to bring before that subcommittee, and he said no, that he expected to take it up another way.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is just mistaken in his recollection about it. This is what happened: I presented this bill, which had been favorably reported, and asked that it be put as an amendment on the appropriation bill. The Senator declared that it was legislation and out of order, and I said, "Well, I will take the matter up with the Senate," and that is just exactly what I have done.

Mr. WARREN. There was no report from any committee on the bill in connection with offering it for this or any appropriation bill before it came to us.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not so sure about that.

Mr. WARREN. I have the documents right here.

Mr. McKELLAR. Anyhow, I offered the bill, and the Senator said it was out of order, and that he would make a point of order when I offered it in the Senate; and the moment I rose in my place yesterday and offered the amendment the Senator did make a point of order against it, just as he said he was going to do.

Mr. BORAH and Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts rose.

Mr. WARREN. I made the point on the floor of the Senate, and I would make it again if it should come up in that way.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. Let me yield to the Senator from Idaho, who has risen once or twice.

Mr. BORAH. Is there going to be any opportunity for us to act on the question of publicity by the offering of an amendment which would result in the proceedings being made public?

Mr. COUZENS. I am going to offer an amendment looking to that end.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Michigan says he is going to offer an amendment to bring that about.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope such an amendment will be offered, but it is not the province of my amendment to secure publicity. Its only province is to have refund cases tried in the open and not in secret.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question now?

Mr. McKELLAR. I must yield first to the Senator from Massachusetts, who rose several moments ago.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Am I to understand the Senator to state that the only opportunity the Senate will have to approve of the principle in the special bill which has been heard by the Committee on the Judiciary and unanimously reported is by now voting for his amendment?

Mr. McKELLAR. That is the only way the Senate will have of putting it in the law; because if we pass the bill——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The same principle is embodied in the bill reported unanimously by the Committee on the Judiciary as is embodied in the Senator's amendment?

Mr. McKELLAR. Word for word, every word of it. It is not changed in a single respect. It is absolutely the same, and is offered here as an amendment under suspension of the rules.

I am now glad to yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. The Senator's amendment does not seek publicity of tax returns and tax payments. It merely undertakes to say that wherever there is an amount involved of more than $75,000——

Mr. McKELLAR. No; over $10,000.

Mr. CARAWAY. That where the amount involved is more than $10,000, the trial shall be open to the public, so that everybody will know who is asking for a return above that amount and will have an opportunity to know what evidence has been offered and what decision has been reached.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is the purpose of the amendment. It provides for the open trial of tax claims involving amounts above $10,000 before the Board of Tax Appeals, which has been recommended to pass upon similar claims by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. CARAWAY. In other words, unless a man is seeking to get something back, his tax returns remain secret, as they do now?

Mr. McKELLAR. It does not interfere in the slightest degree with the publicity of tax returns as it now exists, except where a man wants them made public.

Mr. CARAWAY. How in the name of common sense can that do any harm?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator speak a little louder? We are unable to hear the questions of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. I am curious to know, if it is only dealing with tax refunds above $10,000, how anybody can consistently say that it is going to disrupt the Income Tax Unit or income-tax organization in the Treasury Department?

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, anyone can say what he pleases, but my mental make-up is not sufficient to understand an argument of that kind.

Mr. CARAWAY. I understand it but I do not believe it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not believe it at all.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. Publicity is not the only effect of the proposed amendment. If we want publicity of tax returns, let us have it.

Mr. CARAWAY. This does not involve publicity of tax returns at all.

Mr. McKELLAR. It does not provide for it at all.

Mr. GLASS. I mean tax refunds or abatements. Let us say if we want it. If we want it, let us say that the record may be open to the inspection of the public or of anybody. That is simple enough, but that is not the effect of this amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. That has been voted down by the Senate several times.

Mr. GLASS. If that has been voted down and the sole purpose of the pending amendment is to effect that purpose, why may not the amendment be voted down now?

Mr. McKELLAR. There is no publicity purposed in this amendment.

Mr. GLASS. Let me ask the Senator this question: The Senator, I think, admitted a while ago that the Board of Tax Appeals is a bureau of the Treasury?

Mr. McKELLAR. It is.

Mr. GLASS. A part of the Treasury?

Mr. McKELLAR. It is.

Mr. GLASS. Then, in effect, the whole thing to be accomplished by the amendment is to transfer from one bureau of the Treasury, with its employed experts, to another bureau of the Treasury, with its employed experts, the final determination of these cases. Is not that it?

Mr. McKELLAR. It is to transfer it to the other bureau where there will be no secrecy, where the claims are to be determined in the open.

Mr. GLASS. If the Senator wants publicity, why does not he offer a simple amendment to the bill providing for publicity?

Mr. McKELLAR. Because I am not engaged in that matter now. I am engaged in an entirely different purpose, which is to have these large claims involving more than $10,000 tried in the open. When a taxpayer comes and says, "The Government has done me an injustice and I want to correct it," I want him to have an open forum in which to try that case, a forum constituted by law.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. The Board of Tax Appeals is appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate; is it not?

Mr. McKELLAR. It is, but it is regarded as an independent bureau by the Treasury Department.

Mr. GEORGE. But the members of the board receive their appointments from the President?

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course. I think it is admirably set up and admirably fitted to perform the services that are necessary in the opinion of everybody.

Mr. GLASS. It is largely composed of former internal-revenue employees who are to pass upon their own work in many cases, so much so that I offered an amendment to the bill restricting appointments thereafter so that none of the attachés or former attachés of the Internal Revenue Board should be named to the board. It is strictly a Treasury proposition, and this is just simply a proposal to transfer from a bureau of the internal revenue, with its scores of hired experts, to a court or board whose calendar is already congested, it has been stated, with 21,000 cases not acted upon. This would add tenfold to the work of that board.

Mr. McKELLAR. At any rate they think they can do it. I want to say for the Board of Tax Appeals that, as I recall, when they were appointed by the President I did not know one of them personally. I do not know that I know more than two of them now; I could not say positively about it. I am sure that I know one, and I think possibly I know two of them. But they have agreeably impressed me. I think they are trying to function in an honest, fair, open way. I think they have agreeably impressed everybody in the performance of their duties and I think that they are admirably fitted for the work.

Mr. CARAWAY. At least that is a left-handed compliment the Senator is handing them.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is not a left-handed compliment, but I think they are qualified in every way and we would be better satisfied to have them handle this work than to have the matter determined in a secret way by a commission about which we know nothing.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me to ask the Senator from Virginia a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad to yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. CARAWAY. I want to ask the Senator from Virginia a question. He was at one time head of the Treasury. What real objection could anybody urge against a public trial in a case involving $10,000 or more? What is wrong with that proposal? If a man is going to get that much money refunded, unless he is going to conceal it from his creditors, he ought not to be anxious to have it kept secret.

Mr. GLASS. I will say to the Senator that when a proposition of this magnitude, involving a sweeping reorganization of the processes and the work of the Internal Revenue Bureau, is presented to me without any further explanation than has been made here upon the floor, I would hesitate to agree to it in the face of the statement from the Secretary of the Treasury himself that it would tremendously confuse, if not actually break down, the system of income-tax collections. I think this is a matter which should have been presented in all its details to the subcommittee, that the experts of the Treasury who there appeared in person might have been asked with respect to these matters. I do not find from the record that they were asked anything about them.

Mr. CARAWAY. Let us say that ought to have been done, but what reason can be given against a public trial of cases involving such large sums of money?

Mr. GLASS. One of the reasons presented is that the dockets of this Treasury court, to which we are asked to transfer the final decision of these questions, are already filled up with 21,000 cases not yet acted on.

Mr. CARAWAY. Everybody can take his case there now under the law, can he not?

Mr. GLASS. No; not everybody.

Mr. McKELLAR. Everybody except the Government.

Mr. CARAWAY. Any taxpayer can, and the Senator himself brought about a strong indictment against the method when he said an employee there actually connived in bringing about a situation where the Government could plead the statute of limitations.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, yes. I am pleading for the taxpayer and not for the Government.

Mr. CARAWAY. I am too, and I want the taxpayer to get his money back if he is entitled to it. But he does not have much chance where men of that kind in secret can keep his money away from him, does he?

Mr. GLASS. Let us make it public. I did make this particular case public.

Mr. McKELLAR. And the Senator violated the rules of the department when he did it.

Mr. GLASS. I did not at all.

Mr. McKELLAR. The present officials say so.

Mr. GLASS. When did the department ever say that?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Bond, in his testimony, stated they were not allowed to give any facts about any particular case.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, pshaw! The taxpayer knows all these facts.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I believe I have said about all that I desire to say, except I have one further statement that I want to make in conclusion.

I am opposed to the system of tax refunds that has been carried on in the Treasury Department since 1921. I am opposed to it because it is a secret system. I am opposed to it because it is a class system. I am opposed to it because, whatever the intentions of those who may have been administering it, it has resulted, in my judgment, in great wrongs being perpetrated on the Government and grave injustices being done to the great body of taxpayers in the country.

I want to say that the system of back-tax collections in this country, taken in connection with refunds, has completely broken down. It means nothing to the Government except to give favors to a favored few.

I quote now from a statement by Mr. Bond on page 24 of the hearings. Just listen to this:

> Mr. BOND. Every large corporation knew that before its tax matters were finally closed, its books would be audited with the greatest care and the work reviewed and their tax finally determined on the basis of those facts.

At another place in the record, Mr. Bond stated in substance that the payment of taxes by large taxpayers was provisional only and that they immediately filed applications for refunds. In my judgment, Mr. President, this system is unspeakably wrong. The ordinary income taxpayer has no such agreement with the Government. The ordinary taxpayer is not thus favored by the Government. He pays his tax and that is an end of it. The system is rotten—rotten to the core. It gives rise, and will continue to give rise as long as it is maintained, to all kinds of improper practices. An official in the Treasury, who sees a chance for a back taxpayer to get out of a large portion of his tax, will constantly have the temptation to resign and go and tell the taxpayer in the hope that the taxpayer will recover and divide the amount with him. Such an eventuality, Mr. President, has too often happened.

Besides, the hearings are secret, and where there are secret hearings, there is every opportunity for wrongdoing upon the part of the agents of the Government. I do not mean to make the charge that there is any wrongdoing, but every opportunity is given the agents in the secret hearings for wrongdoing.

Again, Mr. President, the refunds are so large that, if they continue, they will seriously embarrass the Government. They are so large that large taxpayers everywhere must use every endeavor to secure these returns. More than that, Mr. President, what a political weapon and practice in the hands of the Treasury Department.

The tax refunds, including credits, during the last eight years have amounted to between four and five hundred million a year. They are in the nature of favors granted special taxpayers. Those who are on the inside know how to get the returns, or those who are able to employ those on the inside know how to get the returns. The way it is being conducted, it is really a species of graft, obtained in secret, bartered for in secret, the money paid in secret, and with Senate and House committees flouted when they ask for information. I do not say that it is used as a political weapon, but if a Commissioner of Internal Revenue desires to use his office politically, it is easy to see that under this system his power over the taxpayer would be almost unlimited.

Mr. President, the record shows that the amount of admitted tax refunds and credits during the last six years amounted to $2,614,000,000. We have not the records for the preceding two years. Mr. Bond says:

> In the later years there has been a substantial reduction of abatements and credits.

Assuming that he is correct and only estimating the first two years at the same rate as the last six, there would be added $896,000,000 to the total, which would make during the last eight years refunds and credits amounting to $3,317,000,000, or about $400,000,000 a year.

When what has been appropriated for 1929 is added it brings the aggregate up to over three and one-half billion dollars.

Mr. President, this is seven times the value of the oil involved in the oil scandals. Think of it—seven times the value of the oil involved in the great oil scandals. This amount that has been returned is more than the entire cost to the Federal Government of the Civil War. It is more than one-fifth of the entire remaining war indebtedness of the United States. It is nearly twice as much as the entire public debts of the 48 different States in 1927, according to the World Almanac. It is more than the entire cost of the Government from the beginning up until the year 1860. The Government expended $2,205,108,000 in the first 70 years of our history. It is more than the entire cost of the Government between the years 1880 and 1890. It just about equals the entire cost of the Government from 1880 to 1890. It is about the same amount that we expended on the cost of government from 1911 to 1915, inclusive.

It may be claimed that if a taxpayer is justly entitled to a refund he should have it. That is entirely true, and I want to say again, as I have said all along during the many years of this contest, that no one believes more firmly than I do that a taxpayer who is unjustly taxed and pays more than the law requires him to pay, of course, should have a refund; but, when that is done, it ought to be done in an open, fair, just, and painstaking way—in a way that will not give rise to scandal, in a way that is not open to scandal. It ought to be done by a regularly constituted court or a judicial body such as the Board of Tax Appeals.

Again I say that it is to the secret system of tax refunds that I am opposed. The present law permits the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to refund any taxes that he regards as unjust or excessive. This opens the door to unlimited refunds and makes it imperative that his discretion shall be subject to revision by another body.

Mr. President, there is another reason why this amendment should become a law. Nothing has ever made the income tax law more unpopular than the system which is known as back or reassessment of taxes. A taxpayer never knows under our Federal system when he is through paying taxes. I am not talking about the large taxpayer who makes a business of getting refunds but about the ordinary taxpayer throughout the country. He never knows when he may be back assessed. He never knows when he may be reassessed. The Government has an army of employees. I do not know the number, but I will undertake to get it later. There is, however, a vast army of tax employees going up and down the country from one end to the other—in villages, in cities, and everywhere—examining tax returns and reassessing our citizens, and for what purpose? We find that during the last eight years these tax gatherers who are making the tax laws unpopular wading into men's business, always causing strife and trouble and loss, have collected about $4,000,000,000, or, to be exact, $3,968,000,000. On the other hand, the bureau paid out not less than $3,317,000,000 in refunds and credits. Taking the cost and expense of reassessments and collections, they do not collect enough to pay the refunds and credits in the Washington office. The result is that by this vast system of harassing the taxpayers, causing them no end of trouble, no end of expense in fighting these oftentimes unjust reassessments, the Government really makes nothing. In other words, it would have paid our Government to have accepted the original returns of the various taxpayers and stopped there. The expense would have been reduced to a minimum, the law would have been a popular law, and this vast preying on the public would not have occurred.

I am utterly astounded at the figures of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. He states on page 7 that the total refunds are $935,804,343.27, and that the back assessments during the same period are $3,968,326.28, and that, therefore, the refunds constitute only about 24 per cent of the individual income taxes reassessed. Furthermore, since the figures on the credits, rebates, abatements, and depletion allowances have come in it is found that the one about offsets the other when the cost of collection is included.

Mr. President, the enormous sums paid out in the last eight years in the way of tax refunds and credits are larger than the entire material wealth of the State of Alabama, or the State of Kentucky, or the State of Louisiana, including the city of New Orleans, and almost as large as the entire State wealth of Tennessee. What an intolerable system of taxation we must have which requires an average of refunds and credits of $415,000,000 a year. I have tried to tell the Senate and the country to-day what an evil system of income taxation we must have when mistakes to the amount of $3,500,000,000 are made in a year. What an intolerable situation! What a miserably inefficient conduct of the income-tax system that is!

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, the Senator does not mean that all of that amount is represented by mistakes?

Mr. McKELLAR. That amount represents refunds; the taxpayer has been deprived of $3,500,000,000 which subsequently had to be paid back to him. It is due to mistakes or something else.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. In many cases the amounts have been paid to the taxpayer because of retroactive legislation passed by Congress.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think that such amounts would represent but a small part of the total.

It is said that the British refund is large, but, Mr. President, it is but a fractional part as large as ours, and they have a different system. In other words, their taxes are collected at the source and the individual is afterwards given credit for such taxes collected at the source. I am informed that the real refunds, or credits, given by the British Government to their taxpayers are infinitesimal when compared with ours.

Again, Mr. President, what an opportunity there is for graft; what an opportunity there is for fraud; what an opportunity there is for favoritism in distributing governmental favors. I am not making any charge of that kind, but what an opportunity there is for it. The refunding of taxes in this way could make the Commissioner of Internal Revenue easily the most powerful factor in politics in the United States. Great interests would be afraid to say a word against any request he might make. It is a vicious system; it ought not to be allowed to stand for a moment longer than it will take the Congress to rectify it; and so I urge the adoption of my amendment.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield the floor, unless the Senator from Alabama desires to ask me a question.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I was going to remind the Senator from Tennessee when he was talking about the opportunity for graft and corruption that, as he and other Senators will recall, when Mr. Doheny's taxes were refunded the clerk who so kindly served him, who reaudited his tax account, was by Mr. Doheny immediately taken out of the service, where he was getting $2,500 a year, and put upon Mr. Doheny's pay roll at $7,500 a year. I would not be surprised if that incident had not been repeated in the case of other favorite taxpayers.

Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee, I wish to repeat, has rendered a great service to the Congress and to the country. The Senator is not seeking to withhold a dollar of refund from any honest taxpayer; he is not seeking to prevent the return of a single dollar that has been unjustly paid to the Government.

The Senator is pleading for a just and fair deal in this matter between the taxpayer and the Government. He is asking to take away from clerks in the Treasury Department the opportunity and the privilege which they now have of taking the files of big taxpayers and of reauditing them and recalculating them and discovering mistakes, if they be mistakes; and I do not think that hundreds of items hatched out from there are really mistakes. I am going to be frank and say to the Senate that I think that this situation down there has come to resemble an ugly form of graft. I can not see, to save my soul, how mistakes involving three or four hundred million dollars a year can be made in this country by two or three hundred thousand taxpayers.

Mr. President, when the first refunds were made and certain big taxpayers tasted blood, they insisted on having the system opened up generally, and it was opened up to them by their friends. And the big taxpayers begun their annual pilgrimage to the United States Treasury. So this species of favoritism has gone on year after year for the last 8 or 10 years, and the Government's representatives in the department have got it down to such a fine point that they come here in advance and tell us about how much they are going to need for the next year.

Think of that, Senators! Would you not imagine that honest officers digging into these tax returns with the idea of winding them up as fast as possible would be able to come and tell the Congress, "We will not ask for any more after the next time; we will be through." The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], however, asked one of the witnesses on the stand how he could estimate in advance that a certain sum would be needed for this purpose, and the reply was, "We can estimate it by what we have been refunding in the past." That is the substance of his statement. Think of that! There is the gold mine; there are the files of the big taxpayers; here are the clerks; yonder are the agents outside being hired to get in touch with the clerks. The clerks have access to the files, a reaudit is had, and a judgment is rendered in secret in all cases under $50,000 without any board ever seeing it. What do you think of that, Mr. President? That is worse than a secret executive session where Senators sometimes tremble in their boots lest somebody outside finds out how they voted in secret. They have a sort of secret executive session arrangement down there in the Treasury Department. A little clerk goes in and gets a file in a big tax case and he immediately resolves that he will hold a secret session.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the Senator if he does not think that the executive session business in the department works very much more effectively than does ours, and if we could not improve our executive method of doing business if we appointed a committee to confer with the Secretary of the Treasury and obtain his plan for keeping all this public business secret?

Mr. HEFLIN. I think the Senator's suggestion is a good one, because we can not even get a list of the taxpayers to whom he refunds this money.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I should like to suggest that the Senator from Nebraska be made chairman of the committee to confer with the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HEFLIN. I think it is a good suggestion to have the Senator from Nebraska made chairman of such a committee to confer with the Secretary of the Treasury. Then, at least, we will be told what the Secretary of the Treasury says. The Senator from Nebraska would be open and fair enough to tell us just what the situation was, but the clerks——

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. DILL. Does not the Senator fear that the Secretary of the Treasury might have some rule of secrecy that he would impose on the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HEFLIN. He might do that; but the Senator from Nebraska would even report that. He would report that he was not able to make any progress because of such a secret rule.

However, Mr. President, in the department a clerk takes out a file and goes into secret executive session with himself. He sits in a room to himself, I take it, and he uses a pencil—and he has an eraser on his pencil so that if the figures are not working out to his satisfaction he erases them and calculates again—and discovers, as in the case of the Steel Corporation, that a mistake has been made to the extent of $57,000,000.

Think of that, Senators! Do you think that money should have been returned; all of it? Do you not believe that there was skullduggery worked in that? If you do not, you are mighty easy to fool. Of course, the Steel Co. did not make that many mistakes. That is a very careful and painstaking company. If the Steel Co. paid taxes that it ought not to have paid, I want the money refunded; but I can not believe that the Steel Co. could make a mistake against itself of $57,000,000. But here, after the case remains in the file for quite a while, a clerk is consulted, and suggestions are made about a refund, and the papers are telling about others getting refunds; and the Steel Co. is able to have returned to it in one fell swoop $57,000,000 of the tax funds of this Nation.

It looks to me as if it resolves itself into a situation where under our law we have compelled the men who are able to pay most to do so. We have had them follow the example laid down by the Master. The Master demanded more of the man with five talents than he did of the man with two. I think the man who has the most wealth ought to pay the most taxes. I do not think he ought to be burdened with taxes. I want to see his business prosper. I think every legitimate business ought to be permitted to prosper, whether it is big or little; but I do not think we ought to refrain from telling the truth about business because it is a big business and is a power in politics.

We need more men in public life who have courage enough to tackle wrong and injustice in big interests; more men who will stand in this Chamber, where they speak for a sovereign State, and dare to tell the truth about the misconduct of any and every interest, whether big or little.

If a big interest, by reason of its financial and political influence, can reach some clerk in a department and carry on this crooked work and take this tax money out of the Treasury, where it ought to remain unless it has been unjustly paid, then it is incumbent upon us to stand here as the representatives of the people and tell the truth about it, and make these big men toe the mark just as we would a little man. We should have one standard for the big and the little alike.

What are the department officials doing to cover up those mistakes? They are dishing out this money to these big millionaires by the shovelful, and they are sending a swarm of taxgatherers all around the country hunting out the small taxpayer and meddling in the small man's affairs. They are going in and demanding to see his books. They are spying into his business, and they are saying, "You have not paid enough." They are reassessing him; they are annoying him; they are burdening him; they are embarrassing him to get money back, to say, "While we have refunded this large sum to the big taxpayer we have offset it with what we have taken from the pockets of an army of small taxpayers." That is what you are doing.

You heard the argument of the able Senator from Tennessee that we had refunded $3,000,000,000 in credits and rebates and cash, and that we had collected $3,000,000,000 through this other source, altogether.

Mr. President, what sort of a farcical arrangement is that? It looks as if under our law we have reached the time where we have put on the statute books a requirement that these big men shall pay their portion of the taxes and the representatives of the Treasury Department wink at them and tell them, "That is all right; you will have to pay, but if you will go to the Treasury Department and have your file examined, and file your claim for a refund, you can get back a whole lot of it." Those taxpayers understand exactly what they mean, and they have been going up there regularly for the last 10 years and taking out this money by the basket full; and how many are there of those who receive such special governmental favors? A hundred thousand and a little more.

Mr. President, as I said before, this thing has reached the point where it has become a scandal in the refund of these Federal taxes. Let me read you a little of the testimony.

The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] was examining Mr. Blair, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Senator McKELLAR. I would like to know something about the cases and something about the claims which you are going to pay out of this $75,000,000.

Commissioner BLAIR. There is no way by which I can tell until a case is passed upon finally.

Senator McKELLAR. How did you come to decide that $75,000,000 is urgently needed when you have just received $130,000,000?

Commissioner BLAIR. We can judge pretty well what we will do the remainder of this fiscal year by what has now been paid. That is the best way we can give it to you.

Why, Mr. President, they already know in advance how many potatoes there are left back in the hill, without digging them out, because they have been digging out so many a year. They just know that the potato hills are there; they have been yielding so much each time they have dug, and they just guess at it, and estimate that they will yield that many more fat yams, yellow yams, gold yams, to those who enjoy these special favors.

Here is another:

Senator McKELLAR. You have not spent that at all?

Mr. BOND. No; that is not available until the next fiscal year.

Senator McKELLAR. Take the large appropriation of last year, which was made available for 1929.

Mr. BOND. That was the $130,000,000 that I am referring to. We began with that on the 1st day of July, 1928, and that is practically all expended.

Here is another interesting statement:

Senator McKELLAR. How much have you left?

Mr. BOND. My recollection is that before the Steel payment we had about $52,000,000; $26,000,000 was paid to the Steel Co., and there is still something like $21,000,000 or $22,000,000 available now.

Another time the Steel Co. had a refund; and the refunds together, both of them, amounted to $57,000,000.

Mr. President, I want to say just this word more:

I do not see how any Senator can excuse himself for voting against the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee. He is simply asking to have all these cases above $10,000 referred to this Tax Appeals Board. Let the tax adjusters, these men appointed to try the cases, try all these cases; and if a man has a claim for a refund—if John Jones has a claim against the Government—let him come in and file it in open court, and let him set forth the reasons for filing it, and let him be heard in the open, and let the judges sit in the open, and let the case be finally decided in the open and a record kept of all the proceedings, so that we can know who is receiving this money, and why it was returned, and in what amount it was returned.

There is not a Senator in this body who can name now a dozen taxpayers who have had money refunded to them and the amounts refunded. Think of that; yet some of you voted for the return or refund of over $900,000,000 in these measures that have passed here when the Senator from Tennessee and I were opposing them. You voted to appropriate this money, and you can not tell your constituents to-day to whom that money was refunded, and you can not get Mr. Mellon to give you their names and the amounts that were refunded. I challenge you to do it, any of you.

Mr. President, I submit to the Senate and the country that that condition of things reveals a terrible situation here—that a majority of Congress has been voting to hand out three and four hundred million dollars at a time to be turned over to the Treasury Department to be doled out to favorites who pay big taxes and are asking to have their taxes returned. A Senator will stand here and vote for that, and then you ask him, before his people:

"Did you vote for that?"

"Yes."

"Well, to whom were you refunding that money?"

"I do not know."

"How much did you refund to this man or that man?"

"I do not know."

"Well, who decided whether the refund was just or not?"

"I do not know."

"Was it tried in the open or in secret?"

"It was tried in secret."

"How was it tried?"

"Well, a clerk reaudited the papers, and he reported to somebody else, and another clerk approved it, and somebody entered an order that it should be paid, and that is how it is done."

"And you voted to appropriate three or four hundred millions at a time to pay claims like that?"

"Yes."

And then they will doubtless say: "Why did not you demand that every man asking for a refund of taxes be required to submit his case in the open and have the facts determined in the open?"

Your constituent will say, "You could not have put over these secret deals before any county commissioner's court in the Union," and you can not. You let a man come up in my county—Chambers County, Ala.—and say, "I have paid too much taxes; I want a refund," and the commissioners, with the judge of probate sitting, will say, "Well, let us hear your statement about that"; and anybody and everybody in the county can come in and hear, and the judgment is entered in the open, and a record is kept of the procedure, and anybody who is interested can come in and see the record and see what transpired.

I challenge any one of you to go down and see these records in the Treasury Department; I challenge any one of you to bring out of Mr. Mellon's office the records showing to whom these refunds have been made and the amounts in each instance.

Senators, what are we coming to in this body when Senators are standing here and seriously asking us to vote to continue this appropriation without giving us the facts that we are asking for to-day?

The issue here is plain. It is this, briefly:

One side is contending that these cases shall be determined behind closed doors and by clerks, as they are now determined. The other side is contending—and that is the position of the Senator from Tennessee and myself—that they shall be brought out into the open and tried in public, where the public can attend, and where the men already appointed and authorized to pass on tax cases shall pass on these cases. When you do that you make impossible the repetition of the Doheny Act. You will not have a big man get his refund made and then pat on the back the clerk that did it, and say:

"How much salary are you getting?"

"Two thousand five hundred dollars."

"Well, come with me and I will give you $7,500 a year."

Doheny did that, and others no doubt have done it, and they will do it in the future; and if they are not doing it in that way, improper doings and corruption is bound to come up in some other way; and I think it already exists. You will pardon me for being frank enough to tell you that I do not believe that a billion dollars in cash have been refunded to a few thousand taxpayers without there being graft in it all up and down the line. It is indeed an ugly situation and I am trying to remedy it.

What we need, Mr. President, is more of the heroic courage displayed at this Capital by "Old Hickory" Jackson against the corrupt and powerful Federal banking interests of his day. There is a combination of influential financial interests operating in Washington to-day. It is reaching into the United States Treasury and taking out millions of money through ways and means that can not be defended.

If there is nothing wrong in it, vote with us to compel them to come out in the open and say, "We are willing to accept McKellar's amendment and have a court of tax appeals to try these cases, where the public can see and hear what goes on." Then they will not have to hunt up a clerk to hobnob with in secret about the refund of millions of the people's money.

The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] pointed out that one man had a refund made to him of a little over $800,000, and it cost him three hundred and odd thousand dollars to get the refund of $800,000. Who got that $300,000? Those are the things we ought to look into. Who knows but that some clerk in the department shared in that $300,000 of graft. That, I submit, is a very suspicious case, where one taxpayer pays $300,000 to get back $800,000. He had to give more than a third of it.

Let us fix a statute of limitations in this matter, and let the honest taxpayers know that they must make their claims for a refund within a certain time, and show the facts, submit their cases in the open, and come with clean hands, ready to abide the judgment of an honest court. Let them do that hereafter. But, instead of that, they want to continue this mysterious, star-chamber proceeding, where, behind closed doors, mysterious and accommodating clerks live and move and have their being. They slip and slide about noiselessly with a file for tax refund under their arms. They do a little penciling on a piece of paper, and it is passed to somebody else, and an order is issued and $400,000,000 is handed out to certain favorites in tax refunds, and the Senate to-day can not name a dozen men who have gotten these enormous refunds in the 10 years past. It is a terrible indictment against a majority of both branches of Congress. They ought to be ashamed of it.

Let us to-day put a stop to this thing. Let us adopt the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. Senators, the people back home in the States that we represent are entitled to have a fair deal in this important matter. These big fellows who hate the income tax law are the men who are trying to destroy it because it is the only arm of the law that reaches the big man who has his wealth in money and in securities so that the ordinary tax collector can not reach it. We passed a law to reach the class that had been escaping taxes, and it does reach them. Now, we are compelling them to pay and you are giving it back to them in secret through the back window and the back door, and I demand that it be stopped.

Mr. President, I want every man to pay his fair share of taxes. I would not have any citizen imposed upon by unjust taxes. I do not believe in hampering or burdening legitimate wealth. Wealth is important; it is a thing to be desired in any country, and if it conducts itself right it is a blessing to mankind, but if you permit it to go unbridled and it corrupts politics and seizes the reins of government, then it becomes an evil and a curse in the land.

This Government ought to be at all times big enough and courageous enough to say to the big man, as well as to the little man, "So far shalt thou go, and no farther." Let us say to these big men, "If you paid too much in taxes, we want you to have your refunds. Come right into court. We instituted the court for that purpose. Submit your evidence. Let us have the case tried in the open." Then we will do away with this secretive sneaking and slipping around, hunting out Government clerks and others, and having a man pay out a third of what he is getting back in taxes in order to get his refund. If a taxpayer has been required to pay taxes that he should not have paid, it ought not to cost him anything to have the matter adjusted and the money refunded.

Senators, we can wipe all this scandalous procedure out by doing our duty to ourselves, to the honest taxpayers, and our duty to our country by making this whole tax-refunding business open to the public.

There is no excuse for carrying this work on behind closed doors. Nobody can defend it. This secret-session business down there has got to stop. I want to make a prediction with regard to it, that if you do not right this matter you will not hear the last of it in politics until it is righted. Make a note of that. The people of this Nation who have to pay taxes and who are being annoyed, the average man, by this swarm of tax gatherers you are sending around to filch a little here and a little there, to fill up the till that you have just emptied in order to pay the mighty rich their refunds, are getting exceedingly tired of it. They want a fair deal. They are willing to pay their fair share of the taxes, but they are not willing to be gouged and hounded and reassessed and made to pay more while the big fellow pays his taxes in temporarily and has it returned to him with interest a little later on.

Did Senators know that interest is paid on these refunds? The Government does pay interest on these refunds. So, about the best investment a rich man can make now is to pay his taxes to the Government and let them lie there for two or three years, until their case gets a little old, until they can find a clerk who has the ability and disposition to reaudit it, and then he will go over it and the refund will be forthcoming, and the taxpayer will get interest on it for all the time it has been there. Is not that a nice banking arrangement you have for some of these big fellows?

Mr. President, there are going to be many questions propounded to Senators about this very question. This Government is supposed to be founded upon the rules of right and the laws of justice, and I submit that where one has to take his case into an open county court for a tax refund and proceed before the public with his testimony, and have his case adjudicated, he can not move to the Capital of the Nation and go behind closed doors, where the millionaire class is involved, and try the case in secret session with a little clerk to do the auditing and the ordering of the refund, and then have the Congress sit like a bunch of mummies and vote three or four hundred millions a year in refunds. I refuse to do it. When we asked Secretary Mellon to give us a tax list showing to whom he was refunding the money, what amounts were refunded, with a little line or two telling why they were refunded, he refused to do it. We can not get that information. I challenge any Senator here to get it. Now they are asking us to leave that situation as it is, when they will not give us this important information.

I introduced a resolution in the Senate asking for a list of those who had gotten refunds, and I could not get the resolution through until it was amended so as to cover those who had received refunds amounting to more than $25,000. We then got a few big concerns that paid the taxes for that year, and we have not a scintilla of information here this year, not a line.

Are you ready to vote, Senators, to continue the old system and for this additional amount for questionable future refunds? Why not do the fair and just thing and vote for the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee? In doing that you vote to deliver the honest taxpayer who is entitled to a refund from the secret snoopers and snipers who hold him up and rob him in secret of what is due him by his Government. Do you want to deny the honest taxpayer the right to have an honest court try his case in the open? If you vote to deny him that right, you vote to perpetuate the miserable secret-session system, the closed-door session, that they have down there. You are voting to keep this important testimony from the public. Every honest taxpayer who feels that his cause is just, that he is entitled to a refund of taxes, unjustly collected, will rejoice at the opportunity to present his cause in the open. He will rejoice at the opportunity to have his claim passed on in the open.

Mr. DILL obtained the floor.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum. This is a very important matter, and more Senators ought to be here.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] is absent on account of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Seventy-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, discussion of the amendment submitted by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] leads me to talk on the subject of secret sessions. It occurred to me that probably the Secretary of the Treasury got the idea of secrecy in the proceedings regarding tax refunds from the secrecy of the Senate in holding executive sessions. As was suggested in the speech of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] it might be well to send some one down to the Secretary's office to get these secrets. It is noteworthy, however, that the secrecy imposed by the Secretary of the Treasury has been much more successful than the secrecy attempted in the Senate in keeping the names of Senators secret on the votes cast here in executive session.

One of my friends has suggested that it might be well, if the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee fails to pass, for the Senate to send to Mr. Mellon's office the newspaper man who secured the list of Senators who voted on the West case and see if he could not get the names for us; that he had had such success in ferreting out secret information in the Senate that he might be able to get secret information from the Treasury Department as to the list of names to whom refunds are made.

I hold in my hand an article from the Washington Post of this morning, copyrighted by the United Press, which purports to give the roll call showing how Senators voted on the confirmation of Mr. West for the office of Secretary of the Interior. I find my own name in the list and I am recorded as having voted against his confirmation. Under the rule of the Senate I dare not deny and I dare not affirm that report. That is true of every other Senator. I do not know whether the list is correct or not, and if I knew I would not dare to tell. I would be violating a rule of the Senate. Yet nobody is able to explain just how the list came to be as nearly accurate as it may be.

There are many methods, no doubt, of getting such information. Being one of those who have given some attention to radio, I have wondered whether it were possible that concealed in our desks there are sensitive microphones, or possibly there are in the carpets, woven wires of dictographs, so that all we say here in secret session is carried out to some unknown listening post. Or is it possible that in the ceilings of this sacred Chamber there are hidden electrical devices that carry out such information? I do not know.

I can not believe that any Senator would so forget his position as ever to tell any newspaper man how he voted on a great question. But the roll call printed this morning under copyright is evidence that we have reached a terrible state of affairs in the Senate. It is evident the time has come when men who have gone out to the people and secured their high position in this body in the open forum of politics can no longer get behind closed doors and cloak their actions so the world may never know what they do about the President's choice for Secretary of the Interior. Of course, if there is any office about which men might wish to be secret in confirmation of a nomineee, it would probably be that of the Secretary of the Interior. The records of certain Secretaries of the Interior of recent years might make Senators more desirous of not having it known how they voted on such a confirmation. Yet I submit it is a slander on the Senate that this list should be printed as correct and no Senator be able to rise in his place under the rule of executive sessions and state whether or not it is correct.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

Mr. DILL. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. BRUCE. When we again go into secret executive session we might ask each and every Member of the Senate about it.

Mr. DILL. Suppose we were to ask each and every Member of the Senate, and a Senator said yes, he told somebody how he voted on the confirmation of Mr. West, would the Senator from Maryland then be in favor of expelling the Senator who had so violated the rule?

Mr. BRUCE. I do not say what I would be in favor of; but that is the rule, as I recollect. It provides for expulsion in case there is any violation of the rule relating to the business of a secret executive session. I was myself approached, as I suppose other Senators were, by members of the press to find out what the votes were. I believe if every Member of the Senate answered as I did, he declined to give any information whatsoever on the subject.

Mr. DILL. Now that it is printed, the Senator can not give any information about it either without violating the rule of the Senate.

Mr. GLASS. Would it violate the rule of the Senate if the Senator were to tell what did not happen in executive session?

Mr. DILL. If he told what did not happen, and it were different from what is reported to have happened, he would be telling that fact and revealing a secret of the Senate.

Mr. GLASS. No; the rule does not say that a Senator may not state what did not happen in executive session.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. I trust it will never become a rule of the Senate that a Senator may not denounce as false any such statement by whomsoever made.

Mr. DILL. It will be seen that we soon come to the splitting of hairs as to the meaning of words, and I submit it is getting us into a most difficult position.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not think that is a splitting of hairs.

Mr. DILL. It only illustrates the embarrassment and chagrin and the pitiable condition, if I may use that expression, in which Senators are placed.

Mr. GLASS. May I ask, if a Senator should take the responsibility upon knowledge of saying that the list was inaccurate, would that be a violation of the rule of the Senate?

Mr. DILL. I do not know. I am not able to answer that question.

Mr. HEFLIN. That would at least give the correspondent an opportunity to make it correct.

Mr. DILL. It would at least give the impression that the Senator who made the statement felt that the part of it which related to himself was not correct.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. DILL. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to suggest to the Senator a method by which he could escape the disability under which he is laboring in not being able to say whether it is right or wrong. Of course, in secret executive session the Senator would be at liberty to state whether it is correct or not. If he wants to be vindicated before the people, the way to do it is first to get the Senate to go into secret executive session and then, if he will there state the truth, the newspapers the next day will publish it, and in that way he will get vindication. [Laughter.]

Mr. DILL. I thank the Senator for the suggestion, but that not having been done I wanted to call attention to the condition in which Senators are placed.

I shall not read the list as it appeared in the Washington Post, and I shall not enter into any further discussion of the matter. Seriously, this incident is illustrative of what I think is a most ridiculous situation, in which men holding high office as Senators find themselves. Why any man elected by the people to represent the people and carry out the will of the people in the conduct of public business should want to keep it secret is beyond my understanding of the spirit of modern democracy and of the spirit of the people of America.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I desire at this time to discuss the amendment pending to the appropriation bill. I am reminded to do so by what the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] said when he was discussing secret executive sessions of the Senate.

As I look at it, the Senate and the House as the lawmaking body are to blame for the astounding things which the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] has disclosed in his remarks, although it ought to be said that on several occasions, when we have had bills relating to the Internal Revenue Bureau before the Congress for consideration, the Senate has adopted a publicity provision. It has always been rejected by the House and has always gone out in conference. Sometimes the publicity amendment was defeated in the Senate itself. If we had succeeded in making the law as the amendment of the Senate on several occasions provided the law should be in regard to publicity, the reasons for the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee would to a great extent have disappeared. I do not see how any of us can listen to his narration of facts without being impressed with the astounding things that have happened in the way of the refund of taxes.

I am not claiming, Mr. President, that the refunds were illegally or wrongfully made. I do not know. I have no way of finding out. As a Member of the legislative body of the country, if I wanted to change the law I would not be able, as we ordinarily are able, to ascertain how it is working and to say how it should be improved if it needs correction. The big sin in it all is the secrecy, and involved in such secret methods are not millions but billions of dollars that have been wrung from the people of the United States by taxation.

Because a corporation is a claimant and because its claim is large, I concede it does not necessarily follow that a refund is wrong. If the corporation has overpaid its taxes, then it ought to be allowed to get back the overpayment; no one will dispute that; but, Mr. President, there naturally comes a suspicion in the minds of honest people when enormous amounts are refunded, and when they are refunded in secret, without the record of the case, so far as the application and the evidence are concerned, ever having been made public, it naturally brings to the ordinary mind a suspicion of something wrong. The history of civilization demonstrates that a secret method of doing the public business will ultimately lead to corruption. There has never been an exception to the rule that where secret methods of government have been carried on for a reasonable length of time such a result has followed. It may be that so far in these tax reductions there has been nothing wrong, no illegal act, but it follows as night follows day, especially where there are such large amounts involved, that the transaction of the public business in secret behind closed doors necessarily leads to corruption in government.

I do not want to say, "I told you so," but it was said over and over again in the various debates we have had on this question in the years that have passed, that we should get into difficulty if we provided, as we have by law, that income-tax returns should be secret. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] gave an illustration of what would happen in his State, and the same thing I think could happen in every State in the Union. A citizen claiming that he has been overtaxed appears, in the instance mentioned by the Senator from Alabama, before the board of county commissioners. He has to make an affidavit; there is a sort of trial, with the doors open, with the public admitted, there being no secrecy about it. The board adjudicates the case, and even though a citizen in following the case might not agree with the judgment of the board, unless he believed there was corruption, or something of that kind, he would accept the judgment of the board as final; he would be satisfied. On the other hand, if the action were taken in secret, the whole county in the case to which I refer would be talking about it the next day, and saying that the board of county commissioners had given to Mr. John Jones a refund of a tax of a thousand dollars, that they had done it in secret, and had never given the reason why the application was made and the hearings held in secret. Multiply that by a million, and you have what is going on in the Treasury Department by officials, some of them minor officials, and clerks who are passing on questions in the result of which every taxpayer in the United States is directly interested. We have evidence before us, I think undisputed—at least, so far it is undisputed—that in 1917 the Steel Corporation made its tax return without any coercion; it did it willingly under the law; and later on applied for and received a rebate of several million dollars.

That may be all right; if we could look behind the closed doors and examine the application and the evidence we would know in our judgment whether it was all right. Not being able to ascertain the facts we can not say that it was wrong; but is there anybody, knowing the Steel Corporation, which is one of the greatest corporations in the world, who believes that when that corporation makes a tax return it will be at all likely to make a return detrimental to itself? It may do that; it may be perfectly honest about it; but the presumption will not lead one to that conclusion. The thing that would cure it all would be publicity.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. NORRIS. Of course I yield.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I should like to suggest to the Senator that the first return was filed on April 16, 1918; and there was not anybody then living or now living who at that time knew how invested capital should be calculated. The law had just been passed; the special assessment section of the law, as it is called, had not been construed, and nobody knew what it meant. It was in the middle of the World War and there was no time for any tax board to get considered advice on it. I think the Steel Corporation was only one of a very large number of corporations which made larger returns than they should have done and paid more taxes than they should have paid. I think that is worth carrying in our minds.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senator that in all these matters the officials of the department comply with the law. That is the testimony before the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that is the testimony before the committee.

Mr. WARREN. That testimony was quite elaborate. I should like to say further, so far as secrecy is concerned, that when the question is stripped of other considerations, as it can be by reading the testimony, there is very little of it left, and what is left is because of legislation of the Congress. In giving their testimony the officials of the department were very careful, as I noticed once or twice, not to go further than the law permitted, but there seemed to be a disposition to go just as far as the law permitted them to go, at the same time obeying the law.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly. I said in the beginning that Congress enacted the law as to secrecy, and I am not finding fault with any of the officials. I am trying now, if I can, in my weak way, to have Congress remedy the difficulty which the statement of the Senator from Wyoming on its face admits exists. He says these officials are very nice; they seem to be anxious to go just as far toward publicity as the law will let them go. That is an admission, to begin with, that there is a barrier set up by the law over which and beyond which these men dare not go without violating the law. That is the criticism I am making now. It is the law that is wrong.

However, I was calling attention to the fact that those of us who realized that secrecy was going to get us into difficulty tried to change the law. We have tried it, I think, in every tax bill that has ever been before Congress since prior to the beginning of the World War. Sometimes we were successful so far as the Senate was concerned, but at no time did we succeed in putting into the law a real publicity feature with teeth in it, a feature that those who advocated it believed to be anywhere nearly satisfactory. If we had publicity we would get rid of all suspicion, and we would get rid of what must sometimes come, if it is not here now, corruption in these matters. We can not continue secret methods indefinitely and keep corruption out. We would get rid of it if we had publicity and public business were not transacted behind closed doors in secret. When a committee of the Senate tried to get information from the officials whose very existence it provided and asked them on the witness stand to give information, they answered—and properly answered—"We can not tell you that, Senator; that is a violation of the law, the law that you passed."

No one was hurt because the small taxpayer mentioned by the Senator from Alabama—and whether it be the case of a little taxpayer or a big taxpayer matters not—had his tax refunded in a public manner. Is anybody trying to repeal that law? No; it is conceded to be right and to be necessary; but when it comes to the refund of Federal taxes, involving millions and hundreds of millions and billions, then it is said, "Drop the curtain; keep the people back; do not let anybody know the facts." One of the difficulties, though not the only difficulty, is that behind this curtain of secrecy in the Treasury Department they seem to be able to conceal from the bright newspaper men the things they do, whereas here in this august body we have not been able to do that. Perhaps we can learn from the officials in the Treasury Department or the officials in the Bureau of Internal Revenue how to do it. We certainly have not been able to do it as yet in this body, and I confess I am rather delighted that we have failed in our attempt. I do not feel very sorry about it.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, the pending proposition, as I understand, is to appropriate $75,000,000 in addition to what has already been appropriated——

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator that the amount already appropriated is for the next fiscal year, and this appropriation is for the present fiscal year?

Mr. NORRIS. It is a deficiency.

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. GLASS. That, I will say to the Senator, does not affect what I was about to say. The pending proposition is to appropriate $75,000,000 additional to pay for refunds of taxes illegally and erroneously collected, and it has been suggested that all this is to be done in secret; but the text of the bill provides—

> That a report shall be made to Congress by internal-revenue districts, and alphabetically arranged, of all disbursements hereunder in excess of $500 as required by section 3 of the act of May 29, 1928 (45 Stat. 996), including the names of all persons and corporations to whom such payments are made, together with the amount paid to each.

I do not see, under this pending proposition, how any big taxpayer may escape publicity.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the provision which the Senator has read and all in the law to which that provision refers, if adhered to strictly, will not give publicity. There is but little advantage in saying when a refund is made, "We have given to Mr. Smith $50,000; we have given to Mr. Jones $100,000." That much will have to be reported; but that only, it seems to me, in one sense at least, adds to the difficulty. "Why did you give Mr. Jones $100,000? What was his claim? Why is it that Mr. Smith was entitled to $50,000?" "That is a secret; we can not give you that information." The whole transaction is shrouded in mystery at once.

As I remember, in the Couzens committee's investigation down here in the bureau, in the secret archives of it, you will find a decision perhaps in some man's case making a certain order, and a part of that decision will be, "This decision must not be used as a precedent."

What does that mean? What would any lawyer think that meant if he were investigating it and found it? The knowing ones who are inside and know that such an order has been made in secret, and that John Jones has gotten $100,000 by virtue of it, can, with a confederate on the outside—or, if necessary, by resigning and getting a confederate on the outside—say to Mr. Smith, who may have a similar case, "I know of a decision that will give you a hundred or two hundred thousand dollars in the way of a refund of tax"; and that leads to more corruption and unfairness.

What about the fellow who never hears of it? What about the man who has a just claim for a similar refund, assuming that the other one is just? Why should not his tax be refunded? It almost resolves itself to this as a practical proposition—that only those can get redress who are able to pay the enormous fees of these people who get information out through the closed doors of this bureau, assuming for the sake of the argument that in every case they are entitled to redress. There are other men who would get refunds of much smaller amounts, so small that one of these attorneys probably would not fool with them; and yet to such an individual a penny might mean more than a hundred thousand dollars to some other man. He is entitled to a refund, and ought to have it, but he never finds it out. He has no way of telling it. He can not read these decisions; he can not read these arguments that are made; he has no access to the tribunal that makes these immense refunds of taxes.

Mr. President, it may be that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee transfers this work to some place where it ought not to go. I myself have not been convinced that the Board of Tax Appeals is not an appropriate place to which to send it. The thing that moves me more than anything else is that if that happens there will be something in the nature of a trial. It will be public, and there will not be these suspicions, even though they be nothing but suspicions, which everybody knows in time will grow into realities, into proportions of fraud and wrong that will be almost immeasurable. For the sake of good government, honest government, we ought to put this matter somewhere where there will be a trial, and there will be a trial in the open.

Perhaps a better method can be devised. I should be glad to support one if it could be devised; but I should like to say that if the amendment which is now pending, and which will require a suspension of the rules, and therefore a two-thirds vote, is not agreed to, there will be an amendment offered that will not be subject to a point of order, that will in a modified form, at least as far as this appropriation is concerned, reach the dilemma.

It seems to me the better way would be to agree to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, and make it general, so that it will apply not only to this appropriation but to every other appropriation heretofore or hereafter made.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I have discussed this matter so much before the Senate from time to time that I hesitate to take the time of the Senate now, and particularly do I regret having to oppose the proposal made by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR].

The proposal made by the Senator from Tennessee is very involved, and would, as stated by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], greatly complicate the administration of the Income Tax Bureau.

There are some 12,000 claims still pending, as I am informed, before the bureau for old years; and under this proposal all of these cases, in addition to claims for rebates and credits and abatements, would have to go before the Board of Tax Appeals, who are already loaded up for years and years in advance.

It can hardly be contended that a legitimate claim should not be paid. No one contends that; and yet if these legitimate claims had to go before the Board of Tax Appeals it would be years and years before they would be paid, and there would be millions if not hundreds of millions of dollars of interest which would have to be paid by the Government by reason of the mere deferring of the settlement of these claims. It seems to me that under these circumstances other means may be adopted that will very largely accomplish the purpose desired with respect to proper publicity, or making these cases public records.

For that reason I dislike very much to resist the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee, because his objective is correct. He has in mind a perfectly laudable object, and no one would like to see it attained any more than I would; but I think the attempt to attain it in this way is impracticable.

I desire for a moment to go into the question of the discretionary power and thereby the opportunities for privileges and favoritism that can be granted under the existing law and the existing practice.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. COUZENS. I do.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator that if he has a better way to effect the same purpose that I know both he and I have in mind, I shall be delighted to join him in effecting that purpose.

Mr. COUZENS. I thank the Senator very much, because I believe that we both have the same object in mind.

There is a general impression that the so-called Watson-Couzens committee was interested only in resisting refunds; that we had no interest in the taxpayer; that we had an interest only in seeing that refunds were not made, and complaining about irregular and improper tax refunds. That is not the case. The committee endeavored to point out that by these methods—methods provided by law—there was every opportunity in the world for favoritism and for fraud and deceit.

I have repeatedly said that if I were Commissioner of Internal Revenue, or in charge of that bureau, I could perpetuate any political party in power; and I repeat that statement. It is entirely possible, and I believe to an extent practiced, that every contribution to a political party may be secured out of the Treasury of the United States through a refund or an abatement or a credit to these corporations or individuals who contribute to campaign expenses.

I want to show you just a case here that has recently come before the tax commission. The tax commission was created by the act of 1926 or 1928, I forget which, when Congress passed a law providing that a commission should be appointed, constituted of five members of the House Ways and Means Committee and five members of the Senate Finance Committee. In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 5, 1929, you will find a number of tables and copies of letters which came from this tax commission, made up of Members of the House and Members of the Senate; and because of the secret records, which are not now secret, in fact, some of those papers deal specifically with the Reynolds Tobacco Co. The records and the statements in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD refer to the "X Tobacco Co.," and the designation "X Tobacco Co." is used because at that time it was a violation of the law for the staff to use the name of the corporation; but when the refunds were filed it was disclosed that the Reynolds Tobacco Co. secured a refund in the amount paid to the company referred to as the "X Tobacco Co.," so under that process it was possible to develop the fact that it was the same company that was referred to.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] yesterday commended the expert who is in charge of the work for this commission; and in response to a comment from the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] the Senator from Pennsylvania said:

We chose him—

That is, Mr. Parker—

because of his conspicuously fine work with the Couzens committee. Nobody could think that Mr. Parker was prejudiced in favor of the Treasury Department. He has rendered us loyal, faithful, and able service.

Now I want to comment on what Mr. Parker says with respect to this Reynolds Tobacco Co. case.

For example, when the papers first came to the tax commission Mr. Parker objected to the form of settlement that was proposed to be made. Remember that under the law the Bureau of Internal Revenue had to refer to this tax commission all claims in excess of $75,000, and when that was done the commission staff might have 30 days within which to audit and check the accounts; but they were given no authority to resist the payment or to stop the payment, and therefore the law was ineffective and is ineffective.

Mr. Parker wrote to Mr. Alvord, special assistant to the Secretary of the Treasury, under date of June 30, 1927. He says:

In connection with the refund proposed to the R. J. Reynolds Tobacco Co. for the years 1918 to 1921, inclusive, we would like to make an examination of the complete files in this case for the years noted. We respectfully request, therefore, that such files be delivered to our corporation auditor, Mr. Chesteen, in room 2653, Treasury Annex No. 2. The refund in this case is principally due to the computation of the tax under the special-assessment provisions, sections 327 and 328. The profits tax has been fixed in accordance with the rate paid by only one comparative company.

I want to emphasize that "one comparative company," because I am going to refer to it later.

The revenue act of 1916, section 328 (a), contains the following words:

"In the cases specified in section 327, the tax shall be the amount which bears the same ratio to the net income of the taxpayer in excess of the specific exemption of $3,000 for the taxable year as the average tax of representative corporations"—

Plural, "corporations"— engaged in allied or similar trades or business bears to their average net income."

In view of the express provisions of the statute quoted above, it would appear that the use of one comparative in making a determination of tax under this section would be illegal.

In the first place, the word "corporations" is plural; and in the second place it is impossible to give a meaning to the word "average" if applied to only one comparative company.

We would appreciate it if some one of the general counsel's office would give us a legal opinion on this point, as it seems possible that it may have been overlooked. We wish to examine the files in this case, in order to see whether the total advertising costs have been charged to expenses during the years under consideration. Special assessment has been granted on the ground that advertising expenses should have been capitalized, and we are of the opinion, therefore, that at least during the years under consideration such costs should not be allowed to be deducted from income as an expense item.

What happened, in substance, was that both those things happened; they were permitted to deduct for expenses, and, in addition, expenses were capitalized for the purpose of computing excess profits.

Mr. GLASS. What was the response of the bureau to that request of the commission? Did the bureau give the expert of the commission access to the records in the case?

Mr. COUZENS. Yes; they had access to the records in the case, but there seems to be a dispute between Mr. Alvord and Mr. Parker as to whether a written response was made to this request. I find no record of a written reply, at least, having been made to that letter. I am coming to the point later on as to probably the reason for no written reply having been made; or, at least, I do not find it.

To get at this Reynolds Tobacco case and to show the power and the discretion of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and therefore the possibility for favoritism, on page 1219 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 5, 1929, there is a table at the bottom of the page numbering 15 companies. They do not dare under the law to name the companies, but these are specific companies, numbered 1 to 15, all tobacco companies. All of these companies paid their taxes on the statutory basis, not under the special-assessment provision of the tax law.

Company No. 1 was a small company and had a net income of $29,531. They paid a profits tax of $12,725, or 43.09 per cent. I am not going to take up the time of the Senate to enumerate all of these. We will go down to company No. 5, which earned $66,102. They paid $41,981 in profits taxes, or 63.50 per cent.

Then we go down to company No. 15, and we find that they made $583,082 and paid a tax of $263,569, or 45.20 per cent.

The average of what those 15 companies, which were all small companies, earning during 1918 from a minimum of $29,000 up to $583,000, paid in excess-profits taxes was 41.86 per cent of their income.

For 1919 there is shown a table following substantially the same lines, only that the percentage of profit paid to net income during that year by 10 different companies was 14.78 per cent.

Take this "X" company, which is the Reynolds Tobacco case, for instance. In 1918 their statutory tax on excess profits would have been 50.37 per cent. The rate the bureau let them get away with was 26.09 per cent, while the average for these little concerns was 41.86 per cent.

In 1919 the statutory tax for the Reynolds Co. would have been 18.1 per cent. The Treasury let them get away with 6.16 per cent, while the average of the other companies was 14.78 per cent of their net incomes.

In 1920 the statutory tax of the Reynolds Co. would have been 11 per cent, and they settled on 4.67 per cent, while the average for that year for these other companies was 12.38 per cent.

The question arises, why was the Reynolds Tobacco Co. case settled on such a low rate, and why was such a large amount of refund made by the department?

Mr. Parker points out in the letter to which I have referred that the tax was fixed in accordance with the rate paid by only one company. So that left it discretionary with the commissioner or his staff to pick any particular company they liked for comparative purposes. The commissioner could have picked a little company which made a small return and compared the rate of the larger company with that, or he could have picked a large concern and compared it with that.

Mr. GLASS. That would not be a correct interpretation of the law as stated by Mr. Parker.

Mr. COUZENS. That is just exactly the point I make. I say that there is nothing mandatory that the department obey the law. Under this process they would have to obey the law. They can do anything they please, in defiance of law, and there is no way under the sun by which Congress, or any other body, when the taxpayer agrees, can question the payment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. As I understand it, the law requires them to settle in accordance with an average of similar corporations.

Mr. COUZENS. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. They settle, as a matter of fact, by taking one corporation.

Mr. COUZENS. That is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, as the Senator says, and says truly, that was a violation of the law, but it was done secretly.

Mr. COUZENS. Oh, yes.

Mr. NORRIS. That could not have happened if there had been publicity of those decisions.

Mr. COUZENS. I do not like the word "publicity," because the public seems to have misunderstood it. I mean that these records are public records. I do not care whether there is any publicity given to these settlements or not. All I want is that if I am in a like business I may be able to go to the records and see that I get the same kind of treatment my competitors get.

Mr. NORRIS. That is all that anybody wants.

Mr. COUZENS. That is all anybody wants; but the public mind and the minds of Members of Congress are confused between the words "public records" and "publicity." I do not ask for any publicity. I never approved of a publicity clause in revenue acts. What I want is for these records to be public records, so that if I am in the tobacco business and see my competitor, the Reynolds Tobacco Co., get $9,000,000 in refunds, with $2,000,000 interest, I want to be able to go down and see why I do not get the same kind of treatment.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will permit me, on every occasion when we put an amendment in regard to publicity on a revenue bill it was not in the form in which it was written in the law; the provision finally adopted was a different proposition and did not amount to anything. The amendment we adopted simply provided that these returns should be public records and treated and considered as public records generally.

Mr. COUZENS. That is true.

Mr. NORRIS. That is all we tried to do.

Mr. COUZENS. That was true of the last revenue act.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. COUZENS. In previous revenue acts they jockeyed some sort of language into the law which provided that the internal-revenue collector should lay on the counter a list of income taxes which the newspapers could come and get. That was absurd and silly and defeated itself.

Mr. NORRIS. Will not the Senator permit me to explain just how that came about? That was the result of an amendment put on in the Senate which, as I remember it, was word for word with the language we wrote into a previous act. One was copied from the other. But when it was finally agreed to in conference the law had the silly provision in it to which the Senator has referred. Nobody asked for that. That was what the conference committee gave to us in the law. Those in favor of what is ordinarily known as "publicity" never advocated anything of that kind.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask a question at that point?

Mr. COUZENS. I would like to complete my statement; but the Senator may go ahead with his question.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I got the impression, from the questions of the Senator from Nebraska, that he had concluded that the Government had lost by reason of the secrecy in the tobacco case, and the use of only one comparative.

Mr. COUZENS. I was going on with the story.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator did not intend to give that impression, I am sure.

Mr. COUZENS. I had not completed my story. If I may do so, I think I will make that plain, and show that this works both ways, and that we are not only interested in seeing that the Government's revenues are protected but are interested in seeing exact justice done between all taxpayers, and the taxpayer and the Government.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course.

Mr. COUZENS. When they came to make a comparison for the purpose of computing the amount of the special assessment that should be made, I am informed that the bureau took the firm of Liggett & Myers, tobacco people, and they said, "There is what their earnings are, and we will compute the Reynolds Tobacco Co. tax on the same basis." They never went to any of the little concerns, or the other enumerated in the record to which I just referred.

I am informed by members of the staff—I doubt if there is a record here of it—that the reason they did not take the American Tobacco Co. and other cases was that had they done so, and added the rates together, and averaged the assessment on that basis, the refund to the Reynolds Tobacco Co. would have been $5,000,000 more. That is what the Senator from Pennsylvania means when he says that the Government was not gotten the best of in this settlement. In other words, if the Reynolds Tobacco Co. had gone in and been able to look over the records of the American Tobacco Co., or of the Liggett & Myers Co., or the other big companies, they would have said, "Here, take these comparisons, and if you do we will have $5,000,000 more of a refund coming." But they were not able to see those records.

Suppose the Reynolds Tobacco Co. had refused to contribute to the Republican Party and they were therefore compelled to pay $5,000,000 more taxes. I mean that is an example of the possibilities. I do not even claim that such possibilities exist; I do not know; but if I were in charge of the department, and I wanted to do so, I think I could make it so that it would not cost anybody anything to conduct a Republican campaign or a Democratic campaign, according to which party happened to be in charge of the administration.

The strange thing is that everybody is so involved in this matter. Every company has such a stake, whether it is a banking company, a publishing company, a manufacturer, or what not, they have all such a stake in the Treasury Department that they do not dare publicly to criticize the kind of settlements that are handed down in the department.

It is incomprehensible to me why anybody should oppose this. Distinguished Senators, like the chairman of the Finance Committee and the ranking member on the Democratic side, both wrote letters to the Reynolds Tobacco Co., pointing out that the law contemplated that that was the kind of a concern that was to receive the benefits of the special assessment taxes. The courts have ruled that this discretionary power in the Commissioner of Internal Revenue can not be reviewed by the courts. So that in the settlement of these cases the decision of the commissioner is final, it is not subject to review by anyone, not even the courts of the country can review them. They have already decided that, because they say it is wholly discretionary with the commissioner.

It is said that most of these refunds are based on decisions over which the bureau has no control. Twenty-five per cent of these refunds are based on claims under the special assessment statutes, and therefore it is entirely discretionary with the commissioner.

It may be said that the Congress is responsible for making that sort of a law. It is, in the initial stages, yes; but we have a right to assume, when we pass a statute of that sort, that discretion will be used with judgment, and I contend that in these cases there has been no kind of judgment used in the method of computing these special assessments, so that in the absence of that there has been all kinds of possibility and probability of favoritism.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator recalls the testimony of Mr. Blair, the commissioner, that he had never exercised that discretion himself at all; that he had never passed on any case; and so the discretion that is being exercised must necessarily be that of some employee of the department.

Mr. COUZENS. That is true, but I think, perhaps, the commissioner overstated the fact, because I know the record shows cases in which he was conferred with, and complaint has been made that he has been dilatory in reaching a final conclusion in many of those cases and thereby caused delay.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. PHIPPS. Having heard the testimony of the commissioner, I want to say that I did not derive the understanding from his statement that appears to have been derived by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will read what he said so there can be no doubt about it.

Mr. PHIPPS. I do not think that point was definitely brought out.

Mr. McKELLAR. We will see about it. I will look it up and read it as soon as I find it.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, it is always an unhappy thing to have to refer to one's personal experiences and his personal affairs in matters of this kind, but the Senator from Tennessee in discussion of the case this morning brought out the opportunities for the tax experts to mulct the public because of having inside information. There would not be any inside information if the records were public records. The decisions rendered by the solicitor would not have the statement in them that "this case is not to be used as a precedent for other cases." The decisions would all be made public, and like cases would get the same treatment.

I think it may be said that the anxiety of the Bureau of Internal Revenue at times to get revenue has caused them to do as much injury to the taxpayers as to the Government. I am not saying that the action of the Bureau of Internal Revenue has always been on the side of the taxpayer or always on the side of the Government. It is their lack of proper balance and proper judgment that I criticize. I contend that that would not be possible if the records were public records. I think in many cases the taxpayers have been done a great injustice, and I think in many cases favoritism to taxpayers has resulted in injury to the Government.

For instance, in 1922, before I came to the Senate, Mr. Thompson, of Black & Thompson, first presented to Mr. Mellon the so-called difference in valuation of Ford's stock valuation in 1913. He came to my office and said, "You were required to report a certain dividend in the year 1919 as income. I can get that put back into the 1916 or 1917 tax return." That would have carried with it a much lower rate than the 1919 rate, because the 1919 rate was the highest rate in all history. I said, naturally, "What will it cost?" "Oh, half a million dollars." I said, "What are you going to use a half million dollars for?" He said, "There is a lot of work to be done in the Treasury Department, a lot of people to see, expenses to incur, and so on. It will take half a million dollars to get that million-dollar refund or to get that dividend placed back in the year 1917 so you will have a lesser rate to pay." The difference, as I said, was approximately a million dollars.

Obviously, of course, I turned the proposition down and let the matter stay in the year in which the bureau had put it, as I thought the bureau was right and that it was placed in the proper year. It was one of the cases where the man with inside information could go around and solicit business. While I recognize it is a violation of the rules to solicit business, yet they do it, and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] knows of cases where they have solicited business. I think everybody having any information at all on the subject knows that it is done promiscuously.

As I said, I do not want to take the time of the Senator unduly, but I can not possibly follow the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] on his amendment, although his objects are highly desirable. However, I am afraid it would result in a worse condition than exists now. I believe the only cure for the situation is to decline any appropriations for refunds until the claims have been passed on by the bureau. Just think of the absurdity of making appropriations for nearly a billion dollars in advance of any information to the Senate or to the Congress as to how the money is to be used, to whom it is to go, and under what circumstances and why. If we make an appropriation for a judgment rendered by the Court of Claims we know the circumstances of the case and we decide from those circumstances whether we should make the appropriation.

But we have given the Bureau of Internal Revenue in the last eight years a blanket billion dollars and said, in effect, "Here is a billion dollars; do as you please with it; use it in secret; refund to whom you may desire." If the appropriation was eliminated and the Congress were to say that no appropriations will be made for refunds until the bureau has submitted the cases and the circumstances, the names of those to whom the money is to be paid, and so forth, there would be some sense to it. But Congress never expected, in my judgment, that the tax commissioner should be able to pass upon the matter intelligently without any delay or expense to the Government.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

Mr. COUZENS. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. I quite agree with the Senator from Michigan that the object sought to be attained by the Senator from Tennessee and approved by the Senator from Michigan is an object I would like to see attained. The Senator has offered a practical solution of the situation. I do not think the proposed amendment submitted by the Senator from Tennessee is a practical solution.

Mr. COUZENS. I hesitate, as I said, to oppose it, because the object desired is one which I have very much at heart; but I am afraid his plan will not work.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator knows that Congress is responsible for the situation. The Internal Revenue Bureau is not responsible for it.

Mr. COUZENS. It is responsible for its lack of judgment.

Mr. GLASS. I mean the secrecy of the situation.

Mr. COUZENS. That is true.

Mr. GLASS. Effort after effort has been made here to make the records public, and the Congress is responsible for the failure to do it.

Mr. COUZENS. While we are on that subject will the Senator permit me to ask him a question? I quote from a statement he made a while ago:

> I long ago called the attention of the Senate to the fact that a little clerk up in the Internal Revenue Bureau positively maneuvered the Government into a position where it might plead the statute of limitations against a taxpayer in my State. I had to appeal personally to the Secretary of the Treasury to get him to cancel the order.

I would like to know from the Senator if the Secretary of the Treasury has the power to waive the statute of limitations? Has he the power, or did he merely exercise it on his own account?

Mr. GLASS. This occurred: A taxpayer in Virginia was notified that there was due on back assessments the sum of $2,384, it being a small corporation, and that if it were not paid within a given time the penalty would accrue. They were put to the necessity of coming to Washington and employing a lawyer and an actuary to go before the bureau and present his case. After the presentation of the case the bureau was compelled to come to the conclusion that instead of owing the Government $2,348, it had overpaid its taxes to the extent, as I recall it, of approximately $200. An attaché of the bureau so delayed sending out the Government's check for the refund of this erroneous assessment as to maneuver the Government into a position where it might claim the advantage of the statute of limitations and refuse the repayment of the $200.

Mr. COUZENS. Did they actually do it?

Mr. GLASS. They did actually do that. The matter incidentally came to my attention, and I felt so indignant about it that I went to the Secretary of the Treasury and stated the case to him. He agreed that it was an outrageous performance, and the next day I had a letter from the Internal Revenue Bureau, about as follows:

> DEAR SENATOR: I believe that you were somewhat interested in a tax case of a given corporation in your State. We find upon examination that a certain letter written by the corporation at a certain time may be construed as within the limitation, and we are pleased to tell you that a check for the overassessment has gone to the taxpayer as of this date.

Mr. COUZENS. Does the Senator suppose that anyone but a United States Senator would have received such consideration if he had gone down there?

Mr. GLASS. I do not know as to that. I know that the taxpayer had not gotten any consideration.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to enable me to place in the RECORD what Commissioner Blair said?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. On page 2 of the hearings appears the following:

> Senator McKELLAR. You yourself do not actually review these cases?
> Commissioner BLAIR. No; I can not possibly do it.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. And on the following page appears the following:

> Senator McKELLAR. As a matter of fact, I do not suppose you have ever passed on one yourself, have you?
> Commissioner BLAIR. It very often happens that these cases are appealed to me, and in an important case, where the head of the unit is in doubt, he often comes to me and discusses the case. I do not go into them unless the people in the unit bring them to me, but when they are in doubt about a question they come very frequently and discuss these matters with me.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, before I conclude I want to make a short reference to the Steel Corporation. I make reference to it because there has been a great deal of publicity about the large amount to be refunded to that corporation.

When the committee was appointed by the Senate to investigate the Bureau of Internal Revenue the situation with respect to the Steel Corporation was most deplorable and in such chaos that the committee could do very little with it. The committee examiners examined the case and the rulings that were then proposed to adjust and settle the taxes. The experts of the committee protested against some of the proposed decisions in the settlement. I recall one related to the Steel Corporation having claimed amortization on railroad property when railroad property was excluded from amortization under the law and no railroad company was enabled under the law to get any amortization by the expansion of their property for war purposes.

We protested against any allowance for amortization on the Steel Corporation railroad. I understand the bureau agreed that we were right and said they would not permit any amortization on the railroad property. There were other subjects, such as amortization of the steel plant depreciation and obsolescence. That was the best we could get out of it at that time. Senators will remember that we were under great pressure. The Treasury Department and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] were driving us to get out of the department. I do not know just why they were in such haste to get us out, but they put a limit on the time in which we could continue our investigation.

When we left, the case was then at the point of being reaudited and the property reappraised; and now that the settlement is about to be concluded, I am informed that under the able Mr. Parker—and everyone agrees that he is able—the settlement is not in accordance with the law and not in accordance with good practice or the prior decisions of the Bureau of Internal Revenue. I assume that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], who frankly admits he is attorney for the Steel Corporation, or at least did admit it at one time, will be able to tell us why the settlements are made. I assume that he, being a member of the tax commission, will be able to tell us why what we considered illegal and improper adjustments have been made.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania obtained the floor.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, before the Senator from Michigan takes his seat——

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator from Michigan has taken his seat, and for the moment I decline to yield. I might even rise to a question of personal privilege in response to the last remark of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. President, since the Steel Corporation was organized in 1901 my firm has represented it in Pittsburgh. For decades prior to that time the firm, even before I was born, represented a number of the constituent companies of what is now the Steel Corporation, and I have no occasion to apologize for that.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to me?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I want to say that I imputed no improper motive to the Senator. I commended him, because when the case came before the joint committee I am informed that he refused to express an opinion before the committee, because he was interested as an attorney for that corporation. I want to make that explanation because I am imputing no improper motives to him.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I thank the Senator.

I never had a tax case for the Steel Corporation in my life. I did not know this case was pending until I learned about it in connection with the work of the joint committee and the so-called Couzens committee. I never talked to any officer of the Steel Corporation about it, and all I know about it I have learned from the Government's side. I did not sit in the session of the Joint Committee on Internal Revenue Taxation, of which I have the honor to be a member, until I had explained to the full membership in the presence of Government counsel my connection in other matters with the Steel Corporation, and I offered to withdraw from the meeting if any person there had any question about the propriety of my staying; and they were all good enough to say that they hoped I would not withdraw.

Mr. President, I do not know a blessed thing about this case that is not known to other members of the joint committee, nor do I know anything other than what I have learned in the open meetings of that committee. I have no interest in the Steel Corporation as a stockholder. It is a matter of indifference to me whether it gets a refund or pays an additional tax. I am sorry to talk so much about myself, but I felt driven to do it.

I wish to say a few words about the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR]. The proposition is that wherever an overpayment of taxes is claimed by the taxpayer to have been made, if his claim exceeds $10,000, whatever the nature of his tax, he shall be driven to a lawsuit before the Board of Tax Appeals in order to get his money back.

At present the Board of Tax Appeals is disposing of about 2,000 cases a year. Last year it heard and disposed of 2,085 cases. At the present moment it has pending on its docket over 20,000 contested cases in which deficiencies are asserted against the taxpayer. The board is moving at a speed of 2,000 cases a year. Anybody can figure what that means. If this amendment shall be adopted, it will mean that over 4,000 additional cases per year will be thrown into the Board of Tax Appeals. Last year there were 4,052 claims for refunds of more than $10,000; in other words, if not another case of the type of which the board now has jurisdiction were brought before it in the future, if its present business stopped dead here, then the new business which would be brought to the board by the McKellar amendment would come in at twice the rate at which the board is able to hear cases and dispose of them; in other words again, we should have to double the membership of that board just to enable it to hear the cases that would come to it under the McKellar amendment alone.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to me?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Pennsylvania understands, does he not, that the Board of Tax Appeals takes a different view of that? The members of that board believe that with their present membership all cases can be disposed of with reasonable promptness.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I should like to see some evidence to justify that faith. They have been falling behind at a great rate, and a couple of years ago it looked as though the Board of Tax Appeals would have to be abolished because it was serving simply as a dam that backed up the current work of the department.

Let me remind the Senate what this amendment would mean. Take the Steel Corporation case that has been talked about so much. The number of sheets of paper in the record in that case, which under this amendment would have to be certified to the Board of Tax Appeals, is over 100,000. The record in that case which the commissioner would have to certify to the Board of Tax Appeals is so voluminous that it could not be gotten into a committee room of the size of the Appropriations Committee room in which the hearings on the pending bill were held. Imagine certifying a record like that to the Board of Tax Appeals.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to me?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator recalls that the amendment provides on its face that only such part of the record shall be certified as under regulations of the Board of Tax Appeals shall be found necessary.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Very good. I read the amendment to require the entire record to go there, but suppose it required only the decision? The decision in the Steel Corporation case covers more than 2,400 pages. How long would it take the members of the Board of Tax Appeals to read understandingly 2,400 pages of closely written typewriting dealing with the most difficult technical subjects? That is the proposition. If we want to sink the Board of Tax Appeals to the point where it will be utterly useless for any sort of functioning, that is the way to load it up, for inside of three months it would be so snowed under that it could not possibly perform the functions for which it was intended.

Do not let us blame the Commission of Internal Revenue too much; let us put a little of the blame where the blame belongs. Of all of the mysterious pieces of legislation that ever was passed in the name of a taxing system, the excess profits tax law, with which we tried to raise money in war times, is probably the worse. Lewis Carroll in Alice in Wonderland could not have done justice to the subject. Let me read to the Senate, by way of reminder, two sentences which form the basis of what is called the special-assessment action in the Reynolds Tobacco case, and then ask the Senate whether the commission is to blame for using what seems to be a vague discretion. I will read the order that went to him from the Congress of the United States in sections 327 and 328 of the tax law of 1918.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President——

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. BRATTON. Before the Senator from Pennsylvania proceeds further, I understood him to contend that the Board of Tax Appeals could not review these cases without doing an injustice to its present volume of work and without getting further behind.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That is correct.

Mr. BRATTON. That is a procedural matter with which we might be concerned. It seems to me, however, that the principle with which we should concern ourselves is whether it is wise to have refunds of $10,000 or more reviewed by some tribunal in public. Will the Senator not give us the benefit of his views on that feature of the question?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. In a moment I will be glad to do so. In passing I may say that I do not think administrative action of the Government is improved by reposing a supervisory authority in the judiciary. I think that administration and the judicial action should be kept apart. I never have approved in theory of the joint committee having power to supervise tax refunds. I do not think that it is the business of the legislature to supervise current administrative action except for the sake of getting information. In this instance, of course, we need all the information we can get; but if we are expected to regulate current administrative action we are going beyond the wise limits of our power.

Mr. BRATTON. The point I had in mind was that if every controversy involving a claimed refund of $10,000 or more should be reviewed by some administrative tribunal and we also should think that the Board of Tax Appeals is incapacitated to handle the increased volume of business, whether we should provide a tribunal to hear and determine those matters.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I beg the Senator's pardon. I agree that controversies over refunds of $10,000 or any other amount should be judicially determined. What I object to is sending to the Board of Tax Appeals cases as to which there is no controversy between the bureau and the taxpayer; and that is what this amendment would do.

Mr. BRATTON. Even though the matter might not be in open active controversy, if it involves a refund of more than a certain figure, substantial in size, does not the Senator think that the case should be reviewed by some tribunal where there could be publicity?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The question of publicity is a different question entirely.

Mr. BRATTON. The general subject of publicity as applied to all matters involving the Internal Revenue Bureau is a different question; but confining ourselves to cases involving claimed refunds of more than $10,000, it seems to me that they are of sufficient magnitude and importance that the confidence of the country in Government would be enhanced by having the cases reviewed by some tribunal in such a way that the public may know the facts.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I will grant that any controversy ought to be adjudicated by a tribunal as nearly impartial as we can make it, but certainly there is no ground calling for the action of the judicial department until there is something to adjudicate, and where all the parties at interest are agreed upon the action to be taken there is nothing to adjudicate; there is no controversy to be settled.

Mr. BRATTON. Yes; there is something to adjudicate. It is the contention of the taxpayer that he is entitled to a refund. Although it may not be defended actively by anyone on behalf of the Government, still the claim of the taxpayer is a matter to be adjudicated. In my opinion, it is conducive to confidence in the bureau, confidence in the department, to have the contention reviewed by some authority where the facts can be made public.

I do not say that from any spirit of criticism or any lack of confidence in the bureau or department, but more in harmony with the idea of inspiring confidence in the Government and satisfaction with the results obtained.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I agree with the Senator that the trust which our people have in the judicial department of the Government gives them confidence as to any matter on which that department has passed; our people have faith in the courts; but it would be possible to carry that suggestion to the extreme of saying that every income-tax return and every income-tax assessment should be supervised by a Federal judge. That would add confidence, and it could be supported by the same argument as could the contention that refunds should be submitted to a judge for revision.

But, after all, Mr. President, we draw from the same reservoir of human beings our administrative officials and our judges; and we ought, if we make the position of sufficient dignity, to be able to get as honest men and as able men in the administrative department as we get in the judicial department.

Mr. BRATTON. I believe the Senator, out of his ripe experience as a practitioner, will agree with me that the people of the country have peculiar confidence in the judiciary. I think the bulwark of our safety lies in their continued trust and confidence in the judiciary.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BINGHAM in the chair). Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I do.

Mr. McKELLAR. Under the peculiar situation surrounding this problem, there may be something in what the Senator has to say. I have prepared an amendment which will carry out the view that he has expressed, and I hope he will accept it, and will urge the committee to accept it:

Provided, That no part of the funds herein appropriated for tax refunds shall be paid out except upon hearings before any committee or officer conducting the same, which hearings shall be open to the public and the decision shall be public.

That conforms entirely to everything the Senator has said and everything that has been said here to-day, and takes away the entire argument of the Senator about the overburdened Board of Tax Appeals. If the Senator will accept that amendment, I will modify my amendment so as to read as I have just submitted.

Mr. HEFLIN. I hope the Senator will accept it, Mr. President.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It is not for me to accept it. The Senator has the right to perfect his amendment in any way he pleases.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; but inasmuch as the amendment is in exact accord with the position that the Senator has just taken, I am quite sure that if the Senator would recommend it to the chairman of the committee we could get a unanimous-consent agreement to put it in the bill right away.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, the amendment now offered by the Senator effectually complies with all that I have heretofore said with regard to the unwisdom of throwing this matter into the judicial department; but it does not meet the objections that I have to unnecessary publicity of the private affairs of the citizen.

Mr. McKELLAR. But the Senator surely will agree that if a taxpayer thinks he has been done an injustice by the Government, and seeks to have that injustice remedied, the taxpayer ought to be willing to lift the veil of secrecy from that transaction. He ought to be delighted to lift the veil of secrecy from the transaction, so that it can be understood by everybody and by the Government, and the Government can repay the money.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, what I have to say will be very much abbreviated by the action of the Senator in modifying his proposal.

I desire to say just a word about the modified proposal which the Senator now offers.

A great many of these refunds arise not out of any mistake, not out of any dishonesty or attempted fraud on the part of the taxpayer, and not on account of any fault of the bureau itself. Let me give an illustration.

The successive tax laws passed since 1921 have made especially favorable treatment for insurance companies, allowing them to deduct from their income 4 per cent to be applied on account of reserve against their policies, and the companies being taxed only on the balance over that 4 per cent. Controversy arose as to whether their tax-exempt interest ought to be credited against that 4 per cent or not. The Supreme Court, after long litigation, held that the tax-exempt interest ought not to be. The bureau was trying to get the most money that could be yielded under any reasonable interpretation of that clause. That single decision of the United States Supreme Court compelled refunds of $35,000,000.

Again, the bureau during the war years took the position that a stock dividend was taxable income. It was strenuously argued that that was wrong, but there was a doubt about it; and the bureau did exactly right in resolving that doubt in favor of the Government until there should be a judicial decision. That was finally decided by the Supreme Court, and that decision cost the United States $70,000,000.

Suppose that I had been one of the taxpayers interested in that stock-dividend decision. Suppose I had been assessed on a stock dividend. I was not, as a matter of fact, but I might have been. Any of us might have been. In order to get the benefit of that decision of the United States Supreme Court, why should I be compelled to bare to all my rival lawyers in my home town all the details of my private practice?

Suppose the Reynolds Tobacco Co. had been the beneficiary of that decision. Why should it, at this time of most intense competition between these four great tobacco companies, be compelled to reveal to those other three all the details of its business, while they keep secret all that they are doing, merely because the one company has to come in to get the benefit of a Supreme Court decision where the bureau admits that they are right, and the other companies are not required to do that?

If everything in the Income Tax Unit, every paper that is filed there, is going to be made public, so that each competitor may know all about the others, so that every neighbor may know all the gossip about all his acquaintances; if publicity is to be completely applied, that is one thing; but merely to impose publicity on the unfortunate victim of an admitted overexaction by the bureau certainly is not fair. You punish him doubly then. First, he is mulcted for a tax which admittedly he is entitled to get back; and next, you say that he shall not get it back until he has been subjected to the second indignity of having his affairs bared to all the world.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I am glad to yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. This question of publicity of tax refunds differs altogether from publishing a man's tax returns. Everybody makes a tax return, and secrecy conceals that; but if a man believes that he has the right, if he goes into a court, of course it becomes public, if he is permitted to sue.

Now, this is in the nature of a suit in which the taxpayer alleges that the Government has money that belongs to him. By what process of reasoning do we say that he has a right to maintain this action to recover large sums of money and do it in secret when no citizen is privileged to litigate the question of a penny in a court of justice without opening it to the entire public?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I quite agree with the Senator. If there is a controversy it has to be adjudicated, and it ought to be adjudicated publicly.

Mr. CARAWAY. Of course.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. But if there is no controversy, he has the same right to settle his——

Mr. CARAWAY. There is no refund unless there is a controversy, because, if you have the money and I demand it of you, that raises a question. It may be a friendly suit; it may be a suit about which there will be no dispute as to the facts, but it is a controversy that some third person settles; and having settled it in my favor or your favor makes no difference. It is a controversy that is settled, and the public has the right to know about it if there should be publicity about litigation of any kind.

There has been a theory always advanced by certain people that controversies ought to be secret; that courts should sit in secret, particularly concerning domestic relations; but the prevailing view is the other way. As long as that is the prevailing view with reference to any other controversy that is settled in any place where a man recovers something, I do not know any sacredness about these controversies about tax refunds.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, the Senator is putting several questions to me, and I would rather answer one at a time.

Mr. CARAWAY. I know I am. I have been trying to make an argument in the Senator's time. That is what I was doing.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I agree with the Senator that every controversy ought to be litigated in the open; that if there is disagreement between the bureau and the taxpayer, whether that disagreement goes to the Board of Tax Appeals or to the Federal district court or to the Court of Claims, the record ought to be open.

Mr. CARAWAY. Well, why? Why?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That is the Anglo-Saxon custom.

Mr. CARAWAY. The very fact, then, that it is the Anglo-Saxon custom ought all the more to cause that custom to prevail where the suit is a friendly suit, because the public has no protection against an unjust refund except publicity. If there is any reason at all for the publicity of a controverted question, all the more reason exists if there is not any controversy, but the man is to get the benefit of a refund.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Then the same argument should apply to the original return and the original assessment.

Mr. CARAWAY. I voted for that at one time under that very theory. I yielded my better judgment because so many people contended that trade secrets and incomes and the ability of a man to finance his enterprises were disclosed and unfair advantages had. I yielded, I say, to that argument, and voted for the repeal of the publicity law; but I think there is a world of difference between a tax return and a request for refund after he has made his return and paid his taxes. He is like anybody else then. He has a demand against the Government. Having a demand against the Government, every citizen in America has an interest in that controversy.

But beyond all that, I think the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] put his hand on the sore spot. I am going to assume that the men in public office dealing with these tax refunds are honest men; that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is honest; that the Secretary of the Treasury is honest. They need the protection of being able to disclose what they do against the sly insinuations and suspicions of people who do not agree with them. This proposed change is for their protection as much as it is for the protection of the taxpayer himself.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, a good deal has been said about the danger to the interests of the Government in these tax refunds and tax credits. May I suggest that that danger is comparatively small as compared with the danger of inadequate returns of taxation accepted without controversy by the auditing officials; that we can not apply to this matter of refunds any rule of publicity that should not logically be applied to the original return and the audit that is made of it.

Mr. CARAWAY. I recognize the force of that argument; but that argument failed in view of the other contention that more harm came than good. It was a compromise with anybody as to whether they should vote for complete publicity, or vote for partial publicity, or vote for complete secrecy. I can not conceive of the department not being delighted to make public these refunds, because its attitude is wholly different from that of receiving a man's assessment and passing it because it rested to a certain extent upon the honor of the man who made it. It does not rest upon the department's honor, but these refunds are wholly shifted; they rest upon the honor and integrity of the department.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes, Mr. President; that is true. I think the Senator from Arkansas was not here; we tried to cover this before the Senator came in. If I seemed to be impatient, I hope he will indulge me.

Mr. CARAWAY. Certainly. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. There is such a large proportion of these refunds which are indisputably due, not to mistake, but due to some subsequent legislation, or to some general decision of the courts, that it seems unfair to penalize the taxpayer who already has paid too much by a second penalty of publicity.

Before the Senator came in, I called attention to the fact that $264,000,000 out of $935,000,000 of refunds that have been made in the past 10 years—$264,000,000 out of $935,000,000, about 28 per cent—were made because of decisions of the Federal courts, other than decisions of the Board of Tax Appeals. One case, which I need not go over again, relating to stock dividends, called for the payment of $70,000,000 to a large group of taxpayers. Another single case required the payment of over $35,000,000 to a considerable number of life-insurance companies. Obviously, it is unfair to single out the few companies which are affected by that decision and compel them to reveal to their competitors the secrets which they themselves can not get from their competitors.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I wonder why there is objection to having these records made public records in that case, and yet, if the Government resists a claim, there is no hesitancy upon the taxpayer's part in going before a tribunal and exposing all his returns.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I grant you that.

Mr. COUZENS. If the Government resists, what is the difference?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It is just like a controversy between any two individuals. If we are in a controversy, to be settled judicially, we have to take it into open court, where all the world can hear. Moses sits at the gate and not inside some closed room. That is the penalty we pay for seeking a judicial decision of a controversy. But if we are agreed on a settlement we can make that settlement in the middle of the desert, and no man has a right to know how we do it.

Mr. COUZENS. Will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. COUZENS. Does not the Senator see the difference between the kind of a settlement between individuals, in which there is no public interest, and a settlement between a governmental bureau and a citizen, in which there is a public interest?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Of course I do.

Mr. COUZENS. But the Senator ignores it.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. And I agree that the action of those governmental officials should be subject to the most intense scrutiny and criticism and check by any agency that the legislature reasonably may choose to act as auditor. But it does no good to anything but the lowest form of curiosity to blazon out the private affairs of individuals before the whole country.

Mr. BRATTON and Mr. McKELLAR addressed the Chair.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Just a minute. I know all the arguments which have been advanced in favor of pitiless publicity, and they are plausible always, but it is an Anglo-Saxon proverb that a man's house is his castle, and that there are certain affairs of his that are his business.

Mr. COUZENS. Is it true that under the prohibition law his house is his castle?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It ought to be.

Mr. COUZENS. Is it?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I never had occasion to test it.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to direct one question to him?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. BRATTON. Let us assume that two business men have claims against the Government, each for a refund of $12,000. They submit their respective claims. The bureau agrees to the refund in one case and denies it in the other. Does the Senator think that the man whose claim has been denied occupies any different or less considerate position on the score of publicity from the man whose claim has been allowed?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Not in the least.

Mr. BRATTON. If it violates the right of privacy in one instance, why does it fail to do so in the other? They seem to be on a parity so far as the right of privacy extends.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. It is violating the right to privacy, and that is something which one must suffer when he appeals to the courts for the adjudication of a controversy. Just because you bar the intimate domestic details of the life of John Smith in his divorce case is no reason why you should bare the details of anybody else's life who is not in the divorce court.

Mr. BRATTON. The difference is that in these matters of taxation you deal with the public, while in domestic affairs between two spouses you are dealing exclusively with private affairs.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Each of them involves private rights and public rights as well.

Mr. CARAWAY. If they should get a divorce by friendly agreement, they would still get publicity, would they not?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. They should; yes.

Mr. CARAWAY. They would; so that is not quite a happy suggestion.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The illustration could not be carried all the way through.

Mr. CARAWAY. No; it will not fit all the way down. I want to ask the Senator another question as to his statement that two individuals may settle their controversy in the desert, and it does not concern Moses, whether it be the Senator or somebody else. The unfortunate thing is that that is not two people dealing with their own affairs. One is an agent, dealing with the property of somebody else. Whether you call him a court or a bureau, whatever he is, he is dealing with a third person's property. He is settling a contention between two people. It is not a private controversy between him and somebody else, and they are not dealing with private affairs at all; they are dealing with public affairs.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator looks at it differently from the way I look at it. I think some cases of tax assessments involve controversies, and some do not.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I want just to remind the Senate whose is the fault that cases like the R. J. Reynolds case and others of that class have arisen. Will the Senate bear with me while I read a couple of sentences out of the old excess-profits tax law, which furnished the warrant for the action taken in the Reynolds case? Fortunately, this law has been repealed and no longer remains to disgrace our statute books. I ask the Senate to consider the responsibility we have laid upon the shoulders of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and the vagueness with which we have defined that responsibility. This is what we say:

> Where upon application by the corporation the commissioner finds and so declares of record that the tax if determined without benefit of this section would, owing to abnormal conditions affecting the capital or income of the corporation, work upon the corporation an exceptional hardship evidenced by gross disproportion between the tax exempted without benefit of this section and the tax computed by reference to the representative operations specified in section 328.

The commissioner then may make a special assessment. This is in ascertaining the amount of the capital on which the corporation shall be permitted to earn about 8 per cent before incurring a special additional tax. If the commissioner, having nothing but his common sense and his faith in Heaven to guide him, finds "abnormal conditions," and "exceptional hardship," and "gross disproportion," whatever those three vague things may mean, then this is the rule that he is to try to apply, and this is the thing that I say sounds as if it came out of Alice in Wonderland and not out of an act of Congress:

> In the cases specified in section 327 the tax shall be the amount which bears the same ratio to the net income of the taxpayer (in excess of the specific exemption of $3,000) for the taxable year, as the average tax of representative corporations engaged in a like or similar trade or business bears to their average net income (in excess of the specific exemption of $3,000) for such year. * * *
> In computing the tax under this section the commissioner shall compare the taxpayer only with representative corporations whose invested capital can be satisfactorily determined under section 326 and which are, as nearly as may be, similarly circumstanced with respect to gross income, net income, profits per unit of business transacted, and capital employed, the amount and rate of to war profits or excess profits, and all other relevant facts and circumstances.

In other words, if the commissioner is unable to apply a rule which, for indefiniteness, is almost without parallel, then he shall have resort to this other rule, which says that the rate of taxation shall be the average paid by a lot of other corporations which he, in his discretion, must pick out to be representative comparative instances. Did anyone ever hear of a tax based upon the accumulation of so many uncertainties as in this case? Is it any wonder that the business men of America said that that would work havoc to every industry in the United States if it were continued longer on the statute books?

Imagine a coal company trying to calculate in its return what its tax should be. How could it know in advance, how could it provide against the possible decision of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue on so many items that were completely uncertain?

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, first, the taxpayer in making his return does not have to make it based on any such language as that.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I quite understand that.

Mr. COUZENS. But the impression goes out that the taxpayer, if he makes his return, has to reach all of the conclusions the Senator read in the law just now. He has nothing to do with that. He makes his return, and then afterwards——

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. How does he state his invested capital?

Mr. COUZENS. He states it, I assume, on the basis of his books, and then after making his return he may appeal to the commissioner to assess him under the special section of the law in which all these difficulties arise.

Mr. SACKETT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. SACKETT. If he does make an appeal to the commissioner, then does he not have to stand on that appeal and give up his return entirely, and take whatever comes out of the comparison with those other corporations? It has been so ruled, as I understand it. If he does appeal, he has nothing to go on but that law.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That is true.

Mr. SACKETT. The commissioner may choose anyone. There may be 50 corporations to compare with, and he may choose any three or four, and make comparison with those.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Absolutely.

Mr. COUZENS. I would like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if he construes the law as giving the commissioner the right to select one corporation?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I have never considered that legal question, but I do know that the legal department of the Bureau of Internal Revenue has held that it does give him the right to select one comparative and does not force him to take the average of two or more. Whether that is sound or unsound I do not know.

Mr. GLASS. But we do know that the word "corporations" means more than one corporation. It is the plural.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. And we do know that the plural is more than the singular.

Mr. GLASS. And that a comparison with one corporation is not a comparison with more than the singular.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. We also may know that if there is only one corporation that fills the definition of the act of 1919, then the commissioner can not select two comparatives, but in order to comply with the act has to take one.

Mr. GLASS. But it does not happen, in the case we have been discussing, that there was only one. There were a great many.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. In the Reynolds Tobacco case, I believe, there were several that might have been taken. If they had been taken, the tax would have been less than that finally settled, and the refund would have been greater.

Mr. GLASS. Suppose it had been? If it ought to have been so, that is all right. The fact that the tax refund would have been greater makes it that much more desirable that the commissioner should have adhered to the law. If the taxpayer was entitled to a greater refund, he ought to have had it.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Of course, I agree with the Senator in that statement; but the commissioner is not a lawyer. He has his legal department, and he submits the question to his legal department and is told that this is in obedience to law.

Mr. GLASS. I would not employ a lawyer who would tell me that "corporations" means a corporation.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I do not know all the grounds that led him to that conclusion. Perhaps the question was not as simple as that when it was presented to him.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] suggests that I would never need to employ a lawyer anyhow. I accept the compliment.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. What I am trying to argue is that most of the cases which have aroused great interest here and which would seem to present cases of marked hardship are cases that arise, like the Tobacco case, from the old excess-profits tax law which has been repealed. It is a shocking thing that 1919 taxes should only now in 1929 begin to be definitely ascertained. Any taxpayer, whether he gets more tax to pay or a refund coming to him, has just complaint against such a system. We ought to get them cleaned up as fast as we can.

But what I want to call to the attention of the Senate is this—and I am sorry the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] is not here so that I might now answer the question which I wanted to answer when he asked it this morning. The law does need simplification when it presents such paradoxes as this. The law needs simplification terribly when 1917 taxes can not be adjudicated until 1929. But we have already gone far on the path toward simplification.

We have improved the law very markedly in the four tax acts of 1921, 1924, 1926, and 1928, since that terrible excess profits tax law was adopted. Each of those four acts has simplified the law. We have tried to correct the greatest injustices by retroactive provisions, and by so doing we have let the Treasury Department in for refunds which are included in the total that is criticized here. That is our fault—our fault for enacting the law vaguely to begin with, and our fault for correcting it retroactively and thereby forcing refunds. We can not blame that on either the taxpayer or the tax gatherer. It is our fault.

So, Mr. President, the so-called scandal of the refunds is well on the way to disappearing. As the tax law becomes simpler, men will know more accurately what their tax liability is. Refunds and overassessments will cease to be the things of importance that they have been under a law which was as vague as the one under discussion.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, as bearing in part on the question involved here, and that is the secrecy of doing public business, I would like to ask a question. Before I ask the question I would like to say that it does not conclusively follow, of course, because we are doing public business behind closed doors, that there is any fraud in it; but, as I have tried to point out, a continuance of doing public business in secret will always lead toward fraud and debauchery, as it always has. It is the natural tendency. No one has tried to cast any reflection upon any official in this matter and nobody has claimed that any of the refunds ought not to have been made. No one can tell. The objection is that there is no way to find out how it was done and why it was done.

Now I want to ask a question of any Member of the Senate who was a member of the so-called Couzens committee making the investigation of the Bureau of Internal Revenue two or three years ago. It seems to me I remember that something of this kind occurred or was discovered, and it is only an incident as tending to show what the secret method of doing business will lead to. I see the chairman of the committee [Mr. COUZENS] honoring me with his presence, so I particularly want to ask him the question, Is it true that in the cases investigated by that committee instances were found where notations were made by somebody on the papers to the effect that the case was one in which Mr. Mellon was interested? Were there any such disclosures?

Mr. COUZENS. The testimony was taken some years ago, but, as I recall it, we came across one case in which there was a blue pencil memorandum, "This is a Mellon company," or something of the sort. I have forgotten the exact language, but it was something to that effect. It is in the record, but I do not have the record here. It was brought out in the early days of the investigation.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. There was nothing to indicate that Mr. Mellon had directed it to be done?

Mr. COUZENS. Oh, no; not at all; nothing of the kind.

Mr. NORRIS. I would not think of that, but that is what I want to speak about right now.

Mr. COUZENS. Notwithstanding that only one case was brought out that I recall, and no evidence whatsoever that Mr. Mellon requested it under any circumstances, I am informed by men who have worked in the bureau that it was the custom to advise the engineers and experts that "Mr. Mellon is interested in this particular company." That is all it amounted to. The memorandum would go through the department giving notice to the staff that Mr. Mellon was interested in a particular company. I do not say that it necessarily meant he was interested financially, but merely that he was interested in it.

Mr. NORRIS. That bears out my conception of the evil. Without making any charge against Mr. Mellon, whether he is instrumental in it or whether he is not, and assuming that he knows nothing about it, he is Secretary of the Treasury and has hundreds of people under him in all the various bureaus who are anxious to curry his favor. It would be so if anyone else were there in his place. It is not because it is Mr. Mellon, but it is one of the evils of secret government. The people working under him in the bureau or in his department would want to be in his favor and they would want to give him the best of any dispute that might arise under the law. It seems to me that very fact alone is a practical demonstration of the evils of this secret method of handling hundreds of millions, yes, billions of dollars belonging to the people or at least wrung from the people by taxation.

We can not escape it. It is only another demonstration of human nature and of something that is perfectly natural. There will be hundreds of people in the various bureaus and departments and boards under the head of any great institution of that kind who, if the business is done in secret, will take the opportunity to help men who are above them. Not all of them would do it. I am not making the charge of wholesale wrongdoing against anybody. I am only speaking of what every man must know in his own mind and in his own heart is perfectly natural in any business administered or carried on by human beings. It is one of the evils of secret government. It is one of the things that leads inevitably to corruption even when the beneficiaries themselves have no knowledge of it. It seems to me that we ought not to overlook any opportunity to have the business of the people transacted in the open before the entire world.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, before the Senator from Nebraska takes his seat may I say that I have been very much interested in the discussion participated in by those who are members of the Appropriations Committee. Just what are the arguments and what are the reasons that led to the establishment of this secret performance in reference to the settling of tax claims? There must have been some very weighty reason that I have not heard of at any time.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has heard the debate that has occurred whenever a revenue bill has been brought before the Senate and we have discussed the publicity of income-tax returns.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; I understand that the law requires secrecy, but I never have been fully satisfied of the necessity for a law requiring it unless there has been some reason for it that has escaped my notice. It must have been a very weighty reason to cause us to say that we must in secret, as has been developed here, settle so important a thing as the revenue of the Government from this very prolific source. I would like to know if there are any compelling reasons why the secrecy should be still further maintained. It is incorporated in the law. Is it likely to do injustice to some one by exposing his financial standing or his business in such a way as to lead to some misfortune to him?

Mr. GLASS. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] has been making that argument for the last three-quarters of an hour.

Mr. SMITH. I happened not to be able to be in the Chamber. I wish I had been here. I do not know whether there may have been some very potent reason that could have influenced us to incorporate in the law a condition that brings about results that would be more disastrous, it seems to me, to the income of the Government and to the morals of the people than to have the whole thing in the open. Unless there is some reason against it that is insurmountable, I shall vote for an open investigation, because I do not believe that it is advisable where such enormous sums are involved to depend upon those who can not be brought to book for the settlement of the cases. I do not think we have any right to delegate to any body of men the right to settle claims involving such tremendous amounts unless the public may be thoroughly advised as to the method, the amount, and the conditions surrounding the settlement.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I trust that the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee, as modified, will be agreed to. If it shall be, we can end this controversy, I think, now; but if it shall not be, I think we ought to have a quorum and continue to discuss the amendment until to-morrow, if necessary, so that Senators may be sufficiently informed about this question to vote on it intelligently. A number of the Senators have not heard any of the discussion, though the question involved is one of great importance to the whole people of this Nation.

I do not see how any Senator can contend for a moment that proceedings affecting tax refunds should be in secret. They ought to be open, so that the people may know to whom the refunds are being made and the amounts that are being refunded.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to modify my amendment by adding, on page 16 of the bill——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee mean to withdraw his motion to suspend the rules?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am asking unanimous consent that I may substitute for the amendment as proposed by me the following: After the word "each," in line 15, on page 16, I move to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That no part of the funds herein appropriated for tax refunds where the claim is in excess of $10,000 shall be paid out except upon hearings before any committee or officer in the department conducting the same, which hearings shall be open to the public, and the decision shall be a public document.

As I understand, there will be no exception to the amendment as I have now modified it.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if he will not fix the amount at $25,000 instead of $10,000?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have conferred with several Senators on the same side that I am, and they thought it unwise to change the amount. I hope the Senator will permit the figures to remain as I have proposed them.

Mr. WARREN. I think the Senator from Tennessee knows the difficulty with which we will be confronted in conference.

Mr. McKELLAR. For that reason I believe it would be better to leave the figures as they are at $10,000.

Mr. HEFLIN. I think they ought to be left at $10,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee as modified.

Mr. COUZENS. Will the Senator from Tennessee accept the suggestion that the amendment be further modified so as to exclude rebates and refunds made on the basis of court decisions?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator that the refunds of judgments of courts are paid in a different way. They are not paid through the Internal Revenue Bureau at all, but are paid by appropriations recommended by the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. COUZENS. Oh, yes; but the Senator did not understand my point.

Mr. McKELLAR. Perhaps not.

Mr. COUZENS. The point is that when a court construes a statute in its application to an income-tax case that construction is extended to other taxpayers regardless of whether they have themselves appeared before the court. So such refunds would come under this head.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me the interruption, even the judgments of courts are paid out of this same title in the appropriation bill.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I think perhaps if we adopted this amendment and sent it to conference that the conferees might agree to a provision to take care of cases arising under court decisions. I think that would be the easiest way out.

Mr. COUZENS. I have no objection to that, but my experience has been that when the conferees are not in sympathy with a decision of the Senate they do not put up much of a fight to maintain the Senate amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am sure the conferees will do so upon an amendment like this.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee? The Chair hears none, and the question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee as modified.

Without objection, the motion to suspend the rules is withdrawn and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have one further amendment which I desire to call to the attention of the chairman of the committee. Several days ago I gave notice of an amendment. I ask to modify that amendment by submitting the one to which I call the attention of the chairman of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 17, after line 15, it is proposed to insert:

OFFICE OF THE TREASURER OF THE UNITED STATES

The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay to H. Theodore Tate salary as Treasurer of the United States at the rate of $8,000 per annum from June 1, 1928, to January 17, 1929, both dates inclusive, from appropriations heretofore provided for salaries of the office of the Treasurer of the United States, fiscal years 1928 and 1929, the provisions of section 1761 of the Revised Statutes to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. WARREN. That amendment provides for paying the officer referred to the amount provided by the statute?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; it authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the amount. The amendment in its present form is different from the one which I first offered and is in lieu of it.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator is advised that no portion of the amount has been paid?

Mr. McKELLAR. None has been paid; and the amendment was prepared by the department.

Mr. WARREN. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in fairness to Assistant Secretary Bond I think I should put in the RECORD a letter I have just received from him in regard to jeopardy assessments. He has sent a letter here giving them by years. The total amount is $665,000,000, in round figures. I ask that his letter may be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 23, 1929.

Hon. KENNETH MCKELLAR,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In accordance with your telephoned request I have secured the following data giving the total amount of so-called jeopardy assessments for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1923, to June 30, 1928:

Fiscal year:
1923	$132, 525, 380. 55
1924	161, 515, 217. 33
1925	144, 646, 530. 53
1926	148, 867, 165. 26
1927	32, 704, 156. 33
1928	45, 685, 725. 80
Total	665, 944, 175. 80

Trusting that these are the figures that you desired, and that if I can be of any further service to you you will call upon me, I am

Respectfully yours,

HENRY HERRICK BOND,
Assistant Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

S. 1156. An act granting a pension to Lois I. Marshall;

S. J. Res. 59. Joint resolution authorizing the President to ascertain, adjust, and pay certain claims of grain elevators and grain firms to cover insurance and interest on wheat during the years 1919 and 1920, as per a certain contract authorized by the President;

S. J. Res. 180. Joint resolution authorizing the granting of permits to the Committee on Inaugural Ceremonies on the occasion of the inauguration of the President elect in March, 1929, and for other purposes.

COMPACT BETWEEN NEW MEXICO AND OKLAHOMA

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation several small bills. First, from that committee I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 6496) granting the consent of Congress to compacts or agreements between the States of New Mexico and Oklahoma with respect to the division and apportionment of the waters of the Cimarron River and all other streams in which such States are jointly interested, and I submit a report (No. 1494) thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] to the bill. It merely authorizes the States of New Mexico and Oklahoma to enter into a compact for a division of the waters of the streams in those States.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill just reported by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I inquire of the Senator if the consideration of the bill will involve any debate?

Mr. PHIPPS. I do not think it will. It is a House bill, and there is no objection to it, so far as I know.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby given to the States of New Mexico and Oklahoma to negotiate and enter into compacts or agreements providing for an equitable division and apportionment between such States of the water supply of the Cimarron River and of the streams tributary thereto and of all other streams in which such States are jointly interested.

SEC. 2. Such consent is given upon condition that a representative of the United States from the Department of the Interior, to be appointed by the President, shall participate in the negotiations and shall make report to Congress of the proceedings and of any compact or agreement entered into. Other than the compensation and expenses of such representative the United States shall not be liable for any expenses in connection with such negotiations, compact, or agreement. The payment of such expenses of such representative are authorized to be paid from the appropriations for cooperative and general investigations for the Bureau of Reclamation.

SEC. 3. No such compact or agreement shall be binding or obligatory upon either of such States unless and until it has been approved by the legislature of each of such States and by the Congress of the United States.

SEC. 4. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMPACT BETWEEN NEW MEXICO AND OKLAHOMA AND TEXAS

Mr. PHIPPS. From the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 6497) granting the consent of Congress to compacts or agreements between the States of New Mexico, Oklahoma, and Texas with respect to the division and apportionment of the waters of the Rio Grande, Pecos, and Canadian or Red Rivers, and all other streams in which such States are jointly interested, and I submit a report (No. 1495) thereon.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby given to the States of New Mexico, Oklahoma, and Texas to negotiate and enter into compacts or agreements providing for an equitable division and apportionment between such States of the water supply of the Rio Grande, Pecos, and Canadian or Red Rivers, and of the streams tributary thereto, and of all other streams in which such States are jointly interested.

SEC. 3. No such compact or agreement shall be binding or obligatory upon either of such States unless and until it has been approved by the legislature of each of such States and by the Congress of the United States.

SEC. 4. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is herewith expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMPACT BETWEEN NEW MEXICO AND ARIZONA

Mr. PHIPPS. From the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 6499) granting the consent of Congress to compacts or agreements between the States of New Mexico and Arizona with respect to the division and apportionment of the waters of the Gila and San Francisco Rivers and all other streams in which such States are jointly interested, and I submit a report (No. 1496) thereon.

Mr. BRATTON. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill just reported by the Senator from Colorado.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby given to the States of New Mexico and Arizona to negotiate and enter into compacts or agreements providing for an equitable division and apportionment between such States of the water supply of the Gila and San Francisco Rivers and of the streams tributary thereto and of all other streams in which such States are jointly interested.

SEC. 4. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COMPACT BETWEEN COLORADO AND NEW MEXICO

Mr. PHIPPS. From the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 7024) granting the consent of Congress to compacts or agreements between the States of Colorado and New Mexico with respect to the division and apportionment of the waters of the Rio Grande, San Juan, and Las Animas Rivers, and all other streams in which such States are jointly interested, and I submit a report (No. 1497) thereon.

Mr. BRATTON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of that bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, what do these bills provide?

Mr. PHIPPS. The bills which I have reported, and which are now being considered, authorize certain States to enter into agreements for the division of the waters of the streams which flow through them. Commissioners are to be appointed by the States and a representative of the Federal Government is to act in conjunction with them.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Is there any provision that the agreement entered into shall be referred to Congress?

Mr. PHIPPS. Such agreements as may be entered into must come back to Congress for approval.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to the consideration of the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby given to the States of Colorado and New Mexico to negotiate and enter into compacts or agreements providing for an equitable division and apportionment between such States of the water supply of the Rio Grande, San Juan, and Las Animas Rivers and of the streams tributary thereto and of all other streams in which such States are jointly interested.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, January 23, 1929

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou Eternal One, from whom all blessings flow, Thou art still blessing us, though we can not comprehend just why. These days quiver with duty, which is our watchword. It comes to us in silence, when we are alone, where the crowd is not seen nor heard. Again it is with us when we are in the surging multitudes. O Thou, who are mighty in word and in deed, teach us the right thing to do and the right way to go. Our Blessed Heavenly Father, may our performance of duty be the outstanding quality that shall command respect throughout our beloved land. We pause at the mercy seat a moment. God be with the sorrow-stricken colleague. The sweet, calm, supplicating voice is still; the door is shut. Help us to believe that there never was a cloud so black but it carries with it, somewhere, a brightness, hidden only because we are not on the other side. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 15472. An act to authorize the Secretary of War to lend War Department equipment for use at the Eleventh National Convention of the American Legion.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to amendments of the House to a bill and joint resolutions of the following titles:

S. 1156. An act granting a pension to Lois I. Marshall.

S. J. Res. 59. A joint resolution authorizing the President to ascertain, adjust, and pay certain claims of grain elevators and grain firms to cover insurance and interest on wheat during the years 1919 and 1920, as per a certain contract authorized by the President.

S. J. Res. 142. Joint resolution authorizing the erection of a Federal reserve bank building in the city of Los Angeles, Calif.

BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee did on this day present to the President, for his approval, bills of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 1320. An act for the relief of James W. Pringle.

H. R. 4920. An act authorizing the Secretary of War to award a Nicaraguan campaign badge to Capt. James P. Williams in recognition of his services to the United States in the Nicaraguan campaign of 1912 and 1913.

H. R. 15569. An act making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes.

INAUGURAL CEREMONIES

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I did not happen to be on the floor yesterday when the resolution relative to the inaugural proceedings was passed. I notice the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] made an inquiry relative to the parade. I want to say to the House that the Committee on the Inaugural Ceremonies of the Senate and House have made a definite request to have the parade pass across the plaza in front of the Capitol, and we have been assured by Colonel Grant and the gentlemen in command that such will be the case; that the parade will pass across the plaza.

In answer to several requests for information in regard to tickets, I will say that it is expected that we will build a grand stand out here of practically the same size as that of four years ago, to hold in the neighborhood of 8,000 people. After such distribution of tickets has been made to foreign embassies and representatives of other bodies as is customary on such occasions there will be about seven tickets for each Member, and in addition to that each House Member will have a ticket for himself, which will admit him to the Senate floor, and one ticket that will admit one guest to the Senate gallery. This ticket for the Member is rendered necessary for this reason: Four years ago, as gentlemen will remember, the Members of the House passed over to the Senate, and there was no place for them in the Senate, a great many people being on the Senate floor who had no right to be there. Each person here who is entitled to the privilege of the floor in the Senate at that time will be furnished with a distinctive ticket for that purpose. After the ceremonies in the Senate all the people on the Senate floor and in the Senate galleries will march out together to the central platform on the east side of the Capitol. Each Member of the House, as noted before, is provided with one ticket to the Senate galleries.

Down town, in what is known as the court of honor, on Lafayette Square, opposite the reviewing stand, there will be in the vicinity of 3,000 tickets reserved primarily for Members of the Senate and the House, and Members will have the first opportunity of buying those tickets up to three or four days prior to the inauguration.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. What will be the price?

Mr. SNELL. I do not know yet what the price will be.

I have here the program that was followed four years ago in connection with the ceremonies in the Senate. I do not know but that it would be proper to insert this program in the RECORD for the information of Members of the House. I do not know whether it will be absolutely followed. It is a tentative program.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, let me suggest to the gentleman that although it is likely that that will be the program, yet it might be confusing if changes should be made later. We will have the real program before long, and then that can be put in the RECORD. Otherwise it might prove confusing. However, I have no objection.

Mr. SNELL. I am not sure, of course, that it will be followed absolutely, and perhaps it would be just as well to put in that program a little later.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. My experience has been that there is very little variation in the program from time to time, but some new conditions may arise to cause some slight change.

Mr. SNELL. So far as we know at this time, that will be the program for the 4th of March.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I just though it might be confusing.

Mr. SNELL. Then we will leave that out of the RECORD for the present.

Mr. POU. My information is that a great many inquiries have been made in regard to getting tickets for the inaugural stand out here. I understand there will be a record-breaking crowd in the city. Can the gentleman from New York give us an idea of how many tickets each Member will receive?

Mr. SNELL. About seven tickets. That will apply also to retiring Members, and each new coming Member elect will have two tickets.

Mr. POU. And in addition to the seven tickets for the Capitol stands the Members will have the preferential right to purchase tickets on the downtown stands?

Mr. SNELL. Yes; in the court of honor.

Mr. TILSON. The retiring Members will have the same number of tickets for the platform in front of the Capitol as the others, and the new Members elect, who are here for the first time, will have only two?

Mr. SNELL. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. TILSON. All Members of the House will march over to the Senate Chamber?

Mr. SNELL. Yes. They will march over, and each Member will have his ticket with him at that time. When the tickets are ready they will be distributed by the Sergeant at Arms of the House, and each Member will be called on to sign personally for those tickets.

APPOINTMENT OF MASTER SERGT. AUGUST J. MACK AS A WARRANT OFFICER, UNITED STATES ARMY

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Military Affairs, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table H. R. 10472, to authorize the appointment of Master Sergt. August J. Mack as a warrant officer, United States Army, concur in the Senate amendment, and pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. By authorization of the Committee on Military Affairs, the gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House bill 10472, with a Senate amendment, and concur in the same. The Clerk will report the bill and the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill and the Senate amendment.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman whether this is the unanimous request of the committee?

Mr. MORIN. Yes; I so stated in my request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

REREFERENCE OF A BILL

Mr. MORIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to refer the bill H. R. 16036, to authorize the cession to the city of New York of land on the northerly side of New Dorp Lane in exchange for permission to connect Miller Field with the said city's public sewer system, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to rerefer House bill 16036 from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to the Committee on Military Affairs. Is there objection?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, that is the bill, as I understand it, which refers to land that is under the jurisdiction of the War Department and over which the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds has no jurisdiction?

Mr. MORIN. Yes; it is land in New York.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is that the New York bill?

Mr. MORIN. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. It is land in a military reservation?

Mr. MORIN. Yes.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the rereference will be made.

There was no objection.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 16422) making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes. Pending that I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate to-day be controlled equally by myself and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASEY].

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the agreement made yesterday with reference to general debate would hold to-day.

Mr. TILSON. But the gentleman asks that the control of the time be transferred to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASEY], the time yesterday being controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of H. R. 16422, and pending that asks unanimous consent that general debate to-day be controlled one-half by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASEY]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Nebraska.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16422, with Mr. HOOPER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COLE].

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I am asking this time merely for the purpose of presenting a letter which I received setting forth a proposition for a White House in the country. It comes from a reputable man and I think it is worthy of consideration.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Has the gentleman conferred with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] with reference to this request?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. No; I have not, but I am sure the gentleman from Massachusetts would not think of offering an objection to this letter.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Well, he thinks of offering objections to requests of this sort.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. It is a short letter.

Mr. BANKHEAD. He has prevented a number of requests made on this side from being granted by his objections.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired. Does the Chair understand that the gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by inserting the letter referred to?

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to follows:

HOLLY STOVER (INC.),
Washington, D. C., December 17, 1928.

Hon. CYRENUS COLE,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: President Coolidge recently set forth many good reasons for the establishment of a permanent summer White House in the vicinity of Washington, and, in view of the general public interest in the proposal, this appears to be an appropriate time to call attention to an excellent site for the location of such an establishment.

Several prospective places have been mentioned, each of which has some of the qualifications that are necessary, but there is no more ideal spot in the world for such a home than at the summit of Cave Hill, at Grottoes, Va. Situated in the southern part of the Shenandoah Valley, Cave Hill commands a superb outlook on the surrounding valley that is bounded on the east by the beautiful Blue Ridge and on the west by the towering Alleghenies. At the foot of Cave Hill the Shenandoah River winds its way on toward the Potomac and offers the opportunity for boating, bathing, and fishing—forms of entertainment not to be found at many country locations. Cave Hill is close to the southern entrance to the Shenandoah National Park and, if located there, our future Presidents and their families would have easy access to the trails and highways in that national reserve.

The high altitude at Cave Hill assures comfort all through the summer months and the thin mountain air is pure and invigorating. Here will be found an abundance of fine mineral and lithia springs and just a short distance away are located some of the most famous of the Virginia springs.

In addition to its other attractions, the geographical location of Cave Hill commends it for such a purpose. It is just close enough to Washington, Charlottesville, Roanoke, and Staunton to make easy the transaction of necessary business, and yet it is far enough from these centers of population to assure the necessary seclusion. Here our Presidents' home would be hidden away from the idle curious, and they would be as free and happy as if they were on their own private domain. Three splendid highways from Washington lead directly to Cave Hill, and, by motor, only five or six hours are required for the trip. A station of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railway is close by and the journey from Washington on the Cincinnati express is but a short afternoon trip.

Cave Hill is a part of the acreage that belongs to Grand Caverns and it affords me pleasure to offer to the Government, free of charge, all the land that would be required for the establishment of the summer White House. Investigation will reveal the truth of the statements I have made here, and I am certain that the location will be found particularly desirable in all ways.

It will be greatly appreciated and esteemed a personal favor if you will convey our offer to the committee, or officials who will attend to the matter.

Sincerely yours,

HOLLY STOVER.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself one hour.

Last year in my discussion of this bill I went at length into the subject of fiscal relations between the United States and the District of Columbia. It does not seem necessary to take the time of the House for such a detailed statement at this time. I will, however, discuss briefly the Bureau of Efficiency report on fiscal relations and briefly outline the situation as it is affected by this bill.

On January 11, 1929, I presented to the House the report of the Bureau of Efficiency on fiscal relations between the United States and the District of Columbia. This report was made at the request of the late Martin B. Madden, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. The Bureau of Efficiency had but one instruction, to report facts to the Congress. Mr. Madden believed that the Congress knew the facts, believed that the United States was dealing not only justly but liberally with the District of Columbia. He welcomed any fact not known, believing that the Congress in the possession of the facts would fairly decide this issue. Various studies have heretofore been made by Members of this House, none of which were acceptable to those citizens of Washington who in season and out constantly demand more and more from the Federal Treasury. The report from the bureau was asked for in the hope that, as an independent study, it might bring this constant complaint against the Congress to an end. The report has been made. The report accepts as its basis the premises heretofore outlined by District citizens as the proper ones on which to reach a decision—and from that basis the report in its determination of facts fully supports the position heretofore taken and maintained by the House of Representatives.

The report determines first that the liability of the Federal Government, were it a taxpayer, would in the fiscal year 1928 have been $7,440,939. It then states that after deducting this "tax liability" from the "$9,000,000 lump-sum contribution $1,559,061 was left to be applied against" the Federal Government's "liability on account of the loss of revenue and on account of extraordinary expenditures occasioned by the fact that Washington is the National Capital." In that statement the report grants to the District everything that the most enthusiastic opponents of the $9,000,000 lump-sum plan have demanded. It gives no credit to the Government of the United States for the use of buildings and land owned by the United States, a normal rental of which would be $150,000—see hearings, pages 44, 45, 46. It gives no credit to the United States for property given to the District last year amounting to $27,356.84—see hearings, page 48. It gives no credit to the United States for the services of 10 Army officers in municipal capacities at salaries amounting to $42,137—see hearings, page 46. It gives no credit to the United States for the services rendered to the District by such Federal agencies as the Bureau of the Budget, the Bureau of Efficiency, the Bureau of Standards, the Bureau of Public Roads, and the many services in one capacity and another rendered the District by the Federal Government that are too numerous to detail and impossible to estimate—all, however, being services not rendered to any other American city by the United States and services given to the municipal government without charge.

Last, but by no means least, the report does not even suggest that the United States should be given either credit or consideration for the maintenance here of the largest business in the world—the Government of the United States—the maintenance of an army of employees here at an ever-increasing pay roll of approximately $140,000,000 a year that is not affected either by flood or drought, or by famine or overproduction. Business depression does not reach it. Washington, due to the location here of the seat of government, is the only city in America that is assured of a permanent and growing prosperity. The business of the Government brings multiplied thousands to this city, spending millions in Washington annually; the tourist and those who come here to see their Government in action or to worship at her shrines bring other millions to the tills of Washington's business houses; still other thousands come to make this their home, drawn by the advantages, social, official, and educational, that the Government provides, all contributing vast amounts to the prosperity, the business, and the growth of Washington.

The report suggests no credit to the United States for the multiplied millions spent here in buildings, grounds, and shrines or those that hereafter will be spent. Likewise, the report suggests that the United States be charged with "taxes" on its property here—every dollar of it—completely ignoring the fact that no city in America save Washington has the temerity to ask that the Government of the United States contribute to its revenues in lieu of taxes. Every large city of America has valuable Government-owned properties in their midst from which no city revenue is derived. The Government even refuses to pave the streets in front of its own property in every city of America save Washington, and yet this report does not even suggest that the United States should have a deduction or "exemption" equivalent to that which it receives in other cities. Every dollar of Federal property in the District used for Federal purposes is to be "taxed" here in the Nation's Capital—entirely ignoring the exemptions that the Federal Government rightly enjoys in every city of America.

The report gives no credit to the United States for the great increase to the value of private property given by such Federal improvements as the new bridge across the Potomac, adding at least $15,000,000 to the taxable values of the District, the bridge itself a benefit for which the District makes no payment but receives all the advantages. Other illustrations without number may be used.

The report holds that we should pay in excess of a tax comparable to other property holders. It then suggests another and an indefinite obligation to pay other moneys to the District but it gives no credit to your Government and mine for the benefit that this city receives from the Federal Government that no other city receives.

The report refers to a "liability on account of the loss of revenue" occasioned by the fact that Washington is the National Capital, and likewise refers to "extraordinary expenditures" occasioned by the same fact.

What revenues have been lost by the fact that Washington is the seat of government? None can be established. There are those who imagine that were this not the Nation's Capital that factories and other activities would come. Possibly so—but at best a rather unsatisfactory basis upon which to predicate a charge of "loss of revenue." Certainly to be set off against that are the definitely easily established millions of dollars that are drawn here by the "fact that Washington is the National Capital," that would not come here for any other reason. My own opinion is that the actual "loss of revenue" to Washington were this not the National Capital would be far greater than any imaginary "loss of revenue" caused by the fact that it is the Capital.

The charge that there is a "loss of revenue" here "by the fact that Washington is the National Capital" and that therefore there is a "liability" on the part of the United States to contribute to the District on account of that "loss." The loss, of course, can not be proven. The inference from the statement is that Washington, were it not the Capital, would be permitted a greater control of its own destinies; that industries would come, and so forth. The charge is that Washington, in comparison with other cities, is retarded in its growth, handicapped by the presence here of the Nation's Capital.

What are the facts? In 1906 Washington was the fifteenth city of the country on a population basis, with a population of 307,716. In 1911 Washington was the seventeenth city, with a population of 337,476. In 1916 Washington was the seventeenth city of the Nation, with a population of 361,329. In 1921 Washington was the fourteenth city of the Nation, with a population of 448,541. In 1926 Washington was the thirteenth city of the Nation, with a population of 525,000.

So it is clear that Washington is not only not being retarded by the presence here of the Nation's Capital but the city is rapidly gaining in population and is going ahead of "industrial" cities because of the fact that "Washington is the National Capital."

Considering the admitted fact of Washington's very rapid development in population and gain over other cities, may I refer to the statement of Mr. William P. Richards, assessor for the District, appearing on page 560 and following, from which I quote to show that Washington has had no "loss of revenues," and that there is no merit in that claim:

> The growth of real-estate values in any city will depend in great measure on the growth of its population. Many are led to think that moneys in bank, stocks, goods, and mortgages express the wealth of a community, but these are forms of wealth depending primarily on the use of land. In fact, the United States census in estimating the wealth of the country includes only real estate and tangible personal property. That is, the census listed physical properties and ignored evidences of debt or intangible values. For example, if real estate worth $10,000 has a mortgage of $5,000 attached to it, there can be no true measure of value in the sum of the two figures. Real estate is not only the foundation of our true wealth but the real-estate value of any city gives us an exact measure of its relative importance. We know that our large cities are our wealthy cities and that our small ones need hardly be mentioned as having wealth, yet when the real-estate value of a large city is divided by its population giving a per capita value we find that the small city will be in close accord in its per capita value.
> Therefore wealth as applied to real estate increases in all cities just as the population increases—that is, all cities that grow increase proportionately in value—and it is not surprising that the District of Columbia has increased in population and wealth at the same rate as shown by the growth of the United States.
> Washington and the District of Columbia have, therefore, from all indications a future in growth of wealth that seems to be assured and steady. We have no bonded debt to consume in interest a part of our taxes. We have a pay roll from the Government that is steady and certain from month to month and year to year. Depression in business is not felt within the District in the same manner as it is in other cities, and the program of national improvements, which is bound in some near future to be carried out, will be still more material gain to our District wealth.
> We are able to draw the following conclusions with respect to the changes of real-estate values, both here and elsewhere: That the real-estate values of a city will increase in direct proportion with its increase in population.
> That purchases of parks and playgrounds; the building of monumental public buildings; the improvement of public highways; model provisions for education and for protection to life and property; all when accomplished within certain bounds, will increase the wealth of a city and thereby attract population. But in the end the per capita wealth will have been changed very little.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. KNUTSON. Who pays for the maintenance of our parks in Washington?

Mr. SIMMONS. Outside of the reservations around Federal buildings, they are carried in the District bill.

What are the "extraordinary expenditures occasioned by the fact that Washington is the National Capital"? In the hearings and report a year ago and in the subsequent discussions on the District bill, we took up and examined the claims of "extraordinary expenditures" advanced by the board of trade, chamber of commerce, and others, and one by one they were examined and one by one they were abandoned by their proponents.

These observations have been made not so much with the thought of "finding fault" with the bureau report as they have been made with the idea of demonstrating that the report, to say the least, is not unfriendly to the District and most certainly is not biased in favor of the United States.

It is not my purpose here to go into a detailed analysis of the tables in the report. They are printed and available as House Document No. 506. Two conclusions are readily drawn from the report:

First. That the United States is not only fully meeting and paying every obligation that could possibly come to it were it a taxpayer, but, in addition, is contributing over and above all that a considerable and generous sum and more than meeting its obligations toward the Capital City.

Second. That the city of Washington is not only not overtaxed, but, in fact, is undertaxed in comparison with other cities. That the low taxes here have not resulted in an undernourished city, but that, on the contrary, Washington, when compared with other cities, is developing in all its city activities without undue curtailment of funds.

The position of the House on fiscal relations and the contribution made by the United States to the District of Columbia is fully supported by this report. I commend a study of the report to those Members of the House who are interested in the details of city expenditures, and revenues generally, as well as in the Capital City.

It is interesting to note that the United States, on the basis of being a "taxpayer," has put 22.2 per cent of the "taxable" real property of the District, upon which the Bureau of Efficiency figure a "tax" of $5,452,767. Then the bureau arrives at a "tax" of $1,536,315 upon tangible personal property for the year 1928. It should be noted that the total collections for the District on tangible personal property in 1928 amounts to but $1,470,203. These figures charge the United States with 51 per cent of the taxable tangible personal property of the District. Clearly one of two things follow. Either the figure for the United States is excessive, or else the owner of tangible personal property in the District is escaping the payment of taxes on that class of property. Whichever conclusion is reached, it leaves the District taxpayer in an advantageous position as compared with the United States.

The Bureau of Efficiency then, by a purely arbitrary method with which I do not now quarrel, charges the United States with an intangible personal property tax of $451,857. The justice of "charging" the United States with an intangible personal "tax" is subject to serious question. But without discussing that, may I point out that in 1928 the District collected on intangible personal property $2,378,569.28, as against the $451,857 which the Bureau of Efficiency here charge to the United States. The Federal "intangible tax" is then 16 per cent of the whole.

We have then this table of percentages available on which to judge the fairness of the "tax charge" against the United States:

> Real property tax payable by United States, 22.2 per cent of the total.
> Personal tangible property tax payable by the United States, 51 per cent of the whole.
> Personal intangible property tax payable by the United States, 16 per cent of the whole.

I suggest that in view of the fact that the 22.2 per cent real property is based upon the District assessor's figures, that the same percentage could rightly be applied to tangible and intangible personal property in lieu of the method used which obviously reaches a result unfair to the Federal Government when compared with the comparative amount paid by the District taxpayer on personal tangible property. We would then have a charge or "tax" of—

Real property	$5,452,767
Tangible personalty	419,518
Intangible personalty	678,718
Total	6,551,003

I suggest that a total "tax liability" of $6,551,003 is far nearer correct than is the $7,440,939 proposed by the Bureau of Efficiency. This figure is somewhat larger than I arrived at last year due to the inclusion in part of intangible property. But either figure shows that.

Whichever of the three tables are accepted, the present contribution of the United States is shown to be not only fair but very generous to the people of the District.

The report discloses that in 1915 the Federal property, including park property, constituted 36.8 per cent of the whole. In 1928 it was but 28.3 per cent of the whole, or when park property is excluded in 1915 the Federal property was 28.2 per cent of the whole and in 1928 but 22.2 per cent of the whole.

Demand is made by District taxpayers that Congress return to a percentage basis of contribution instead of the lump sum now carried and that the percentage paid by the United States be 40 or 50 per cent of the total. These figures disclose the reason for the demand and also why, in fairness to the United States, neither of these requests can be granted.

If the ratio between privately owned and federally owned property remained constant year after year, then the percentage plan of payment would be as fair a basis of contribution as the lump sum. But the ratio does not remain constant. The percentage of federally owned property is constantly decreasing and the percentage of privately owned property constantly increasing. It is perfectly obvious therefore that a fixed percentage under those circumstances would inevitably mean relatively increased "taxes" to the United States and decreased taxes to the private property owner. That is likewise the obvious reason that the fixed percentage basis is demanded by the District taxpayer. If the United States in 1915 owned for Federal purposes 28.2 per cent of the property and in 1928 but 22.2 per cent of the property, then a percentage in 1915 that was fair both to the United States and the District taxpayer would in 1928 be unfair to the United States and decidedly favorable to the District taxpayer.

Likewise these figures clearly show why the Federal contribution has properly decreased comparatively during the recent years that have witnessed a rapid development of private property in the District. Demand is made that the United States carry 40 per cent of the cost of the city government, and yet this report discloses that the United States owns and uses for Federal purposes but 22.2 per cent of the property of the District. Is it fair to ask 22.2 per cent of the property to pay 40 per cent of the taxes?

The lump-sum contribution of $9,000,000 carried in this bill pays 28 per cent of the total paid from general revenues, which again discloses that the United States, owning but 22.2 per cent of the property, is carrying its full share of the load. This is approximately the same percentage as has been paid during the past two years.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I notice some contention in the public press that the percentage of Government-owned property is increasing, but I understand from the figures just given that the reverse of that is true.

Mr. SIMMONS. The reverse of that is true. In 1915 we used for Federal purposes, according to the assessor, 28.2 per cent of the property. Due to the increase in the values in the development of private property in the District, that figure is now down to 22.2 per cent.

What would the $9,000,000 Federal contribution pay?

Based upon this bill, the $9,000,000 contributed by the Federal Government to the District of Columbia would pay the cost of the police department, the fire department, the health department, the courts and prisons, the public buildings and parks, including $1,000,000 for the purchase of land under the National Capital Park and Planning Commission, and the Zoo. There is then left for the people of the District to pay the general salary items, contingent and miscellaneous expenses, street and road improvement and repair, sewers, collection and disposal of refuse, the electrical department, the schools, the public welfare. The water service is self-supporting. The gas tax pays $1,600,000 of the $3,785,100 carried in the street and road improvement and repair item.

Upon the items in the bill, if the 60-40 plan were in force, the District would be called upon to pay only for the general salaries of the city, contingent and miscellaneous expenses, street and road improvement and repair, public schools, the health department, and public welfare.

While the United States would be asked to pay for the sewer system, the collection and disposal of refuse, public playgrounds, the electrical department, including all street lighting, and so forth, police and fire departments, courts and prisons, parks and buildings, including the $1,000,000 for new park land under the National Capital Park and Planning Commission, and the Zoo.

To state it thus is to show how utterly absurd and unfair it is to ask that there be a return to 60-40.

Accepting the Bureau of Efficiency values of real, personal, tangible, and intangible property, we are charging in this bill against the United States the equivalent of a $2.10 tax rate while the District taxpayer enjoys a rate of $1.70 in comparison. If the 60-40 plan were returned to, the United States rate would be $3.15 and the District rate $1.15 in comparison.

Bear in mind always that the District tax rate included all taxes generally separated elsewhere into school district, sanitary district, city, county, and State taxes. If the 60-40 plan were accepted for the fiscal year 1930, the United States would be called upon to contribute $13,070,728 and the District would be called upon to contribute $21,091,092 from its general tax revenues, while under the lump-sum plan the United States contributes $9,000,000, plus other items mentioned elsewhere, and the District taxpayer contributes $26,151,820.

Tables upon which this is based will be inserted in the RECORD.

It is interesting to note that on a 60-40 basis the real property charge against District property would be $13,374,500, as against a Federal contribution of $13,070,728. Or the United States, under the 60-40 plan, would be called upon to pay $1 into the treasury of the District for every dollar collected from real-estate taxes in the District. The 60-40 plan, then, actually means a 50-50 so far as the average taxpayer in the District is concerned.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the gentleman yield again for a question?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. In answer to the question I asked a moment ago, the gentleman gave the percentage of Government-owned property and privately owned property in the District. Is that based upon the percentage of valuation or the percentage of area? I presume it is upon valuation.

Mr. SIMMONS. Percentage of valuation. I have accepted all through the assessor's values of the District.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman stated just now that under the 60-40 plan the Federal contribution would be about $13,000,000?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CRAMTON. In that connection, if we returned to the old plan by which we had our 40 per cent share in the fines and fees and licenses, and so forth, there would be probably $800,000 or $900,000 coming back to us from the $13,000,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; that amount is exclusive of such receipts. The gross figure on a 60-40 basis is $14,060,728.

Mr. CRAMTON. That is what I wanted to be sure about.

Mr. SIMMONS. And that has grown now to about $1,000,000.

Mr. CRAMTON. But the $13,000,000 would be exclusive of that?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. TILSON. Has the gentleman a table showing the comparative taxation of property in the District as compared with other cities of the country of comparable size?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is all in the report of the Bureau of Efficiency, which has been printed and is available this morning. It comprises about 50 pages of printed matter.

Mr. TILSON. Then it does appear clearly in that report?

Mr. SIMMONS. It shows that the District, on the average, is under the average in tax loads and expenditures.

Particular attention should be called to the fact that the United States is not paying $9,000,000 out of the total of $41,265,250 carried by the bill. The United States is paying $9,000,000 out of $35,151,820.

The balance of the District revenues, to wit, $6,113,430, are derived from trust funds, the gas tax, water revenues, and miscellaneous revenues.

The total expenditures in this bill, including the supplemental estimates submitted by the Bureau of the Budget at our request, can all be paid out of the estimated 1930 revenues and leave a surplus of $1,863,180 to take care of deficiencies, new legislation, and so forth.

Attention is called to the table on page 41 of the hearings. The United States, by the substitution of the $9,000,000 lump-sum contribution for the 60–40 plan, releases to the District government miscellaneous revenues which under the 60–40 plan would otherwise be credited to the United States. In 1928 those revenues amounted to $865,339. It is estimated that they will equal $895,000 in 1929, and in 1930, $990,000. This, of course, should be considered in addition to the $9,000,000 Federal contribution, for its revenues that the District would not receive under the 60–40 plan.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Has the gentleman got the figures showing how much we collect from automobile taxes?

Mr. SIMMONS. The gentleman means automobile licenses?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Automobile licenses or taxes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not have it in this statement, but it is over $100,000 a year.

Mr. LINTHICUM. That goes into the improvement of the streets, I presume?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOWREY. The gentleman stated that the District is undertaxed, according to the report referred to. Can the gentleman tell us in about what proportion the District is undertaxed as compared with other cities of its size?

Mr. SIMMONS. That goes into the complete table of the Bureau of Efficiency report of about 50 pages separating the taxes into various groups, both revenues and expenditures, and you would have to study the entire report in order to arrive at that answer. The report is available in the committee room if the gentleman cares to have it.

I regret that the Bureau of Efficiency have not submitted to the Congress tables of the various other taxes that enter into the revenues of a city and the tax cost to its citizens. I am advised that this material will be submitted and included in the main report. In my judgment the charge for water in Washington is exceedingly low. How does it compare with other cities? The $1 a car auto-license cost in Washington is absurdly low. What do other cities pay? The gas tax here of 2 cents a gallon is the lowest rate charged by any tax body. Maryland charges 4 cents and Virginia 5 cents. License and gas tax revenues here are spent on the city streets. License and gas tax moneys collected in most cities are spent on country roads.

Mr. LINTHICUM. That is the item I wanted to know about—the gas tax.

Mr. SIMMONS. The gas tax amounts to about $1,500,000. I can not give the exact figures now.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to say to the gentleman that in Maryland a certain proportion of the gas tax and the license tax goes to the city of Baltimore and is not spent on the roads.

Mr. SIMMONS. Baltimore gets a division of it, but even a part of the money collected in Baltimore is spent on country roads.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Oh, yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. What advantage does Washington have as a result of it over other cities? No inheritance tax is levied in the District. What is the status of other jurisdictions?

What are the comparative corporation tax rates between Washington and other cities and States? Here few such charges are made.

The head of a family in the District has exempt from taxation household goods, and so forth, of the value of $1,000. What are the exemptions elsewhere?

The District levies no poll tax. What of other jurisdictions? Every State but five has one in some form.

What about license taxes and general franchise taxes?

Last year I discussed these questions briefly before the House on May 25, 1928, my remarks then being incorporated in House Document No. 330.

Mr. GIBSON. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. GIBSON. Will the gentleman state what is received by the District from license taxes?

Mr. SIMMONS. That statement is in the hearings. I could not give it offhand.

Mr. GIBSON. I desire to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that I will introduce to-day a bill covering the levy of license taxes, which materially increases the amount that will be received by the District.

Mr. SIMMONS. They will crucify you, too.

Mr. GIBSON. Well, I am used to that.

Mr. SIMMONS. What other taxing jurisdiction in America gives an exemption from taxation to intangibles comparable to those given by the District and listed on page 23 of House Document No. 330?

Washington taxes tangible personal property at a rate of $1.70 a hundred; intangibles are taxed at 50 cents a hundred. Do other tax bodies give intangibles a rate of less than 30 per cent of the tangible rate?

Is there another city in America that receives contributions from the Federal Government toward its general expenses? Is there another city of the United States without bonded or other indebtedness? Is there another city of the United States with a cash free surplus of approximately $7,000,000?

Each Member may be able to answer these and other questions as they apply to his own State and be thereby able to judge of the tax burdens of Washington. The answer to some of them may be found in the report.

Clearly the report establishes that the lump sum, and not the percentage plan of contribution, is the proper one, and clearly the report establishes the fact that the present contribution is ample and generous to the District. The report, while favorable to the District in every basis of calculation, clearly supports the position taken and maintained by the House of Representatives.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Has the gentleman taken any pains to ascertain, or did the bureau which has made this report make any attempt to ascertain, how closely the tax on intangibles is collected here?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; we have asked for a supplemental study of that angle of it by them. It is not involved in this report so far as I have discovered.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. About what is derived now from intangibles?

Mr. SIMMONS. About $2,500,000. I stated the figure a moment ago, and it is approximately that amount.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. On the question of surplus, did I understand the gentleman to say that the District has a surplus of $7,000,000 unexpended?

Mr. SIMMONS. Seven million dollars; yes. I am coming to that in a moment.

Mr. GIBSON. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. GIBSON. Reverting to the matter of the amount received from licensing of automobiles, did the gentleman state the amount received by the District?

Mr. SIMMONS. It is over $100,000. It is $1 a car, and we have a little over 100,000 cars in the District.

Mr. GIBSON. We have more than 140,000 cars in the District, I think.

Mr. SIMMONS. The figure has grown. I am using figures of last year. I do not have the figures available for this year.

Mr. GIBSON. In addition to the $1 per car, is there not a personal tax levied?

Mr. SIMMONS. There is a personal-property tax levied, but practically in all instances not paid. We carry in this bill a provision which, if allowed to stay in the bill, will require that they shall show the payment of personal taxes on their cars before they can get their licenses for the next year. At the present time they go to the license bureau, give a fictitious address as their place of residence, get their licenses for their automobiles, and there is no way to follow up on the car to find it ever for personal taxes.

Mr. GIBSON. May I make this suggestion: If the same amount is collected in the District from automobile owners as is collected in my State, the District, in place of receiving $100,000, would receive a little in excess of $4,200,000.

Mr. HOLADAY. If the gentleman will yield, I want to say that the amount received in the District for automobile licenses was $156,000 plus.

Mr. SIMMONS. You will find in the hearings, page 572, the report of the Detroit Bureau of Governmental Research for 1928. This is a private and not a governmental study. It is not my purpose to comment at length upon it. Those who care to do so may compare it with the Bureau of Efficiency report. By comparison between the two reports it is very evident that the Bureau of Efficiency report is decidedly favorable to the District taxpayer.

Again the old cry is raised that the district is compelled to furnish "free water" to the United States. There is no truth in the statement and yet the newspapers and others repeat over and over again the charge, possibly hoping by repeated statements to cause some one to believe that it is so. Reference is made to the table inserted in the record on page 507. The water system of Washington is a self-supporting enterprise. Appropriations for salaries, extensions, and betterments for operation and maintenance are all paid out of the water revenues. No part of the cost is reflected in the tax bill of the District resident. Of the capital invested in the plant the United States has contributed $12,311,887.66. The District of Columbia has contributed $10,383,036.93. The plant then is owned jointly by the United States and the District of Columbia, with the United States, as usual, paying the greater share.

Twenty-six million one hundred and seventy-five thousand seven hundred and fourteen dollars and thirty-one cents of the cost of the system has been paid for by the application of earnings of the system to its extension and betterment. In the fiscal year 1928 the value of the water used by the United States was $251,175, while the value of the water used by the District of Columbia was $775,074.

On the basis of water used, the United States received a return on its investment in the system of 2.04 per cent. On the same basis the District of Columbia received a return of 7.46 per cent on its investment. It is therefore perfectly obvious that due to the generosity of the United States in furnishing more than 50 per cent of the capital invested in the water system, the District, as usual, occupies an advantageous position. These facts ought to dispose of the charge that the District gives "free water" to the United States. I have no hope that it will.

Likewise, due to the generosity of the United States in furnishing 54 per cent of the capital invested in the system, the domestic users of Washington receive a pure and ample water supply at one of the lowest costs in any American city.

Last year the committee in order to bring the employees of the District of Columbia up to the average of salaries in the same grades in the Federal service added $121,245 to the salary estimates received from the Bureau of the Budget, making a total of $175,000, stipulating that this payment should go to those grades where the lower salary rates applied. It was contemplated at that time that an additional increase this year of $170,000 in salaries would be necessary to secure the expressed desire of the committee. The increases granted last year have been made in accordance with the intention of the committee. Those salary increases affected approximately 50 per cent of the District force. At the time the committee took that action the passage of the Welch Act was not contemplated. The Welch Act, passed in the last few days of the session, applied to District as well as Federal employees. As construed and applied it granted pay increases to all employees of the District and to many employees two increases in pay schedules. Following the adjournment of Congress the question was raised as to whether or not the Welch Act superseded the "set-ups" given by the Congress in the last District bill. I advised the District officials that it was my opinion that the Welch Act increases were in addition to and not in lieu of the increases granted by Congress. The interpretation I suggested was followed. The net result of the whole transaction was that the District employees received under the increases carried in the District bill last year $175,641. The Welch Act added $557,802 to the pay roll of the District government over and above the $175,641 granted by the committee. The total of the two bills reached $733,433 in salary increases last year in the District government. All District employees during the last year received one increase in pay, better than 50 per cent received two increases, and many of them three increases.

Detailed studies of the salary schedules have again been made and appear in the hearings beginning on page 53. Particular attention is called to the statement beginning on page 57 of the departments and establishments of the Federal Government where the average is either lower or not higher than the District average of salaries. These tables show that the operation of the Welch Act and the increases granted last year by the committee have brought the average of the District salaries to an advantageous comparison with Federal salaries. The purpose of the committee has been accomplished; the salary increases contemplated last year have been already granted; additional increases are not justified and the committee has not granted them. In this connection it is proper to call attention to the fact that the amendment and liberalization of the Welch Act is being urged upon the Congress. No prophecy is ventured as to the effect of the new proposals.

Prior to the holding of hearings on this bill study was given to the fiscal condition of the District of Columbia. Briefly a very satisfactory situation exists. On June 30, 1928, the District of Columbia had on deposit in the Treasury of the United States, over and above all obligations, a free balance of $6,126,600. That free unobligated balance will be on June 30, 1929, approximately $7,186,752. The estimated revenues of the District for the fiscal year 1930 covered by this bill are $38,390,000. The bill as sent us from the Bureau of the Budget called for expenditures of $33,787,792 and thereby would have created this year an estimated surplus above expenditures of $3,227,000.

Without increases by way of deficiency appropriations or new legislation and assuming the passage of the bill sent us by the Bureau of the Budget there would have been a surplus in the Treasury on June 30, 1930, of approximately $10,400,000 over and above all obligations.

By the act of June 29, 1922, the District was required to create a surplus sufficient to keep on a cash basis at all times. That sum has been fixed at $4,000,000. I agree that the reserved amount is a proper one. It is customary likewise to reserve $1,000,000 to take care of subsequent appropriations and new legislation.

Deducting that $5,000,000 it is obvious that additional appropriations from $4,000,000 to $5,000,000 can be made without jeopardizing the finances of the District. In our judgment those appropriations should be made for needed betterments—they can be made without increased taxes in the District or the Federal contribution.

Accordingly we asked the city officials to submit their estimates of needed betterments. Informal conferences were then held with the Bureau of the Budget and at our request estimates for betterments in the District were submitted, as follows:

Public library, land	$35,000
District repair shop	205,000
Repairs to Anacostia River Bridge	120,000
Park View School	265,000
Buchanan School	120,000
School sites	109,000
Salary, supreme court	10,000
Nurses' home at Gallinger Hospital	150,000
Railing and walk at Hains Point	40,000
Additional park land	400,000
Reptile house at Zoo	120,000
Total	1,674,000

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will.

Mr. TILSON. How much is recommended for the purchase of land to complete the Rock Creek Parkway connection between Potomac Park and Rock Creek Park?

Mr. SIMMONS. I expect to come to that later; but we are carrying this year a million dollars against $800,000 last year and $600,000 the year before.

Mr. TILSON. How is that paid?

Mr. SIMMONS. Out of the District revenue. For the actual work in Rock Creek Park we have given them this year $32,000 for material and $52,000 for labor in order that the driveway under Calvert Street Bridge may be completed during the coming year.

These additional betterments can be made out of 1930 estimated revenues.

It is the consensus of opinion that the city should purchase and begin the development of a municipal center. The President has approved the plan to purchase two blocks south of the present Judiciary Square. I have introduced the legislation that will authorize the appropriation of the needed moneys. The District has the money to pay the cost of this land purchase if the legislative committee will secure the authority for the appropriation to be made. I would like to see the appropriation carried in the last deficiency bill of this Congress to purchase the land and begin plans for the construction of this plant.

The expenditures carried in this bill by way of supplemental estimates plus the proposed expenditures for the municipal center will probably reduce the surplus as far as it should be reduced at this time.

I have introduced a bill authorizing the appropriation of $10,000,000 for additional school buildings and grounds. The bill is without condition as to when the appropriations are to be made or where schools are to be located or the kind of schools. It leaves the Congress free each year to appropriate to meet the needs then demonstrated. It binds neither the Congress nor the Board of Education to a fixed program for a series of years. It will allow the Congress to meet every situation as it arises, and in my judgment is the best way to secure the continuance of an efficient modern school system in this city.

Commenting upon this bill, the Washington Times on January 17, 1929, editorially stated:

Mr. SIMMONS has children of his own in the public schools of Washington, and he has personally studied conditions. He realizes that congestion in the schools is serious and that thousands of school children are being deprived of their rightful opportunities. He knows, beyond question, that many new school buildings are needed, and that many of those now in use are antiquated and practically unfit for pupils and teachers, lacking even proper sanitary and heating facilities.

I prefer to state my own position and ideas on the District schools. In certain parts of the city there is congestion due to rapid development of residential areas that could not have been anticipated. Adequate steps are being taken to relieve those conditions. There are 81,000 seats now in the District schools. When the building program now under way and carried in the bill is completed there will be a total of 90,000 seats. There are not to exceed 75,000 pupils in the District schools. So that there is space in the District schools for every student. The difficulty has been that in the shifting of the population, and the necessity for maintaining independent schools for both white and colored, often in the same neighborhood, that congestion has arisen in certain areas. That is being corrected, but on the whole the Washington schools are not congested, and no child is being deprived of educational opportunities in the District because of the building situation.

New buildings are needed to meet the requirements of a growing city; likewise, a policy of building replacements will be carried out. These conditions are to be expected in a growing, prosperous city. I do not see the schools in the gloomy way that this editor does. The condition is not as he describes it.

As an indication of the progress that is being made, let me cite one situation. In 1920 there were 360 part-time classes in the District schools. That number has now been reduced to 221, all of which are first or second grade pupils. The entire tendency now among school people is toward shorter school hours for the younger pupils. No material harm is being done these children. The condition of the schools is the best it has been for a long series of years, and they are constantly improving.

This bill provides for two additions to existing schools, not carried in the bill as it originally came to us—Parkview, $265,000, and Buchanan, $120,000. Estimates for these two schools were sent to the Congress by the Bureau of the Budget at the request of this committee. This committee wants to build schoolrooms, and no items have been denied that carried schoolrooms save an addition that was asked for the Lovejoy School. This is a colored school in a predominantly white neighborhood. The committee held conferences with school and citizen representatives of both races, and it was agreed by all that the addition there should not be carried in this bill; that the entire situation would be studied and a more satisfactory plan devised for the extension of both school systems in that area. The item for land to be added to the Giddings School contemplated the tearing down of both the Lincoln and Giddings Schools, with a total of 20 rooms, and their replacement with a new building. The buildings, while old, are serviceable and will be for a number of years. The plan would not increase the available classrooms. Accordingly that item was rejected, with the suggestion that in the study of the Lovejoy situation these buildings might be conserved and a platoon school built elsewhere for colored pupils. The bill also carries $100,000 for a site for a colored junior high school in this general area.

The Washington Times of January 17, 1929, editorial, elsewhere referred to, makes this statement:

The very committee of which Mr. SIMMONS is a valuable and prominent member readily accepts the dictates of the Bureau [of the Budget] even when it knows beyond question that the bureau should be overridden.

That statement is not true. The Bureau of the Budget is a branch of the Federal Government. It has fixed and definite duties to perform. It performs them. The Budget Bureau does not dictate to the committee. When the committee feels that the Budget is wrong, the committee overrides its proposals and follows its own judgment. Likewise, the Budget readily cooperates with this committee on this and other bills, as is shown by their acceptance of our request for additional estimates totaling $1,674,000. The difficulty has been that the District officials, as shown by the hearings, have failed to fully cooperate with the Budget in making up the items of this bill.

The Budget shares the view of this committee that more schoolrooms should be provided and fewer accessories in proportion to the total of the bill. New elementary rooms are needed in the area where the Business High School now is. With the abandonment of that school as contemplated by the erection of a new Business High School, the Budget felt that that building should be devoted to elementary school uses and the classroom condition in that area relieved. They have so provided in the bill. In that decision we concur. If at a later date a better use can be made of the building the provision can be changed. In the meantime we will not be losing on the number of elementary classrooms devoted to classroom work.

Since September 1, 1928, 73 new schoolrooms have been opened with sitting space for 2,100 pupils. Buildings now appropriated for, for which plans are being made or which are in the process of construction, provide for 132 additional rooms and additional sitting of 4,036 pupils. This bill carries the initiation of projects that will provide seating capacity for 3,343 pupils. The increase in school attendance this last year was 1,500. As rapid progress is being made in the building program as is warranted. [Applause.]

Unless there are questions about the bill I will ask unanimous consent to print the report on the bill as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by printing a report of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

The report is as follows:

[H. Rept. No. 2151, 70th Cong., 2d sess.]

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL, 1930

Mr. SIMMONS, from the Committee on Appropriations, submitted the following report, to accompany H. R. 16422:

The Committee on Appropriations submits the following report in explanation of the accompanying bill making appropriations for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930:

SCOPE OF THE BILL

The bill embraces all regular annual appropriations chargeable partly to the Treasury of the United States and partly to the revenues of the District of Columbia, including appropriations on account of park areas under the jurisdiction of the Director of Public Buildings and Public Parks, the National Capital Park and Planning Commission, the Zoological Park, and for certain work being performed under the supervision of the Engineer Department of the Army.

APPROPRIATIONS AND ESTIMATES

The estimates of appropriations upon which this bill is based were submitted by the President in the Budget for the fiscal year 1930, and will be found in detail in that document under Chapter XIII, pages 1309 to 1426, inclusive, and in supplemental estimates submitted in House Document No. 515.

There follows a summary of the regular annual appropriations for 1929, the Budget estimates for 1930, including the supplemental estimates, and the amounts proposed in the bill for 1930, separated in several funds so as to indicate in a general way the sources of revenue from which the appropriations will be met. The totals of the permanent annual and indefinite appropriations—amounts for which it is not necessary to carry in the annual appropriation bill—are shown in the table at the end of the report and included in the grand total so as to show the final figures affecting the fiscal affairs of the District of Columbia:

Source of revenue	Appropriated, 1929	Budget estimate, 1930	Proposed for 1930	Increase (+) or decrease (−) for 1930 as against 1929	Decrease under Budget estimates
Payable from gasoline-tax fund	$1,802,900	$1,600,000	$1,565,600	−$237,300	$34,400
Payable from water revenues	1,531,710	1,495,330	1,495,330	−36,380	----------
Payable from District revenues, derived from taxes on real estate, tangible and intangible personal property, public utilities, banks, etc., and from miscellaneous sources	25,302,698	26,461,792	26,152,220	+849,522	309,572
Payable from U. S. Treasury	9,000,000	9,000,000	9,000,000	----------	----------
Total, regular annual appropriation	37,637,308	38,557,122	38,213,150	+575,842	343,972

The regular annual appropriations under which the District of Columbia government is operating for the fiscal year 1929 total $37,637,308, which includes $12,100 contained in the second deficiency act of 1928. The amount recommended for the fiscal year 1930 as contained in the President's Budget (and including the supplemental estimates amounting to $1,674,000) total $38,557,122. The amount that has been recommended by the committee in the accompanying bill is $38,213,150, an increase of $575,842 over the 1929 appropriations, and a decrease of $343,972 under the total Budget estimates submitted for the next fiscal year. The following table will show the distribution of these figures between the various divisions and services of the municipal government. An explanation of the committee's action in each instance appears under the appropriate heading in this report, and an itemized tabulation of the figures appears at the end of the report:

SUPPLEMENTAL ESTIMATES

The original estimates submitted to the committee for its consideration amounted to $36,883,122, which represented a reduction of $754,186 under the current appropriations. The estimates as they first appeared for examination were lacking in many important items of a forward-looking character for improvement and development purposes. Investigation by the committee showed that, exclusive of a reserve cash working balance of $4,000,000 and a reserve of $1,000,000 to offset items under new law and possible deficiencies in current or prior year appropriations, there would still be a net cash surplus of revenues to the credit of the District of Columbia approximating $5,000,000. The commissioners, upon invitation by the Bureau of the Budget, had submitted to the bureau after the Budget of $36,883,122 had been approved, supplementary estimates which were not approved because of the type of a number of the items submitted, among them being provision for additional positions and salary increases. After this refusal, the Bureau of the Budget suggested that an alternative supplementary list be submitted, which was to include items more in the nature of permanent public improvements in the District. This the District Commissioners failed to do. The subcommittee, at the hearings, did not get any justification for the lack of planning in this respect. Having in mind the large idle cash surplus to the credit of the District of Columbia, and believing that the taxpayers of the District were entitled at least to the expenditure of a portion of this fund upon necessary projects from which they would derive a deserved civic benefit, the committee, after indicating the nature of improvements which it would consider, obtained from the District officials an estimate of primary items of importance totaling $4,979,700, paralleled by a secondary group amounting to $1,630,000, making a total of $6,609,700. The committee then cooperated with the Bureau of the Budget, and as a sequence to such action there was submitted to Congress a supplementary list of estimates (H. Doc. No. 515) covering important public improvements amounting to $1,674,000.

These supplemental estimates covered amounts for the library service, concentration of the highways department shops, repairs to Anacostia Bridge, school sites and buildings, Gallinger Hospital nurses' home, public parks, and a building at the National Zoological Park. The committee has recommended all of these items which makes the total of the bill (as heretofore stated) $575,442 over the current appropriations. Two additional projects, a municipal center (estimated at $2,400,000) and a new police court building (estimated at $300,000), were also given serious consideration. Action thereon has not been taken at this time due to lack of legislation for the civic center, and the opinion that a project of the magnitude of the police court building quite naturally is linked to the plans for a new civic center. Proposed legislation, recently introduced in the House of Representatives, is pending at the present time, and it is anticipated and hoped that action will be taken during this Congress, both of authorization and appropriation for this project.

FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION

The committee has recommended the Federal contribution of $9,000,000, which amount has been carried for the past several years. No increase in the current tax rate of $1.70 is made necessary by the total of the appropriations recommended in the accompanying bill. There has been recommended in the bill a provision continuing for the fiscal year 1930 the same tax rate on real estate and tangible personal property as has been maintained during the current year. The report made recently by the United States Bureau of Efficiency, at the request of the Committee on Appropriations, upon the fiscal relations of the District of Columbia in the opinion of the committee clearly discloses, first, that the contribution of the Federal Government meets fairly and generously all obligations toward the District government by the United States, and, secondly, it shows that when compared with other cities of similar size the District is in a very advantageous situation as to its tax burden and general fiscal condition. The committee finds no reason for changing the method of the Federal contribution, in increasing the amount, or decreasing the District's tax rate. Rather, as has been indicated by the committee's action in its recommendations in this bill, it feels that the District should very properly go ahead with a program of municipal betterments.

SALARIES OF EMPLOYEES

Last year, when the committee had the estimates for the District of Columbia under consideration, it went particularly into the question of the salaries of employees of the District of Columbia, under the classification act of 1923, operative at that time. The salary rates of teachers, firemen, or policemen were not included in the study, as these were and are all covered by legislation apart from the act mentioned. A comparison was made of the average number of employees, the average salary rates, and the total salary obligations for all employees in the District of Columbia, listed under the different Federal establishments, including the District of Columbia, for the years 1927, 1928, and 1929. With the exception of employees under public buildings and public parks of the National Capital—which service was hardly comparable, as most of those employees are grouped under the custodial grades—the average salary for the employees of the District of Columbia was the lowest of that for the 33 departments and bureaus listed. The committee then ascertained the total amount that would be necessary to bring the salaries of the District employees up to the average salary rates of the grades specified in the then applicable classification act of 1923.

The amount having been estimated at $340,750, the committee at that time determined to appropriate this amount of money over a 2-year period, distributing it under the respective bureaus and divisions of the local government. A sufficient amount of money was included in the bill and appropriated last year over the Budget estimate, and there was actually expended or allocated during the current fiscal year, prior to the enactment of the Welch Pay Act, $175,641. The committee's action, of course, in planning this 2-year program of salary increases, was not predicated upon the passage and application of the pay rates contained in the Welch Pay Act. When this law became operative the effect of its provisions, so far as the salaries of the employees of the District of Columbia were concerned, was to add an additional net amount of $557,802 to the pay roll of the District government over and above the original $175,641. The total of these two amounts, therefore, $733,443, represents what actually has been obligated and allocated for salary increases during the current year, and the salary amounts covered in this bill for the next fiscal year maintain this schedule. When the District Commissioners submitted their supplemental estimates to both the Bureau of the Budget and to the committee this year, they included an item of $165,000, the purpose of which was to finish the second part of the 2-year salary-increase program which the committee had embarked upon last year. The Bureau of the Budget eliminated this estimate in view of the subsequent effect of the Welch Pay Act, and the committee in reporting out this bill has sustained that action. From data, testimony, and tables contained in the hearings this year (pp. 51–62) it will be observed that, in comparison with the Federal departments, the average salary rates of the District government employees are most favorable.

RETIREMENT OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA PERSONNEL

Officers and employees of the municipal government of the District of Columbia are eligible to the retirement provisions of the act of May 22, 1920, as amended, with the exception of school-teachers and others specially excepted from the provisions of the act. The District personnel contributes to the retirement fund by salary deductions the same as Federal personnel. Until the fiscal year 1929 no appropriation had been made by the Federal Government toward financing the accrued liability of the Government in the retirement fund, which accrued liability is estimated at approximately $400,000,000. For the fiscal years 1929 and 1930 Congress has appropriated approximately $20,000,000 each year toward financing the accrued liability of the Government. Included in this stated accrued liability of the Federal Government is the portion of the liability which was created by the participation of District of Columbia employees.

In order that the financing of that portion of the accrued liability which is properly chargeable to District of Columbia personnel may be borne by the District of Columbia instead of by the United States, the committee has recommended a separate section in the bill transferring from District revenues the sum of $300,000, composed of $150,000 each for the fiscal years 1929 and 1930, to the credit of the United States. For the next fiscal year and thereafter so long as it may be necessary, it is anticipated that a regular item for this purpose will be budgeted and carried annually to meet the District's share of the accrued liability. The sum of $150,000 for each of these years is based upon as accurate an estimate as it is now possible to make of the portion that should be borne by the District. As better data become available in future years the annual amount can be readjusted to meet the situation of the accrued liability then existing or to adjust any underestimate or overestimate of the District's share year by year.

ALLOWANCES TO EMPLOYEES FOR QUARTERS, MAINTENANCE, ETC.

At the various institutions of the District of Columbia for many years in the past it has been the practice and custom to allow quarters, maintenance, etc., for employees who are required to live at the institutions. The necessity for a large number of persons to live at the institutions is very obvious. The classification act of 1923 provides that in fixing salaries these maintenance allowances shall be taken into consideration. The rates of allowances and values in effect have been criticized by the Comptroller General as being too low in many cases. In order that these rates may be reviewed by the Personnel Classification Board, the central agency for allocating positions, and determination by them of the adjusted scale of allowances, the committee recommends a paragraph under the Board of Public Welfare continuing the present scale of allowances in effect pending a review and determination of the rates by the board. The institutions involved include the workhouse, reformatory, jail, hospitals, homes, and the various correctional institutions, and a proper and detailed study of the entire field will enable the board to evaluate the allowances in relation to the entire salary question.

CARE OF DISTRICT BUILDING

In the estimates for the care of the District Building, which item provides for the necessary expenses of maintenance and operation, including repairs, fuel, light, and power, there was contemplated the elimination of one employee at $1,428. This employee was one of five engineers, and it appeared his services were quite necessary. The committee, therefore, increased the appropriation to the extent necessary to include this position.

LICENSE BUREAU

Under the license bureau the committee has inserted the following proviso:

"Provided, That hereafter the superintendent of licenses of the District of Columbia shall not issue a registration certificate or identification tags for any motor vehicle upon which any personal taxes are due and unpaid to the said District.

In testimony submitted to the committee it was stated that a practice existed in the District where some of the inhabitants give a fictitious street address when applying for their registration certificate or identification tags for their automobiles, and this practice naturally obviates the collection later of personal taxes upon the vehicle. By the adoption of the above proviso, this subterfuge will be stopped and it has been estimated that approximately $70,000 additional in personal-property taxes will come into the District treasury.

OFFICE OF THE CORPORATION COUNSEL

The committee has increased the Budget estimate for the office of the corporation counsel by adding $1,500 to cover the salary of a messenger. At the present time there is no such employee in this office, and it was stated that such services are much needed.

HIGHWAYS DEPARTMENT

Including a supplemental estimate of $205,000, the amount recommended for the highways department for the next fiscal year is $420,690, which is the Budget estimate, and an increase over the current year of $222,840. The purpose of the supplemental estimate of $205,000 is to provide for the removal of the highways department shops, etc., to the Bryant Street pumping station, and in this connection, to make certain other desirable economical arrangements for servicing, repairing, and housing municipal automobiles. For many years the store yards and shops of the highways department have been located on United States territory in the center parking of Canal Street, between Second Street west and South Capitol Street. This property was transferred to the United States Botanic Garden under the act of May 11, 1922. The Botanic Garden development requires the early removal of the highways department shops to another location. It is proposed to consolidate the shops of the highways department with those of the water department at the Bryant Street pumping station. In order to accomplish this purpose, provide for the repairs of highways department automobiles at the District automobile repair shop across the street from the Bryant Street pumping station, and provide housing for these automobiles, it will be necessary to provide additional construction as follows:

Addition to District automobile repair shop	$40,000
New garage	135,000
Shop construction, including asphalt and cement laboratory, and removal of equipment from old to new location	30,000
Total	205,000

The additional construction will be on land already owned by the Government. It is contemplated also that the garage and shops of the trees and parking department, in buildings and on the grounds of the Gallinger Municipal Hospital, shall be moved to the Bryant Street pumping station.

MUNICIPAL ARCHITECT'S OFFICE

The committee by its own action has increased the Budget estimate for the municipal architect's office by $3,800, to provide for a manager of the District repair shop. At present the shop has no real executive head and it is believed that an employee with such ability to direct the large amount of repair work done under the District government will aid materially in increasing the efficiency of this service.

FREE PUBLIC LIBRARY

The total recommended for the Free Public Library and its branches is $390,940, which includes a supplemental estimate of $35,000. This is an increase for 1930 over 1929 of $58,005. The supplemental estimate proposes the acquisition of a site, to be approved by the Commissioners of the District and the board of library trustees, for a building for a northeastern branch library. The board of library trustees has considered that a branch library in the northeastern section of the city is most urgently needed, directing attention to the fact that in this section there is 1 junior high school, 18 graded schools, 3 parochial schools, the Gallaudet College, as well as many churches, and other organizations and institutions. The proposed library will serve a large commercial and residential area, and it is expected that when completed this branch library will benefit about 100,000 people.

RECORDER OF DEEDS

At the present time all expenditures under the office of the recorder of deeds are accountable only to the General Accounting Office and are not reviewed by the auditor of the District of Columbia government. This situation has existed for a number of years and at times has created conditions that do not lend themselves to the proper efficiency of this office. The committee is of the opinion that the expenditures of this office should, like all other units under the District government, receive the prior approval of the Commissioners of the District. Accordingly, a proviso has been inserted in the bill under the office of the recorder to bring about such an administrative review before audit by the General Accounting Office.

EMPLOYMENT SERVICE

The committee has increased the Budget estimate for personal services and miscellaneous and contingent expenses for maintaining a public employment service for the District by replacing one employee at $1,650, which had been eliminated. The committee is of the opinion that this service is rendering a distinct help in the District of Columbia in placing jobless individuals in positions, and that reducing the staff by one employee would work a real hardship, especially in view of the fact that the total pay roll represents only 8 positions, 2 Federal and 6 municipal.

STREET AND ROAD IMPROVEMENT AND REPAIR

The total recommended for the various items for street and road improvement and repair in the District of Columbia is $3,745,500, which includes a supplemental estimate of $120,000. These figures represent a reduction of $332,960 under the current year and $36,900 under the Budget estimate. The following table sets forth at a glance the different funds appropriated for under the general amount shown above:

Street and road improvement and repair

For paving, repaving, and grading, under the gasoline-tax road and street fund, the committee has eliminated two improvements which were contained in the estimates when they were examined. These items are the paving of Western Avenue NW., from Forty-first Street to Chevy Chase Circle, $21,000; and the paving of Admiral Barney Circle SE., $31,000. The committee, as is its custom, made the usual automobile trip over all street improvements contemplated in this bill and were unanimously of the opinion that from the present fair condition of these two projects they could very properly be postponed for a while.

The supplemental estimate of $120,000 proposes the reconstruction of the floor system and handrail of the Anacostia River Bridge. This bridge was built in 1908 and consists of six steel arch spans and a draw span. The roadway, 35 feet wide with two 6.5-foot sidewalks, carries two street-car tracks. The asphalt surface of the floor has rolled so that in places the curb height is reduced to 1 inch. This is a very inadequate protection to vehicular traffic, and the railing is not of sufficient strength safely to withstand the impact of modern traffic. The entire floor system is in need of replacement at a lower level to provide an increased height of curb.

SEWERS

The Budget estimate of $1,451,000 for the different activities of the sewer service in the District has been increased by the committee $25,000 to provide for continuing the construction of the Stickfoot Branch storm water sewer, a project that is, according to testimony submitted by interested citizens in that locality, quite desirable. The other funds remain approximately the same and propose the same amount of work for next year as is called for by the present program. The item for assessment and permit work shows an apparent reduction of $70,000, but this is offset by making certain unexpended balances of the current appropriation available for 1930.

The total amount recommended for the public schools, their maintenance, personal services, and buildings and grounds for the next fiscal year is $11,846,000, which includes a supplemental estimate of $494,000 for additional schools and school sites. The recommendations represent a reduction of $304,530 under the current year and $241,580 under the Budget estimates. This reduction, however, is merely a postponement to a future date of several school projects until certain elements incident to their construction are worked out.

Personal services of administrative and advisory officers: The committee has added $5,000 over the Budget estimate for the appointment of what is to be known as a business manager for the school department. During the hearings last year it was developed that there was lacking in the system an administrative business manager to supervise only the business administration and expenditures. A joint hearing was had between the House Subcommittee on Appropriations and the Senate Subcommittee on Appropriations handling District appropriations, with school officials and the school board, at that time. They were asked to study the suggestion of the creation of such a position and to report back this year. At the conclusion of the hearings this year it was decided to go ahead with the appointment of such a manager, to be chosen by the District Commissioners, the school board, and the superintendent of schools, the manager to be preferably one with an engineer's qualifications. By following out this proposal, it will relieve the superintendent of many matters of a business nature which he has to determine at the present time and concentrate under one proper supervision the manifold construction, engineering, and mechanical questions which naturally arise in carrying out the school-expansion program.

Teachers: The estimates examined by the committee proposed 33 new teacher positions, as follows: Eight, class 1A, at $1,400; 4, class 2A, at $1,800; 8 class 2C, at $2,200; and 13, class 3A, at $2,200. Of the number of teachers requested (33) the committee has recommended in the accompanying bill 15, or a net reduction of 18. Those included in the bill are: One, class 1A, at $1,400; 4, class 2A, at $1,800; 3, class 2C, at $2,200; and 7, class 3A, at $2,200. Those elminiated are 7, class 1A, at $1,400; 5, class 2C, at $2,200; and 6, class 3A, at $2,200. Those additional teachers recommended by the committee represent positions necessary in the establishment of new classes. Those additional teachers requested that were eliminated by the committee represented teachers that were not for new classes but in addition to their regular staff presumably because of oversized classes. The committee in making the reduction has followed the same policy that it adopted last year in following the recommendations contained in the school report of the United States Bureau of Efficiency, at which time it was quite apparent that there were ample teachers to take care of operating classroom needs. The situation presented to the committee this year indicates nothing to change this policy, except the appointment of teachers to new classrooms.

Public works: The total amount for public works (which includes both the building of new schools, additions to existing schools, and the purchase of new sites for proposed future schools) which is recommended for the school program for the next fiscal year is $2,242,000. This amount includes a supplemental estimate of $494,000.

For the erection of school additions and building new schools there will be available for 1930 a total of $1,835,000. This amount covers 10 actual projects, as follows:

Project	School	Amount
8-room addition and combination gymnasium and assembly hall.	Morgan School	(1)
Combination gymnasium and assembly hall.	John Eaton School	$50,000
Junior high school building (limit of cost, $500,000).	Reno section	200,000
Completing E. A. Paul Junior High School	Brightwood	250,000
Completing construction of elementary school building and combination gymnasium and assembly hall.	Nineteenth and Columbia Road NW.	225,000
Junior high school building (limit of cost, $500,000).	Vicinity of Kingsman School	200,000
Colored Health School	Undetermined	150,000
New Business High School (limit of cost, $1,500,000).	Site adjoining Macfarland Junior High School.	300,000
Addition to Park View School	Park View	265,000
4-room addition, including combination gymnasium and assembly hall.	Buchanan School	120,000
		1,835,000

[1] Unexpended balance.

School sites: For the purchase of sites for proposed new schools there is included in the bill $407,000, which contemplates the purchase of land, or portions of land, for eight new projects, the exact location of which is as yet undetermined.

POLICE DEPARTMENT

The bill carries a total amount for the police department of the District of Columbia of $3,083,950, which is a decrease of $57,595 under the amount for this year and a net reduction of $45,240 under the estimates contained in the Budget. The figures first presented to the committee included an amount of $36,300, involving the addition of 13 new privates at $1,800, 3 sergeants at $2,400, 1 lieutenant at $2,700, and 1 captain at $3,000. The committee has disallowed all of these 18 additional men for the force. It based its action upon the number of men now on the force, believing it to be amply sufficient properly and efficiently to patrol the city. The District force, under its present number, compares most favorably with other metropolitan cities. A report, made recently by the United States Bureau of Efficiency, states:

"Washington has a greater number of policemen per capita, regardless of the fact that it has no large foreign-born population and that it is neither an industrial center nor a seaport, than the cities of Chicago, Philadelphia, Detroit, Cleveland, St. Louis, Baltimore, Pittsburgh, Buffalo, Milwaukee, Minneapolis, New Orleans, Cincinnati, Kansas City, Mo., Indianapolis, and Toledo. Its per capita is only exceeded by New York City, Boston, and Newark."

This report does not take into consideration an additional force of 71 park police maintained under the Superintendent of Public Buildings and Grounds, the police force at the Capitol, House, and Senate Office Buildings, and the numerous guards stationed at all Federal buildings. If this additional police protection were taken into consideration no city in the United States could compare with the number of policemen per capita. The committee has also inserted a provision reducing the amount for extra compensation to members of the force who may be mounted on horses from $450 to $360 per annum; those mounted on bicycles from $70 to $50 per annum; and extra compensation for motor vehicles from $480 to $312, being of the opinion that the amount authorized under current law to be excessive. In reducing the estimate by 18 positions a corresponding reduction of $1,350 was made in the fund for uniforms.

A reduction of $4,000 in the estimate for the house of detention has also been made because in the original estimate for this service an allocation of $15,000 was made for rental, whereas recently the house of detention has been able to obtain quarters at a rate for the next fiscal year totaling $11,000 per annum.

Last year there was appropriated a sum of $52,000 for the erection of a building to be known as the fifteenth police precinct station house. No construction has as yet started on the proposed station, and in the conduct of the hearings this year officials of the police department failed to impress the committee with the immediate need for such a station house. Accordingly the committee has made available $2,000 of the appropriation for this purpose for the acquisition of additional land for the final site for this house when conditions warrant its erection and reappropriated and transferred the remaining $50,000 to another item in the bill.

FIRE DEPARTMENT

The committee has reduced the estimate presented to it for the fire department $41,775 under the current year and $37,350 under the estimate contained in the Budget, making a total amount available for the department for next year of $2,171,790. This reduction includes the elimination of 18 new firemen for six months, totaling $17,000; some new fire gear amounting to $21,000; and the uniform appropriation by $1,350. The committee substantiates its action as follows: Last year when the bill was before the committee for its consideration an amount was recommended for a site and for the erection and furnishing of a building for an engine company to be located in the vicinity of Sixteenth Street and Colorado Avenue NW. Injunction proceedings precluded the District officials from proceeding with this program, and the matter is still in the courts. Eighteen additional men and the requisite fire gear were recommended in the amounts carried in the bill for this new fire house. Despite the fact that there has been no fire house at which to station these men, they were appointed shortly after the money became available. In the estimates originally submitted to the committee, as has been stated, there were 18 new men included for manning a proposed fire house at Connecticut and Nebraska Avenues, which is recommended in the bill. The committee has eliminated these new positions and the apparatus and expects the department to use at this latter station the personnel and apparatus granted last year for the station the construction of which is held up temporarily pending the outcome of litigation.

HEALTH DEPARTMENT

The bill carries a total amount of $427,590 for the health department of the District, which is an increase of $28,135 over the current year. All of this increase is absorbed by salary readjustments under the Welch Pay Act. The committee has increased the appropriation for maintaining a child hygiene service by adding $2,000 to the Budget estimate, making the amount available for this purpose for 1930 $54,000. In reality this is an increase of $4,000 over the current year. The department contemplates the establishment of an additional hygiene station. The amount in the estimate did not appear sufficient, so the committee of its own volition raised the amount as indicated.

COURTS AND PRISONS

For the District courts, their expenses, and the support of convicts of the District of Columbia a total of $842,340 has been recommended for the year 1930. This amount reflects an increase of $51,647 over the current year and a decrease of $4,040 under the Budget estimates.

Juvenile court: The bill carries $65,740 for the activities of the juvenile court and its probation officers. The committee eliminated as unnecessary a proposed additional financial clerk at $1,620 per annum.

Police court: The committee reduced the amount for the police court by $2,420, making the total appropriation for 1930 $142,620. The committee's action in making the reduction referred to eliminated one night court clerk at $1,920, whose services were no longer necessary by reason of the committee's action last year in closing the night traffic court, and by reducing the general maintenance fund by $500. The committee was informed last year that by closing the night traffic court it would cause a reduction both in the amount needed for fuel and for gas, electric light, and power. In the estimated allocations under this fund for 1930 the amounts remained practically the same.

Municipal court: The Budget estimate of $83,270 has been recommended for the municipal court, an increase over this year of $8,734. This increase includes an additional bookkeeper at $1,800, the balance being absorbed by Welch Pay Act increases.

Supreme Court of the District of Columbia: Including a supplemental estimate of $10,000, covering the salary of an additional judge authorized by the act of December 20, 1928, the amount estimated in the Budget for the conduct of the Supreme Court of the District was $292,520. No additional employees are recommended over this year, the differentiation in amount between 1929 and 1930 being covered by salary increases under the Welch Act.

PUBLIC WELFARE

Including a supplemental estimate of $150,000 for a nurses' home at Gallinger Municipal Hospital under an estimated cost not to exceed $325,000, the estimates submitted for the various public-welfare activities total $4,529,580. The committee has recommended $4,486,580, which is an increase of $164,560 over 1929 and an apparent decrease under the Budget of $43,000. Actually, however, the committee increased the Budget amount by making available $50,000 of an unexpended appropriation for the purposes of the construction of permanent buildings at the reformatory, and thus releasing this amount from the set-up. This increase of $7,000 is covered by raising the item for a home for the superintendent at the Home for the Feeble-Minded from $15,000 to $20,000, and by increasing the appropriation for the Temporary Home for Union Ex-Soldiers and Sailors, $2,000, to cover the salary of a night watchman and repairs.

The committee has increased the amount to be available from the various funds at the District Reformatory, to act as a revolving fund, and known as the working capital fund, from $25,000 to $50,000. This fund was created last year upon recommendation by the Bureau of Efficiency, the purpose being to provide certain small self-paying industries at this institution to keep the men occupied and provide some means of remuneration for their labor. The initial success of this idea has induced the committee to increase the fund for the purpose of adding several other industries at the institution.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND PARKS

The committee has recommended for public buildings and parks for the District a total of $1,139,400, an increase of $133,065 over the current year and an increase of $37,000 over the Budget estimates. The item for salaries under public parks reflects a Budget increase of $49,540 over 1929. This increase covers $44,280 for increases under the Welch Act, and $5,260 for an increase of five laborers at the minimum rate. For salaries of the park police the bill carries $152,000 for 151 men, an increase of $2,000 and 1 officer for next year over 1929. Including a supplemental estimate of $40,000, and an increase by the committee over the Budget estimate of $37,000, the appropriation for general expenses for public parks is $570,000. The supplemental estimate is an initial amount for beginning the construction of a sidewalk and protective railing along the sea wall of East Potomac Park. At the present time a sidewalk and an iron railing now encircle the sea wall at Hains Point. The purpose of this estimate is to continue the walk and railing a considerable distance on both the Washington Channel and Potomac River sides of East Potomac Park. The $32,000 added by the committee over the Budget estimate covers an item for the purchase of road metal for the parkway between Massachusetts Avenue and the Zoo, which was eliminated from the estimates by the committee last year because the material would not be used at that time. An additional $5,000 was added by the committee for temporary labor.

NATIONAL PARK AND PLANNING COMMISSION

The original estimate submitted to the committee for the National Park and Planning Commission for 1930 for the purchase of park areas was $600,000, a reduction under the current year of $250,000. A supplemental estimate of $400,000 was received later for inclusion in the amount recommended for 1930, bringing the total up to $1,000,000. This supplemental estimate is to expedite the purchase by the National Capital Park and Planning Commission of lands for the proper extension of the park and playground system.

NATIONAL ZOOLOGICAL PARK

Including a supplemental estimate of $220,000, the amount recommended for 1930 is $423,000, an increase over the current year of $240,950. The supplemental estimate is to provide the necessary housing facilities for the proper exhibition of collections of reptiles, amphibians, insects, and other invertebrates. At present reptiles and amphibians must be kept in the lion house under conditions unsuitable for their care and exhibition. This amount will provide for the most pressing need at the Zoo.

WATER SERVICE

Washington Aqueduct: The amount recommended has been increased from $425,000 for 1929 to $441,000 for 1930. The increase of $16,000 is required to cover increases of salaries due to the Welch Act, amounting to $8,400, and to the increased amount of water which will be consumed in 1930, the treatment and pumping of which will cost $7,600 additional.

Salaries and maintenance: The amounts carried in the bill for salaries is $154,800, an increase of $10,440 due to the Welch Act, and for maintenance $365,000, an increase of $30,000, $25,000 of which is due to increased per diem wages under the wage scale of August 6, 1928, and $5,000 general increase to provide for unforeseen emergencies.

The amounts for extension of distribution systems, $250,000; installing water meters, $30,000; installing fire and public hydrants, $50,000; and replacement of old mains, $50,000; all remain the same as the current year.

For the extension of water mains in different sections of the city there are five projects contemplated, at a total cost of $154,532.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 30 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, as a member of the subcommittee charged with the responsibility of looking into the fiscal affairs of the District of Columbia, I feel it is my duty to give to the House such information as I may have with reference to this matter. I desire to impress on the minds of the Members of the House that they should not be misled by the statements made by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS], chairman of the subcommittee, when he mentions that the committee did this or the committee did that, or the committee recommends this or the committee recommends that. The fact is that as far as I know the subcommittee had very little to do with the preparation of this bill or the report accompanying it that is now before you.

The first time I saw the bill or the report was when I appeared at a meeting of the full Committee on Appropriations to report the bill to the House. That is equally true of my colleague, Mr. GRIFFIN, of New York.

I feel that there is a system growing up in this House with reference to these appropriation bills, and particularly with reference to this District bill, that should be brought to the attention of the House, so that you may understand just what it is.

I was present in the city all the time during the hearings on this bill, with the exception of two days when it was necessary for me to go to Harrisburg, being president of the Pennsylvania Federation of Labor, to attend the State legislature's conference to prepare labor's legislative program to be presented to the legislature now in session.

I did not arrive in Washington on January 3, the first day of the hearings, because I had been seriously ill, but I have been in the city all of the time since my arrival on the 4th of January, with the exception of the two days I have just mentioned.

I know of no meeting having been called by the chairman of the subcommittee to mark up this bill; that is, to prepare the language that was to go into the bill or the report. I know of no meeting where the members of the subcommittee were called together to decide what items should or should not go into the bill. I do not know who wrote the bill. Neither do I know who wrote the report. You have before you a bill and a report accompanying it, supposedly prepared by the subcommittee. The report recommends the passage of the bill by the committee, when, as a matter of fact, the subcommittee never saw the bill or report until yesterday. I have no desire to quarrel with anybody; neither have I any desire to enter into personalities with reference to this matter. Personalities should not be indulged in during the consideration of legislation, but facts and systems should be discussed and that is what I propose to do in the short time at my disposal.

The committee's report would lead you to believe, and so would the statements of the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, that the subcommittee had discussed this lump-sum appropriation and had arrived at a conclusion upon it. The fact is that since I have been a member of the subcommittee the subcommittee has never discussed this question. They have never been permitted to discuss it. I am not an advocate of the 60-40 plan or any other similar plan, because I do not believe they are fair to the Federal Government. I do not say that I am opposed to the lump-sum proposition of $9,000,000. I do say that I do not know whether it is right or not. Such investigation as I have made into this matter, the available information I could get upon it, leads me to believe that the person who guesses at a lump sum of $9,000,000 may be correct, but that he is no more correct than the man who would guess at lump sum of $15,000,000 or $5,000,000. We simply do not know, and while the present law provides that we shall pay on the 60-40 basis, the law has been set aside by the Congress upon the theory that the lump sum would save the Federal Treasury money, and because of that it comes within the Holman rule.

Much criticism has been made because of the report of the Bureau of Efficiency upon this question, criticism by the citizens and the newspapers of the District of Columbia. I am not prepared to say whether this criticism is just or not, because I have not had the time to study the report as I would like to. I believe the report of the Bureau of Efficiency on the fiscal relations between the District of Columbia and the Federal Government is something that should be welcomed by everybody, because for the first time to my knowledge we have a concrete proposition laid before us by an impartial tribunal, which we can add to or take from, and in this way we may arrive at a satisfactory and equitable adjustment of this troublesome question of the fiscal relations between the Federal Government and the District of Columbia. I simply repeat that I do not know what the proper amount should be. I say our subcommittee has not discussed it, we were not permitted to discuss it, and I do not want the Members of the House to understand, from what the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee says in reference to this matter, that his statements carry with it the approval of myself or my colleague on the subcommittee, the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN].

I find unfortunately both for the Congress and the people of the District of Columbia, that there is a misunderstanding that should be cleared up. Congress seems to be in the attitude of being against everything that the people of the District of Columbia want. This is unfortunate. Congress undertakes to criticize the people of the District because the tax rate is $1.70. That is held up as an illustration of why Congress should be hostile to the people of the District of Columbia. As a matter of fact the people of the District of Columbia have nothing to say about what their tax rate shall be. This House fixes this tax rate for the District of Columbia, and this House must accept the responsibility for the low tax rate in the District.

We provide in this bill that the authorities of the District of Columbia shall not have the authority to reduce the tax rate below $1.70, notwithstanding the fact that this tax rate has created a surplus that is accumulating in the Treasury, because Congress will not authorize the expenditure of sufficient money necessary for proper improvements in the District of Columbia. So long as we limit the expenditures of the District of Columbia as we do in this bill and every other bill and prevent the people of the District of Columbia from making the necessary improvements, it naturally follows we must in all fairness assume the responsibility. They are prohibited from spending any money other than that authorized by the bills passed by Congress.

Much has been said on this question, and I do not propose to go into it at any greater length, except to say that in my judgment you and I and the rest of the membership of this House are responsible for the low tax rate in the District of Columbia, and we should assume full responsibility for it and not try to shift it upon the citizens of the District. When we fix the amount that can be spent by the officials of the District we, of course, fix the tax rate.

You have been told that there is a surplus in the Treasury to the credit of the District of Columbia, and you have been told that there is no need for additional school facilities, notwithstanding that there are at the present time 6,000 children in the District of Columbia who attend school on what is called part time. That means that one child will go to school this morning and another child remain at home; the child who remains home in the morning will take the place of the child who went to school in the morning by going in the afternoon. This means that 6,000 children in the District of Columbia are being robbed of their education and additional and unnecessary burdens are being imposed on their parents. The hearings show, and the facts will demonstrate, that we have established a 5-year building program for our public-school system in the District of Columbia. The facts will also show that we are $3,500,000 behind in appropriations for providing for school facilities for the proper accommodation of the children in the District of Columbia; I believe this is a matter that Congress should be interested in.

The hearings will show that the school authorities have repeatedly asked for appropriations to keep abreast of the 5-year program, but notwithstanding their urgent requests we are $3,500,000 short of the 5-year program. In addition to this, we have approximately 75 or 80 portable schools that are moved from place to place to relieve the load in certain sections when conditions become so congested that they can not handle the school children—these shacks which are moved from place to place at best poorly lighted, poorly heated, poorly ventilated, and are nothing more than insanitary makeshifts in which we compel the children of the District of Columbia to attend school. I believe Congress should be interested in this matter, and I believe further that Congress should appropriate sufficient money for the erection of proper public school buildings in all parts of the District of Columbia so that these 6,000 children now on half time and these 3,000 or 4,000 children housed in these poorly ventilated, insanitary, portable buildings, may be put in proper schoolrooms and the makeshifts destroyed.

We also have a situation in the District of Columbia with reference to sewers to which I wish to direct attention.

We have, and the testimony will corroborate my statements, subdivisions in the District of Columbia with 35,000 or 40,000 people living in thickly populated and congested centers without a sewer or a water pipe, and where the outside toilets, or privy closets as they call them, are increasing year by year. There is no justification for a condition of that kind in the Capital City of the great United States, and, further, let me say that these insanitary privy closets which I am talking about, in many instances, because of the seepage from them, have destroyed the only source of water in those neighborhoods, viz, the wells that are located there. Further than that, you should know we appropriate approximately $25,000 a year to empty these privy closets of night soil, as it is termed in the bill, and what is done with this night soil? Is it dumped into the river? Is it cremated as it ought to be in sewage disposal plant or crematory or in any other sanitary way? No; it is not. It is sold to the truck farmers adjacent to the city of Washington and used as fertilizer to grow vegetables which are sold to the people of the District of Columbia. Is it not about time that Congress undertook to put a stop to this insanitary and unjustifiable condition?

Congress has a duty to perform in protecting the health of the people of the city of Washington. Congress should not sit idly by and permit these things to exist. Last year I called attention to the fact that beautiful Rock Creek Park, with that beautiful stream running through it, where you will find signs along its shore, "No bathing, no bathing," and where you will find during the summer months thousands of citizens of Washington and their families eating their dinners every Saturday afternoon and Sunday. I have seen them going to the creek and washing their plates, knives, and forks. And no doubt some of the children, not knowing any different, drink some of the water, and after eating their food their dishes are again washed in Rock Creek, which is an open sewer. That is why children and people are not permitted to bathe in it. No effort is made to eliminate these conditions. Congress, I repeat, should be interested. This House should be interested, and I believe it is about time they should do something of a practical nature to bring about the elimination of these conditions.

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASEY. Yes. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. BYRNS. Is not what the gentleman says more of an indictment of the officials of Washington, who are charged with the expenditure of this money, than of Congress, which makes the appropriation?

Mr. CASEY. In reply to the gentleman from Tennessee let me say that I have been going over the hearings very carefully and tried as best I could to place the responsibility, but in every instance it has led right back to the House of Representatives, because the officials say that they have not sufficient funds, and Congress will not give sufficient funds to eliminate those very bad conditions.

Mr. BYRNS. Now, if the gentleman will pardon me, let me say this: I have in mind a city which has in population over one-third and not quite half of the population of the city of Washington. I happen to know that that city has splendid sewers. It is properly taken care of, and so far as I know there is no particular complaint upon the part of the citizens of that city, and yet I dare say that the annual budget of that city is not one-tenth of that for the city of Washington. Now, I would like to understand why it is that this condition of which the gentleman complains exists, in view of the fact that appropriations are made for the city of Washington which in this particular instance are ten times more than the amount appropriated for the city I have in mind, although that city is over one-third as large as the city of Washington?

Mr. CASEY. Of course, there may be many reasons entering into it which I have not time to discuss. One factor is we set the tax rate here and we limit the expenditure. And in further reply to the gentleman from Tennessee, let me say that I can see no justification for the House of Representatives being bound by the recommendations of the Bureau of the Budget in the passage of this bill for the District of Columbia. I can see the necessity and appreciate the importance of following as closely as we can the recommendations of the Bureau of the Budget in the consideration of all other appropriation bills except this one, because the appropriations in the other bills come out of the Federal Treasury; but for this bill there is a fixed sum, a rigid amount of $9,000,000. If the people of the District of Columbia want to build more schools, want to build more sewers, want to make this city more sanitary and more beautiful, then the people of the District of Columbia ought to be permitted to do it out of the taxes they pay.

They should not be estopped from doing those things—making those very necessary improvements—simply because we will not let them do it. That is no excuse, especially when the money for these improvements comes out of the taxes paid by the citizens of the District of Columbia.

I just want to take a moment or two on the question of the District employees' salaries, and then I have finished. When the bill for the fiscal year 1929 was before the House for its consideration it carried an item of approximately $170,000 for step-ups, as recommended by the Bureau of Efficiency, for the employees of the District doing like work to those in the Federal departments. At that time it was stated on the floor of the House by every member of the subcommittee and also by the report of the committee to the House that this was a 2-year program. The reason for that was that the Bureau of the Budget recommended to Congress in last year's bill an item of approximately $37,000 for necessary step-ups, as provided by law. When the subcommittee looked into the matter we found that instead of $37,000 being sufficient to comply with the law, it took over $340,000. This is the amount which rightfully belonged to these poorly paid employees of the District of Columbia and which had been taken from their pay envelopes—this amount of $340,000 rightfully belonged to these employees and should have, in all fairness, been given to them in the last bill; if this had been done as it should, there would not be any question about it at this time. The experts were put to work on this question, and the more they dug the worse it got.

Finally they arrived at the conclusion that the employees of the District of Columbia were the farthest below the average of their grade of any employees of the Federal Government in the District, or lower than the average in the 33 departments of the Federal Government, with the result that it was agreed that this $340,000 plus rightfully belonged to these employees; but at the suggestion of the distinguished chairman of the committee at that time, our good friend Mr. Madden, a 2-year program was agreed upon, to the effect that approximately half of the amount due these employees would go into last year's bill, with the solemn promise that the other half would go into the bill now before us for our consideration.

That promise has been broken. It is said that the Welch Act took care of this matter. That is not so. The understanding at the time this agreement was arrived at was that there was honestly and justly due the District employees $340,000 plus, and that it should be given to them in order to bring them up to the level of the average of their grade and put them on a comparable basis with the Federal employees in the District of Columbia doing like work, and that if the Welch Act or any other act passed by Congress increased the salaries of the Federal employees and the District employees, that this subsequent increase was to be added to the base pay set for the District employees by the addition of this $340,000.

You are told that since the passage of the last District appropriation bill the salaries of these employees have been increased twice, and in some instances three times, as a justification for keeping out of this bill the $165,000 that rightfully belongs to the employees of the District. They tell you that $500,000 or $700,000 has been added to their pay. But they do not tell you what their minimum salaries are. They do not tell you about the poorly paid employees of the District of Columbia, and that the salaries now paid, with these three increases, have not been brought up to the level of the average of their grade.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. CASEY. I yield myself 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 10 minutes more.

Mr. CASEY. The admission that they had to give these poorly paid employees three increases, to give these employees two or three additional step-ups in the past year, confirms every statement I made on the floor of this House during the consideration of the last bill providing for the expenses of the District of Columbia.

I want to say to you very frankly, my friends, that I sincerely trust a better understanding will be had between Members of this House and the officials and people of the District of Columbia. The people of the District of Columbia want to make these improvements but Congress will not permit them to do so. The responsibility is ours. An increase in taxes of 5 cents would put into the Treasury $600,000 or more per year. An increase of the taxes for the District of Columbia of 10 cents, making the tax rate $1.80 instead of $1.70, would put into the Treasury $1,200,000 which could be used for these improvements.

But it is not necessary to increase the taxes. With the tax rate now set by Congress, not by the people of the District of Columbia, of $1.70, they are able to pay for everything authorized in this bill or in the bill passed last year and still have a surplus which, according to statements made to you this morning, by July 1, 1930, will amount to $10,000,000.

Why should the people of the District of Columbia pay taxes to the extent that after paying for everything authorized by Congress there accumulates in the Treasury $10,000,000, while they have sections or subdivisions of the District without sewers or water mains, while there are 3,500 children housed in these poorly lighted and poorly heated and insanitary portable buildings called schools; while there are 6,000 children in the District of Columbia who are being deprived of an opportunity for an education because of the lack of proper school facilities and are only permited to attend school half time? Congress should look into this matter; it is a very serious question. If it was not so serious, I would be tempted to say it is a farce. But it has gone beyond that. It is a real tragedy, and unless it is corrected I apprehend that some day it will become a national scandal.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY] 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, before referring specifically to two or three objections that have been made to this bill, I feel that I should not allow to pass unnoticed the remarks of the gentleman [Mr. CASEY] who just preceded me with reference to the matter of hearings upon this bill.

During my legislative experience I have always proceeded on the theory that it was my duty to attend a committee hearing, and that if I did not attend that hearing I should not object to what occurred in that meeting; or, if attending the committee hearing and not understanding what was being done, I surely would not voice an objection after the conclusion of the hearing. The members of the subcommittee were notified that this committee would meet on the 3d day of January, and we did meet on that day, and on the completion of the hearing that day we adjourned to a certain hour on the following day; and that proceeding was followed until the hearings were completed, sessions being held generally in the forenoon and in the afternoon. I was present at all of these hearings with the exception of one session, when it was necessary for me to be absent, and I availed myself of the opportunity afforded to ascertain the character of the proceedings of the session which I did not attend.

After the hearings were completed the committee proceeded, page by page, to mark up this bill. The language of the bill was discussed. Certain matters that were subject to a point of order were discussed. The fiscal relations question was discussed. The report of the Bureau of Efficiency was received and discussed. As far as I am concerned, as one member of that committee who attended the sessions of the committee, I have no objection to the manner in which the hearings were had.

Yesterday the gentleman from New York——

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman is leaving that part of his speech, does he mind an interruption?

Mr. HOLADAY. I yield.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am not sure that all Members quite appreciate the pressure under which a subcommittee handling an appropriation bill must work in order to suit the convenience of the House and keep these bills coming before the House in an orderly way. All of the appropriation bills contain many items, each of which requires examination and each of which is examined. In order to complete the hearings in the time that is permitted, get the bill whipped into shape and brought to the House it requires the most intense kind of application on the part of any subcommittee handling one of those bills. Now, as to the nature of the hearings, I have had some contact with the work of the Appropriations Committee for several years and some contact with the character of problems handled by this subcommittee. I want to say I do not believe there has ever been any committee of Congress that has developed the facts of a bill committed to its charge more thoroughly, more acceptably, and more capably than the subcommittee of which the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS] is the chairman and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WELSH], the gentleman from New York, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASEY] are members. The House has in that set of hearings a splendid development of the facts, and I think this subcommittee is entitled to a great deal of credit and commendation for its splendid work instead of any word of criticism.

Mr. HOLADAY. As I started to say, the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] on yesterday, in a somewhat lengthy speech, summed up his objections by asking three questions near the close of his remarks, and I think we may assume that in those three questions were embraced about all of his material objections to the bill. The gentleman who has just preceded me this morning has, in a large part, voiced the same objections.

The first question asked by the gentleman from New York was with reference to the sanitary and sewer conditions of the District of Columbia and especially with reference to outdoor box privies. We must remember that the District of Columbia extends out into the country and we have east of the Anacostia River a territory in which there are living approximately 30,000 people. In great part it is sparsely settled and undeveloped as yet. In that territory there are approximately 3,500 box privies. The hearings of the committee show that to forthwith eliminate all of those privies would cost $40,000,000, for the simple reason that in order to reach a house that may be situated out in the country, perhaps a quarter or a half mile from another house, yet within the District, it would be necessary to install a sewer for that one house. Now, what is being done with reference to the situation? This matter was especially called to the attention of the committee last year by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASEY]. An investigation was made, and this year, as a result of that investigation and in furtherance of the general development of the District, we are starting on a 3-year program for the elimination, so far as it is feasible, of those objectionable features. This 3-year program carries for that purpose $294,000—$70,000 for grading; $130,000 for sewers, and $94,000 for water. We must remember that before sewer connections can be made the streets must be laid out; they must be brought to grade; the water mains must be installed; and then the sewer mains. This territory is being developed by people of limited means. They have gone out of the higher-priced sections of the District and are locating their little homes there and they do not desire, in many cases, that at the present time they be burdened with the additional expense necessary to make their homes modern. But that work is now being carried on under a definite program.

In addition to the $294,000 expressly carried for this purpose, we are carrying an item of $1,475,000 for street repair, grading, and extensions, a part of which will be used in this territory. We are also carrying a general item for the extension and replacement of water mains of $320,000, a part of which will be used in this territory. We are also carrying an item of $600,000 for suburban sewers, practically all of which will be used in this territory. So the House should understand that the committee has not been negligent in this matter, but is proceeding with a well-defined program that will gradually eliminate these undesirable features.

The second question was with reference to the sewage conditions in Rock Creek Park. I am going to read to you a half page of the hearings. The gentleman from Pennsylvania undoubtedly will recall this, because this was the day on which he was present. I am now reading from page 192 of the hearings. This question was asked by Mr. CASEY:

What, if anything, has been done toward eliminating the sewage from Rock Creek?

This answer was made by Mr. Gordon, the head of the sewer department:

Nothing, except that a rather detailed report has been prepared by me, which report might be of interest to you. I am bringing out very clearly in this report the fact that the pollution in Rock Creek is probably from 95 to 99 per cent from Maryland and but 1 to 5 per cent from the District of Columbia, and that to remove this 1 to 5 per cent pollution that might be contributed by the District we would have to spend about $6,000,000.

The committee did not include the item of $6,000,000 for the removal of from 1 to 5 per cent of this sewage, because we did not think it was a feasible and proper expenditure:

Mr. SIMMONS. Is Maryland making any effort to remove its part of the pollution?

Mr. GORDON. They are making an effort to remove certain portions of it. There was created the Washington Suburban Sanitary District, embracing portions of the counties adjacent to the District of Columbia, and the commissioners of this sanitary district are empowered to sell bonds and levy assessments for the purpose of extending the sewer system in the sanitary district, and they are doing this. The Washington Suburban Sanitary District embraces about one-third of the drainage area of Rock Creek lying outside of the District. In other words, about 19 per cent of the entire drainage area of Rock Creek lies within the District and 81 per cent lies outside of the District. Of that 81 per cent, one-third is gradually having sewers installed by the Washington Suburban Sanitary Commissioners. This leaves about 55 per cent of the entire drainage area of Rock Creek, in which there are a number of growing communities, which will continue to pollute this stream.

The third question asked by the gentleman yesterday, and also mentioned by the gentleman from Pennsylvania this morning, was with reference to the school situation. Very recently Doctor Ballou, the superintendent of schools, furnished a report as of the date of November 1, 1928, in which he gave an itemized statement of the condition of school facilities and what was necessary to bring our school facilities 100 per cent up to date so that no new facilities would be needed. He lists the additional schoolrooms that are necessary to eliminate portables, 66; to eliminate rented quarters, 19; to eliminate undesirable rooms, 16.

Let me say here that those undesirable rooms are not all in one building, but they may be in a building that is in very good shape except that under pressure they are using one room or a hall or something of that kind that is not for the best interests. There are 16 in that class. To reduce oversized classes, 37; to eliminate part-time classes, 83; or a total of 221 rooms that are necessary.

Then he also sets forth a list of 90 rooms that should be, some time in the near future, abandoned, making a total of 341 rooms, of which 251 are recommended for immediate abandonment.

Now, remember, this is the report of the superintendent of schools, stating what is needed to bring the school system, so far as the housing facilities are concerned, up to 100 per cent, and this is all that is needed.

Now, what are we doing? Remember, this report was of November 1, 1928, and we needed 251 rooms.

School buildings that were opened between November 1, 1928, and January 17 this present month numbered 73 rooms.

Buildings appropriated for, plans now being drawn, or buildings under construction, 132 rooms.

This makes a total of rooms that have already been opened since the 1st of November or that are now under construction or that plans are being prepared for 205.

This bill carries additional buildings with a seating capacity for 3,343, or, at the usual average per room, 83 rooms.

So, when this bill is passed, with the rooms provided for in this bill, the rooms that are now under construction, and the rooms that have been opened since the 1st of November, we will have an additional 283 rooms, when the superintendent of schools has stated that it is only necessary that we have 251.

Let me now explain one other feature. Here is an item, for instance, of 66 portable rooms and an item of 16 rented rooms.

We find this condition: There is a new building constructed, we will say, of 16 rooms. When it is opened up it is 80 per cent filled. Gradually as two or three years pass by it reaches its maximum capacity, and then it begins to break over a little. It may be a building the normal capacity of which is 2,000, but it is breaking over, and it has an extra 100. This accounts for the oversized classes. We have 37 of them.

It may be that these oversized classes are one or two oversized—maybe six or eight—but it is not a feasible or an economical proposition to construct a new room to furnish accommodations for the one or two that come immediately at the break over.

So we will find that even with all the rooms constructed that we have now planned for we will continue, no doubt, to have here and there oversized classes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. HOLADAY. You may find in one building undersized classes, but across the city in another building there will be some oversized classes, because it is not feasible to take these children that distance and put them in the other school.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HOLADAY. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. How does the gentleman answer the question propounded by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASEY], who wants to know why we should not go along more rapidly in respect of the matter of sewers and water and schools, inasmuch as there is such a large surplus being accumulated to the credit of the District of Columbia?

Mr. HOLADAY. We are using up that surplus. We are going on with the schools as fast as the school board is presenting its plans for new rooms. We even urged them to go a little faster, and we hope, I may say, to provide in the deficiency bill a provision for another building. The school board did not have their plans prepared with reference to the location of the building on account of certain conditions in relation to the location of white and colored schools.

On the whole, I think the city schools of Washington to-day are in better shape than they have been in many years, and that they are on a basis that will compare very favorably with the schools of any of our other cities. [Applause.]

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including an article by J. Ramsay McDonald, ex-Premier of Great Britain, on the relations between America and England, which appears in the current number of the Nation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I insert an article by J. Ramsay MacDonald, ex-Premier of Great Britain, on the relations between America and Great Britain.

The article is as follows:

AMERICA AND ENGLAND

By J. Ramsay MacDonald

LONDON, January 10.

The relations between the United States and Great Britain grow increasingly unhappy. The usual committees of friendship are being formed—always an ominous sign, and the usual signals of a faith in doubt are being flown, such as: "War between the United States and Great Britain is unthinkable." When I hear that I am reminded of the sailor who in dire peril expressed a thankfulness that his religion was still left. The plain fact is that a spirit is growing up in the two countries which is estranging them, and is encouraging a kind of squabbling criticism which destroys mutual understanding and forbearance. It is very curious that the behavior of young creatures in nurseries so often illustrates that of nations toward each other. What each of nations requires at this moment is a good robust call from manly common sense.

One type of mind is peculiarly pernicious in such circumstances, that of the apostle of the inevitable. It has an alluring air of detachment, and yet of stoical submission to the decrees of Providence. To-day it murmurs as in a drowsy trance that great economic empires have always clashed and fought, that capitalist competition has always brought armaments competition, and that that in turn has always brought war. Therefore all that the United States and ourselves can do is to go on temporarily with our struggle for markets and rivalry for possession of furniture and old masters, and wait for the inevitable clash and crash decreed since the beginning of the world. Against this superstition and misreading of history every backboned sentiment of morality and common sense must be up in arms. Given governments which have minds to form rational policies, and a public opinion which represents an active will and is not merely a spill drifting upon the currents, war is no more inevitable than the smallpox, and the causes of war are just as controllable as insanitary conditions.

The European war left for the United States and England times full of petty irritation. The burdens of debt, revolutions in industry and in world markets, the problems of political readjustment in a world which has undergone more change than people really imagine, and, in some respects, the even more difficult mental readjustments that are called for are not good for an equable temper. And when we come down to actual business, we find ourselves still more immersed in the strangeness of the change which has taken place. The whole world to-day is calling for peace and security against war, and when a simple declaration against war which avoids every practical difficulty is put before the world, the world hails it with acclamation, signs it—and relapses. To those of us who believe that to bring the nations out of the war age is the divine task of this generation, the temptation to lapse into cynicism rather than continue in an energetic faith is very great when we find that armament expansion both in Europe and America has been decreed by the same hands and the same pens as signed a solemn bond to eliminate forever the consideration of war from national policies. There is something wrong somewhere. Somehow, the distinction in Christian conduct between Sunday and the rest of the week seems to be creeping into international policies.

The first reflection which we are apt to make on such a situation is that some nation other than our own is perfidious. That has the demerit of leading us nowhere except up the dangerous way of self-appreciation and it also happens to be inadequate as an explanation. The fact is that every nation is rent between two opposing and hostile moods. Everyone wants peace, but no one will accept and pursue a policy based upon peace assumptions. The practical policy of the United States and Great Britain is exactly the same as that which preceded and prepared for the late war. Let us both get to close grips with reality. We have gone to Geneva to discuss naval armament, and we have both sent naval officers to do the negotiating. Both of us have begun with the assumption that war, involving our interests and safety, may break out. The duty of a naval officer is not to make peace, but to safeguard his nation's interests in time of trouble, and both you and we have an admirably able and honest body of men to advise us on that matter. At Geneva, it was not our mutual desire for peace that failed; it was not the impossibility of a peace policy that was demonstrated. It was a much simpler and very obvious thing. It was that, in the event of a war which brought us into conflict with each other, or that brought us separately into the strife, the naval arm that the United States would require for security would not be the same as that which England would require for security; that, indeed, if either the United States or England thought of security in relation to the hostility of each other, both of us would have to increase rather than diminish our shipbuilding. That was all that the Geneva failure proved. Was it really worth while going to Geneva for that purpose? Admirals as naval negotiators could not do other than bring out that obvious fact, and their negotiations could only expose the obvious. Then English papers and American started their fusillades. They missed completely the reason for the failure, and in good old-fashioned style went for the other side hammer and tongs. You patted yourselves on the back, kicked us, and we did exactly the same on our part; and the Atlantic became broader far and more stormy for both of us.

Then came our military—not only naval—agreement with France. For that I have nothing to say except that it illustrates the bungling of so much of our present Government's foreign policy. I do not believe that it was directed against the United States. It was simply stupid. It sacrificed our own national interests far more than it menaced yours. The country, irrespective of party, rose up and, following the lead of the Labor Party, rejected it. It would be highly improper for me to pass any opinion on the new American cruiser program; if I did so, it would quite properly be resented. But I may be allowed, as an outsider who is greatly concerned with the moral authority which every great State must possess if we are to secure the conditions of a world's peace, to say that the execution of that program will be a great blow to the Nation from which the Kellogg pact originated. You may consider it necessary to face that; but, make no mistake, the result will be the same as though my country had not declined to countenance the Anglo-French agreement. People will say: "Oh, yes; they boast of their declaration denying that war is to be a consideration in national policy, and with a simultaneous voice vote for a larger Navy," and if men can say that, it will be a bad thing for every movement seeking to establish a world peace.

Here in Europe those of us who are devoting our lives to the elimination of war from the national records of the times to come are nearer to the frontiers from which war alarms come than you are in America, and we, therefore, see phrases and words with a meaning in realistic policy somewhat different from the meaning you see in them. But we know that with America indifferent, or neutral, or pursuing its own way, our tasks are to be heavy and our defeat is to be more possible. Therefore it is imperative that steps be taken at once to end all this foolish and mischievous feeling which is alienating the United States from Great Britain.

The first thing to be done is to bring to a common table for discussion the reasons why ships are being built, why we both went to Geneva with the assumption we did, why we are thinking of trade routes being blocked, what there is between us that for immediate policy, newspaper writing, and political electioneering makes the Kellogg pact a mere collection of words strung upon a pious thread. The task of the statesmen is to make impossible the conditions upon which the masters of naval strategy spend their efforts. Why do not the statesmen act? If they are acting, why do they not give us comfort by informing us that they are? Is no attempt to be made, is none being made, to clear up the confusion of "the freedom of the seas"?

Has neither of us the courage to discuss with the other what the interests and obligations of both are in, and to, the world and each other? Have both of us failed to observe how easy it is for nations to slip into war for nothing, how ready popular imagination is to be set on fire by anyone—even an almost anonymous newspaper proprietor—who cares to light a match? This is no case for private and unofficial action and conferences. The governments must act. Both countries ought to appoint five or six of their most outstanding public men representative of the whole nation to meet and drag from the obscure corners of sulky suspicion the things which make difficulties between us. Let us know them. Mayhap fresh air would clean our minds of them. Governments are timorous, and if this be too solemn a proceeding for them to support, let them do something themselves, only we should like to be assured that they are aware of the mighty issues involved in a lack of real good will and confidence between the United States and Great Britain. No staging is too impressive for the importance of friendship between us, no pageantry too extravagant for the proclamation that difficulties have been removed. I want to involve the United States in no European escapade and no entanglements. It ought to praise its Creator night and day that that necessity is not imposed upon it, as it is, alas! upon us. But those of us whose lot is cast here, and whose fate it is to struggle against the powers of militarism which have been wounded but certainly not killed in the late war, should like to feel that an American hand will always be placed in ours for encouragement, and that the relations between your country and mine can be held up to the world as an example of what we are striving to establish everywhere.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to-day shows that $24,000,000 has been added to the deficiency bill for increasing the prohibition enforcement force, or such part thereof as the President may deem useful, to be allocated by the President as he may see fit to the departments or bureaus charged with the enforcement of the national prohibition act and to remain available until June 30, 1930. This is the first step toward an annual expenditure of about $250,000,000 and an expenditure of over $1,000,000,000 before the American people will be convinced that the prohibition law simply can not be enforced. Prohibition will be successful when fermentation can be stopped by an act of Congress.

In the meantime friends of prohibition can not escape the responsibility of accepting appropriations and making an honest attempt to enforce the law.

The letter from Secretary Mellon to the Senator from Wyoming does not describe fully actual conditions. The Secretary of the Treasury, to whose department the enforcement of prohibition is intrusted, either seeks to avoid responsibility or else has not the courage to frankly state to the American people his conclusions after 10 years of prohibition. Mr. Mellon, like everyone else in this country, must know that the attempted enforcement has been nothing short of a farce and a complete failure. More than five years ago I stated to the House that it would take over $250,000,000 to commence to enforce prohibition. This estimate has been verified in the light of the experience of the past five years and the admission of Treasury Department officials.

After 10 years' experience the Treasury Department surely is in a position to know how it can at least commence to make a beginning at an attempt to enforce prohibition. If Secretary Mellon had been frank and honest about it, he would have stated that with $25,000,000 or $200,000,000 more the results would be about the same. Yet he should be able to immediately allocate additional funds and attempt to carry out the law to the extent that it is humanly and financially possible. His letter to the Senator from Georgia is evasive. He talks about the courts being congested. He seems to me to miss the point entirely that the additional funds can be used by him as a prevention to the commission of crime and not only for punitive purposes. In order that it might not be said that I am indulging in general criticism, I have prepared a tentative allocation of the $24,000,000 in such a way as to make a real test at strategic points of the bootleg industry and so assign the force as to prevent violations of the prohibition law rather than bringing in thousands of cases for the trivial offense of having a pint of liquor in possession. Mr. Mellon suggests a "thoroughgoing survey of the entire field." With that in mind I submit to Mr. Mellon and the Treasury Department the following suggestions:

One of the points which has been the source of wholesale importation where enforcement has been so feeble as to be ridiculous is the port of Detroit. At this point a sufficiently strong force of men must be assigned to create a blockade. Importation of liquor in or about Detroit has grown to be an established industry running into millions and millions of dollars. About 50 men have been assigned by the Treasury Department for the Detroit district where thousands are employed in the export, import, and transportation of liquor. Now, here is the plan for Detroit.

The strategic points on the Canadian side are Riverside, Ford City, Walkerville, Windsor, Sandwich, Ojibway, and La Salle. These are the principal bases of operation. It is necessary to place a patrol watching each one of these points, as follows: I am taking a minimum force of 30 men, which next year would have to be increased:

Riverside, 30 men (3 platoons equals 90 men); Ford City, 30 men (3 platoons equals 90 men); Walkerville, 30 men (3 platoons equals 90 men); Windsor, 30 men (3 platoons equals 90 men); Sandwich, 30 men (3 platoons equals 90 men); Ojibway, 30 men (3 platoons equals 90 men); La Salle, 30 men (3 platoons equals 90 men); roving patrol for Detroit district, 50 men; total additional force, at $3,000 per year (680 men)	$2,040,000
9 senior officers for this force, at $4,000 a year	63,000
1 commanding field officer	5,000
20 patrol boats	120,000
40 motor-boat men, at $2,000	80,000
Total for Detroit additional force	2,308,000

Experience has demonstrated that men exposed to patrol duty of this kind day after day should be worked in platoons of eight hours a day. It is necessary to have three platoons and a patrol on duty all of the time inasmuch as rum runners do not adhere to union schedule of hours and are on the job all the time. From past experience also it has been learned that fairly good pay must be provided. The men are in constant and daily temptations of bribe and corruption running into big figures. For this kind of work no less than $3,000 a year should be paid unless, of course, the Government desires to turn their enforcement forces into protection patrols for the rum runners. I want to make it clear that the assignment of this force, large as it may seem, will not stop the smuggling of liquor from Canada. It will show how difficult, costly, and impossible the problem is.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM E. HULL. You have not provided anything to pay the men who are to watch these 30 men. [Laughter.]

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is for next year. We will come to that later.

The next spot where additional force is required in order to prevent violations is in and about the so-called denaturing plants. There are 82 denaturing plants in the United States. In 1928 no less than 159,689,378 proof gallons of alcohol were withdrawn for the purpose of being completely or specially denatured. To give an idea how this denaturing business has grown, it is only necessary to state that in 1907, 3,084,950 proof gallons of alcohol were withdrawn for that purpose. No matter who may be operating these denaturing plants, no matter how much they might have been investigated, no matter what supervision may be exercised over them at this time, the fact remains that this original source is not sufficiently controlled and supervised, and that there is an enormous leakage and diversion from this source. Honest plants will not complain of more rigid supervision. The others we need not worry about. Later on it will be necessary to increase the force, but for the present the department can start by assigning to each of these plants six additional men, as follows:

6 additional men to each plant (3 shifts equals 18 men for each plant); 82 plants times 18 equals 1,476 men, at $3,000	$4,428,000
6 supervisors, at $4,000	24,000
10 accountant-auditors, at $5,000	50,000
Total additional force, denaturing plants	4,502,000

These men can work under direct command of the zone administrators, and the supervisors would be used to check up on the men on a constant tour of inspection. The need of accountant-auditors is very important. While the men at the plant can physically watch operations, a great deal of the diversion is carried on by well-covered and seemingly honest business transactions. Auditors would have to check up on the raw material, follow the sales, verify destination, and in that way prevent covered diversions. There is so much at stake in this department that it would be unsafe to pay the employees any less than suggested.

BREWERIES

Last year there were about 308 breweries licensed to manufacture near beer. This number has now been reduced to 275. Everyone watching conditions knows that beer is flowing out of the kegs as fast as the law of gravitation will permit. This is especially true in Pennsylvania. The supervision at the licensed beer plants is apparently not sufficient. While some agents have been planted outside of breweries for a few hours a day, the work has been most ineffective. At least two additional men should be permanently placed at each plant manufacturing near beer. Of course, these men would also have to work in three shifts of eight hours each. This would be six men for each plant.

275 breweries times 6 men equals 1,650 men, at $3,000 a year	$4,950,000
10 accountant auditors for same services enumerated for denaturing plants above, at $4,000	40,000
20 chemists, at $5,000	100,000
Total additional brewery force	5,090,000

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. What amount of real beer does the gentleman say is sold in Pennsylvania, and where is it?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In Philadelphia, Scranton, Wilkes-Barre, and all through.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. The gentleman does not mean to say that high-power beer is sold in large quantities in the city of Philadelphia?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes; I do.

Mr. WELSH of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is mistaken in his information.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will take the gentleman in his own home town and we will go this week-end. [Laughter.]

I am assuming that recent reports from the Treasury Department and the Prohibition Division relative to the beer squads are correct and that these squads are functioning efficiently. Therefore I provided no additional force for the wildcat breweries and unlawful plants.

We now come to another source of diversion. The 82 denaturing plants deliver industrial alcohol to no less than 4,447 permittees, who may lawfully withdraw this denatured alcohol for ostensibly lawful purposes. It is these 4,447 manufacturers that use the millions of gallons of alcohol that the denaturing plants are supposed to provide. Many of the formulas are susceptible of being cooked and the poison partially taken out. At any rate, the fact remains that great quantities of denatured alcohol are diverted from its legitimate use and put into beverages. A greater part of these plants—I would say over 90 per cent of these plants—are without any supervision to speak of. Once in a while the perfunctory check up is made. If I were to suggest but 2 men to each plant working on a three-shift plan, that would require 26,682 men. I say now that if prohibition is to continue, the Government will be compelled to employ over 25,000 men to physically watch the operation of these four thousand-odd plants in order to prevent diversion. Now, instead of providing the full 26,682 men, I would take but one-fifth of that force. That will permit the four out of five permittees to continue their operation unchecked and uncontrolled. I repeat that the supervision now over these plants amount to nothing, and surely constitutes very little, if any, control. Here, too, we require a large force of accountant auditors. Perfume and soap houses sell to retailers and consumers who never receive an ounce of the products. It is all a bookkeeping fraud. Accountants will be able to follow up each sale, obtain canceled vouchers, and completely break up the system. By providing a force of 4,000 men, that would permit of less than one man for each plant. If plants are to be properly covered, it would permit the department to properly supervise but 366 of the 4,447 plants. By that I mean keeping the two men on the job throughout the day and night. Surely covering 366 plants out of 4,447 can not be said to be an unreasonable and wild estimate in order to ridicule the proposition; but just watch the cost:

4,000 men, at $3,000, is	$12,000,000
100 accountant auditors, at $4,000	400,000
25 supervising officers, at $4,000	100,000
Total for additional supervision of permittee manufacturers using denatured alcohol	12,500,000

So much for the general proposition of building a skeleton force, and my estimates here are simply for a skeleton force which will have to be increased each year as I have previously indicated.

Now, something ought to be done as an experiment to curtail the constantly increasing number of illicit stills. It would be impossible to start in the 48 States at one time. Although I believe that when the Government will start to suppress production of alcohol in all of the States, and will enforce the law particularly in the dry States, with the same annoyance, persistence, graft, and corruption that is now being carried on in some of the large centers of the country, there will be such a protest and such a wholesale conversion of drys to the wet cause as to bring about a speedy and sensible adjustment of this vexing question.

To get back to the estimates, I have chosen two States in which the experiment for the coming year might be tried. This honor should go, of course, to the State of the gentleman who championed this increased appropriation; that is the State of Georgia. For the other State I have selected the Western State of Idaho.

I have taken these States and divided them into zones of 500 square miles, and have taken as a basis 10 Federal agents for every 500 square miles. No military authority or police officer would accept a mission of patrolling or policing 500 square miles with 10 men. I knew that if I took the normal number of men required to properly patrol a State in order to suppress illicit stills, manufacturers of liquor, and the transportation of liquor, in accordance with accepted military or police formulas, the figures would be so large as to cause me to be immediately charged by my dry friends and dry colleagues with purposely distorting the proposition by the use of exaggerated figures. There are 59,265 square miles in the State of Georgia. That would provide about 110 zones. Allowing 10 men to a zone will bring it up to 1,110 men.

While, of course, a great part of the State is totally unpopulated, where no patrolling is required, this would permit of the shifting of men and increasing the patrols in the centers of population and in the zones where topography of the land is mountainous and difficult. Half of these men would necessarily have to be mounted. That would require the purchase of 500 horses and their maintenance and upkeep. Five hundred horses, at $165 a horse, the price paid for horses by the Army, $82,500. It would cost to stable and keep these horses about $12,500 a year. One thousand one hundred and ten men, at $2,500 a year, would be $2,750,000. Command of these men would add $50,000 more, making a total, not counting cost of the horses, $2,812,500. On the same basis, it would cost to put a small experimental Federal force in the State of Idaho, with its 83,888 square miles, excluding the cost of the horses, $4,240,000.

To summarize, without the cost of the force in Georgia and Idaho, but simply partially reenforcing supervision and doing only preventive work would require under the most conservative figures that I have given $24,400,000. If we add the two State experiments, it would bring an additional $6,252,500, or a total of $30,652,500. Now, I want to call attention to the fact that this does not take into consideration the patrolling of a single foot of Atlantic or Pacific or Gulf coasts. It would require thousands of men to prevent rum running along the Atlantic, Pacific, and Gulf coasts. Taking the eastern coast of Florida alone, with its 400 miles of eastern coast, would require a force of over 1,500 men. It would take right now, that the season is on at Miami and Palm Beach, a force of 750 men to simply prevent the daily importations for the daily consumption of those two fashionable resorts.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. GIBSON. Does the gentleman's scheme contemplate the patrolling of the northern border and the southern border?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, we will have to do that gradually. This is only to absorb the $24,000,000 offered by the other branch of Congress.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman is an authority on the prohibition question. Does he not think that this Congress should enact legislation which will prevent the foreign diplomats from importing intoxicating liquors? If the gentleman will look at last night's Washington Star he will see that the police attempted to confiscate a truck load of 800 quarts consigned to the French Embassy, but were prevented because it is held that the prohibition law does not apply to foreign diplomats. Why should foreigners in the diplomatic service be permitted to have hard liquor when the working men of this country can not have 2¾ per cent beer?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Eight hundred quarts of what?

Mr. SCHAFER. Hard liquor.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The same conditions exist all along the coast, whether east, west, or south. If next year $25,000,000 more is added, it might be possible to build up the skeleton force for the coast patrol. Gentlemen, it is going to be costly to convince some of you that you are dealing with an impossible proposition. I hope that every dry will carefully observe prohibition enforcement in order to convince himself that no matter how many millions of dollars we appropriate, it will not be possible to stop the traffic in liquor and the use of alcoholic beverages. Millions of gallons of liquor are consumed in this country every month. Gentlemen, bear in mind, that we have this enormous traffic in liquor not because we have thousands of bootleggers but because we have millions of consumers. [Applause.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen of the House, I want to refer briefly to an occurrence in the House last Monday when the Consent Calendar was under consideration. I refer particularly to the colloquy had in respect to Senate bill No. 1462, when the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SUMMERS] was questioned as to the then present consideration of the bill by the gentleman from Utah [Mr. LEATHERWOOD], the gentleman from Utah asking the gentleman from Washington whether or not if the bill went over to the next consent day it would be called up for consideration later on. The answer was that it would be, and, if necessary, it was implied, that the bill would be considered under suspension of the rules.

I want to direct your attention for a few moments now as regards the question of expending the public money for reclamation projects in amounts such as are now taking place and as are apparently in immediate contemplation. It seems to me that it is very pertinent in connection with the problem for which the extra session of Congress is being urged, namely, the consideration of farm relief legislation and the tariff. Certain it is in my mind, if these lavish expenditures are to be continued to reclaim additional lands for the purpose of increasing agricultural production, when the Congress is being called upon to finance surplus production it is time that we paid some very definite attention to the details of these various projects and understand the economic effect that such action has on the country as a whole.

Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the question, Should the Government now, under the circumstances, undertake reclamation of any additional lands?

In considering this matter let us briefly review the present status of Government reclamation work as reflected in official reports. Since creation of the Bureau of Reclamation, the Government has expended down to June 30, 1927, a total of $183,887,241 reclaiming so-called desert lands. In 1927 the irrigable area of projects built by the Government was 1,956,910 acres, an increase of 112,360 over that of 1926. The gross value of crops grown on these projects in 1927 was $72,047,200, an increase of $11,677,580, compared with 1926. In addition to the above areas, the Government's reclamation projects supplied, under the Warren Act, water to 1,482,950 acres in 1927, an increase over the previous year of 153,930 acres. The gross value of crops grown on this Warren Act land was $61,160,010, an increase of $11,409,970 over that of the previous year. From the foregoing it will be observed that the total value of crops grown in 1928 on the 3,439,860 acres of irrigated land, furnished with water from the works of the Bureau of Reclamation, was $133,207,210, an increase of $23,087,550 compared with 1926. In 1927 the Government appropriated for construction the sum of $9,869,000, compared with $4,443,000 the previous year, both figures exclusive of reappropriations. During 1927 there was expended on construction $6,966,449, compared with $5,189,025 of the previous year. All works now under construction involve a further ultimate expenditure of $90,000,000.

During the year the Guernsey Dam on the North Platte was completed; the Stony Gorge Dam on the Orland project in California was 90 per cent completed; the Gibson Dam on the Sun River project in Montana was 50 per cent completed; the work was under way on the construction of the Echo Dam under the Salt Lake Basin project in Utah, and on the Easton Diversion Dam, and other works of the Yakima project in Washington; preliminary work was begun on the Harper Diversion Dam and other structures on the Vale project in Oregon; contract was awarded and preliminary work begun on the structures of the Owyhee Dam, under the project of that name in Oregon. This last-named dam, when completed, will be the highest dam in the world, 43 feet higher that the 362-foot Schraeh Dam in Switzerland. The estimated cost of this Owyhee Dam is $5,378,125. The estimated cost of the dams and structures above mentioned, either completed or under way in 1927, is approximately $11,000,000.

The Crisp bill, H. R. 8221, contemplates expenditure of $10,000,000 in the purchase of "swamp, cut-over, neglected, abandoned, or poorly farmed land" in 10 Southern States, and in the creation therefrom of not less than 2,000 demonstration farms to aid, so we are told, in the settlement of waste lands. The Columbia Basin bill, S. 1462, contemplates irrigation of 1,833,000 acres at preliminary cost estimate for construction of works of not less than $315,000,000.

Twenty-four Government reclamation projects are already in operation, with the products therefrom competing with those of agriculture produced from lands privately reclaimed.

This Government reclamation work has always been under the control of the Department of the Interior. The historical policy of the Department of the Interior has been to dispose of more lands to settlers. Under existing conditions the policy of the Department of Agriculture is to advise the curtailment of new land settlement and production of more crops—especially of those whereof we annually create a surplus. Is it sane for this Government to induce settlement of raw lands for further production at a time when it is urged that because of surpluses year after year the market prices for staple crops have been ruined? As a matter of fact, it is well known that for a long time past new settlers which the Government have been able to induce to occupy raw lands under these reclamation projects have mostly been either those little versed in farming pioneering or those who have through many inferences, and not a few positive relief acts of the Government, been led to believe that eventually the cost of reclamation charged against them will be canceled. The adjustment and relief furnished these settlers in the last fiscal year amounted to the sum of $5,613,750.36. For 15 years the Bureau of Reclamation has been struggling with little success to secure settlers on the Milk River, Lower Yellowstone, the Belle Fourche, and some of the other projects. In the 1928 Annual Report of the Secretary of the Interior appears the following with reference to the Milk River project:

> Efforts to secure settlers for unimproved land have failed. * * * The urgent need of this project is to secure more good farmers and place them on partially improved farms under conditions where they will succeed.

In the same report, referring to the Lower Yellowstone project, the Secretary states:

> It has been found almost impossible to dispose of any unimproved farms without buildings. * * * The urgent need is for creation of an agency which will make and finance these needed improvements on long terms and at a low rate of interest. * * * Those who have unimproved farms and who are in the greatest need of assistance can not get Federal aid.

In the same report, referring to the Belle Fourche project, the Secretary reports an increase of—

> Sixty-two resident operators over the low point of 1925. * * * These newcomers are principally tenants.

One of the objects of the Government undertaking reclamation work was to give the poor but worthy and aspiring farmer an opportunity to become a landowner, but apparently the conditions surrounding the reclamation efforts of the Government have all conspired to produce an increasing tenantry, instead of ownership. Thus, in 1927, we find that 39 per cent of the farms in the Yuma project were cultivated by tenants; that of the 1,768 irrigated farms under the Uncompahgre project in Colorado, 850 were cultivated by owners and 918 by tenants; that of the 182 irrigated farms in the King Hill project in Idaho, 121 were farmed by owners and 61 by tenants; that over 40 per cent of the farms under the Boise project were cultivated by tenants, and that tenancy in the Minidoka project increased from 41 to 44 per cent; that of the 584 cultivated farms under the Huntley project in Montana, 309 were cultivated last year by owners and 275 by tenants; of the 500 farms cultivated last year under the Milk River project, 262 were operated by owners or managers for owners and 238 by tenants; that under the Lower Yellowstone project, farm owners cultivated 270 farms and tenants 332; that under the Carlsbad project in New Mexico, 288 farms were cultivated by owners and 137 by tenants; that of the 4,669 farms in the Rio Grande project in 1927, 2,901 were operated by owners and 1,768 by tenants; that under the Shoshone project in Wyoming, 343 units were farmed by owners and 241 by tenants, and so forth.

Moreover, already it has come to pass that thousands of allotted units under the various projects can not be advanced further for lack of settlers with capital for needed building improvements, operation, and so forth. Thus, under the Belle Fourche project, 400 farms, according to the Secretary of the Interior, need building improvements before settlement can advance further, and quoting his words:

> To accomplish desired results a credit fund of $500,000 should be made available for these Belle Fourche project landowners for construction purposes. No money is available in this vicinity for real-estate loans, and short-time bank loans are made only on productive livestock at 10 per cent interest.

In all these cases, the Government having induced the settlement, what is the duty of the Government toward these settlers? And what should be the policy of this Government to avoid in the future recurrence of these positions, where the settlers demand and procure no interest charges under their purchase contracts, reduction of principal price, delays in making first payments, longer periods of amortization, and so forth? In his 1928 annual report the Secretary of the Interior states:

> Few settlers have the capital required to convert a tract of raw land into a productive farm, the cost of improving, equipping, and operating farms having doubled in recent years. Hence the bureau is seeking a better type of farmer with more capital and skill.

It has seemingly now become the policy of the Bureau of Reclamation to desire to incorporate as a part of construction costs the preparation for immediate farming of at least part of the lands comprising the different units; that is, to clear and level such lands, and so forth. Such a step is reported as in accord with the recommendations of the different economic boards appointed to consider these newer projects.

These boards make land classifications, determine the size of farms, work out a program of agriculture adapted to the climate and soil, investigate cost of clearing, leveling and preparing land for irrigation, make estimates of costs of buildings, fences, livestock, and farm equipment for minimum requirements, and also estimates of operating expenses and farm income; but when all is said and done, and representations as inducements to settlers to purchase have been made, based upon the findings of these boards, it would appear that at least in several instances, were the Government an individual and had it as an individual promoter utilized United States mails for the making of such representations, it would have been subject to prosecution for the use of the mails to defraud. Such are the repeated reports from many settlers.

And has the poor but worthy farmer a chance under these new projects? Dr. Alvin Johnson, recently employed by the Bureau of Reclamation as a social and economic expert, says concerning settlers' conditions under one of the later projects:

> What they have now, what the bounty of the Government has given them, is only a Chinaman's chance—i. e., they have a chance, by subjecting themselves and their wives and children to a Chinese standard of living through four or five years, to come into the birthright of ordinary American citizens—an American standard of living.

Some time ago Congress was driven to the point where it prescribed as a condition precedent to the making of an allotment the possession by the contemplating settler of $2,000 in cash or its equivalent in livestock and equipment. Do these projects now being constructed or those contemplated in pending legislation offer possibility of success to a settler thus equipped? As an example, let us consider this big new Owyhee project. There the economic board reported that a settler with $2,500 capital could not succeed with even as small an allotment as 40 acres; that even were a settler with $2,500 placed on a 40-acre tract wholly cleared and one-half planted to perennial legumes he could succeed only with the aid of the land bank. And it is well known there is no Federal aid for the settler who finds himself thus situated.

No wonder that even though the Reclamation Bureau should now go into the business, added to its other undertakings, of clearing and leveling the land, or go so far as to plant a part of the land, the great difficulty of securing settlers would still exist. This bureau employs competent agents trained in settlement work and the science of irrigation farming, but they can not find these settlers who have, as they should have, according to the findings of these economic boards, from $7,500 to $10,000 to develop a 40-acre dairy tract.

It may be all right for the Congress to say that settlers with $2,000 in capital may be allotted units in these projects, but where can these settlers borrow an additional $5,500 to $8,000 to bring the smallest of these tracts into production? The Federal land bank makes loans only on developed farms from which the income is immediate and assured. Local banks can not make long-time loans. The director of reclamation economics of the Bureau of Reclamation in an address before the Oregon Reclamation Congress at Salem, Oreg., on November 15 last, stated:

> No one is optimistic enough to believe that settlers can be secured with from $5,000 to $7,500 in sufficient numbers to settle these large areas of unimproved land rapidly enough to pay operation and maintenance charges and construction charges which will follow soon after the construction of irrigation works.

There is no hope for State aid because investigation shows that in most States there are constitutional prohibitions against the giving of aid of such a nature, although experience has shown that the States wherein these projects are located are the chief beneficiaries of the Government's expenditures; that these nearly worthless desert lands, producing little or no taxes, are upon reclamation and settlement taxed locally upon high assessed valuations.

The value of the Government's lien on the lands in these projects depends wholly on settlement. In a farm-depression crisis like the present, shall the Government which has thus unwittingly gotten into business, proceed to settle this land effectively and create competing crops, by forgiving debts, delaying initial settlements, prolonging amortization periods, and so forth?

But what shall be said of a contemplated undertaking like that mentioned above in the Columbia River Basin, which involves an outlay equal to twice the total sum expended to date on all other projects put together—a sum squal to the structural costs of the Panama Canal? No matter what may be said as to the length of time involved in the construction of these great contemplated works, there can be no argument that at the end of such a period the lands thereunder will be required for production. The quickness with which pasture lands and cut-over wood lots responded to the war demands for production taught us that unless it can be vouchsafed there will be a huge demand for exports, we have nothing to fear from scarcity of supply for our normally increasing domestic population.

From time to time, there have been more or less half-hearted efforts made to stop this orgy of expenditures through the Bureau of Reclamation, but action taken has always been insufficient. Only the other day, the new Secretary of the Interior approved a large item of expenditure for new construction under an Idaho project involving creation of a power plant. It is interesting to note that as a side line in this reclamation business, the Government is in the power business, and that last year it sold surplus electrical energy under 50 contracts, receiving $654,564.37.

In the report of the Secretary of Agriculture to the President, dated November 3, 1927, we read:

> Although, like Canada and Australia, we formerly found it desirable to employ our land policy as a means of attracting immigration, we are now endeavoring to restrict immigration. Unlike some of the densely peopled countries of Europe, our output of farm products adapted to the climate is adequate and we have no scarcity of agricultural land. Although the Federal Government has disposed of practically all the lands of agricultural significance formerly in the public domain, there is still a vast area of potential crop land in private ownership. This area is estimated at more than 600,000,000 acres. A large proportion of this is fair to good land in woodland areas where only clearing is necessary. Such land, as well as large areas of potential crop land in semiarid regions, awaits only a sufficiently stimulating price for farm products to be brought quickly under the plow. In fact, this privately held land exerts at times an unfavorable influence on agricultural prosperity. * * * Temporary increases in farm commodity prices cause some of it to be brought into cultivation, and when prices fail there is no ready contraction in the new farm areas because of the difficulty of transferring the labor and capital put into them to other industries. Short-sighted expansion of the agricultural area in times of temporary prosperity is encouraged, moreover, by the potent influence of super-salesmanship exerted in the interest of land-selling agencies. * * * Experience has shown that when the outlook is sufficiently promising private enterprise can be depended on to reclaim new areas. * * * There is need for a comprehensive study of reclamation policies and of the reclamation projects now under construction or contemplated. The policy of giving settlers on Federal reclamation projects from 20 to upward of 40 years to repay construction charges without interest constitutes an extensive subsidy to agricultural expansion. * * * It was estimated in 1923 that on the basis of the terms of repayment of interest then existing the exemption of interest at 4 per cent amounted to nearly 46 per cent of the cost of construction. Since then the period of repayment has been greatly extended and the subsidy correspondingly increased. As no corresponding subsidy is enjoyed by private enterprise in the development and utilization of agricultural land the settlers on Government projects are given an important competitive advantage. * * *
> Federal activity in the promotion of farm-land expansion seems particularly unwise when we reflect that a number of Federal reclamation projects are suffering seriously from depression aggravated by heavy overhead charges growing out of high costs of construction. * * * In general, proposals to enlist the funds and initiative of the Federal Government in stimulating agricultural expansion must cause concern to all persons interested in the farmer's welfare. With a huge reservoir of potential agricultural land, and strong forces tending constantly to stimulate expansion of the farm area, our land problem at present is not how to force land under the plow as rapidly as possible, but how to achieve a wise and economical allocation of our available land among major uses, such as crops, forests, and extensive grazing, and in such a way as to make farming on that land profitable.

How can we coordinate this constructive criticism with the promotion ideas of the Bureau of Reclamation? Mr. Chairman, it can not be done. Either we are to bury farming deep and for decades to come under these huge contemplated land-reclamation projects like Boulder Dam and Columbia River, or we will, statesmanlike, hold these vast competitive resources in reserve and undeveloped until such time as, stimulated by assured profits from farm production, settlers seek these lands at prices and on terms which will justify the employment of private capital to construct the necessary works. A not unimportant feature of any program of farm relief must be the forsaking by the Government of all thought of additional land reclamation. The so-called "revolving fund" of the Bureau of Reclamation now consists of approximately $166,000,000, invested in long-term loans to settlers. As the payments under these loans are collected, they replenish this revolving fund, and thus such payments support new construction. Moreover, to such revolving fund is allocated a part of the funds received by the Government from sale of public lands.

Last year such allocation amounted to $705,822.66. Moreover, 52½ per cent of all cash received by the Government as royalties from oil leases goes to this revolving fund, and thus last year this revolving fund was increased $2,454,168.66 from such source. The total payment by settlers into this revolving fund last year was $5,299,149.55. Omitting such large items as income from sale of surplus power, rental of water rights, and so forth, and yet there flowed into such revolving fund during last fiscal year nearly $10,000,000. When farming credit is not to be had and finances are needed for moving crops the farmers of this country can not understand their Government's diverting such funds year after year to the subsidizing of competition; nor can they understand the righteousness of their Government supporting an Agricultural Department advocating one policy and an Interior Department actively engaged in defeating such policy.

This question of further reclamation of arid lands is the least complex of any which will be presented for our consideration in formulating a correct legislative program for farm relief, but it is doubtful if even it can be correctly, thoroughly digested and solved by proper enactments at this session. Opportunity should be given for full presentation and consideration of all facts. I hope my remarks may put on notice those who would defend at the contemplated extra session the policy of further reclamation of lands by the Government.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I want to say that the bill to which the gentleman referred, which I had charge of on last consent day, does not contemplate at this time a reclamation project. It contemplates some investigations which must necessarily cover a number of years. The first unit of that project, when finally decided by the Bureau of Reclamation to be a feasible project and approved by the Congress and constructed, would go into cultivation about 20 years from now; and under the plan now contemplated the whole project would be developed in the course of about 40 years, when the population of the United States would be about 60,000,000 in excess of what it is now.

The production from that proposed project would take care of 1,000,000 of the 60,000,000 of increase, and would not interfere with consumption by the present population, nor of ten, twenty, thirty, forty, or fifty million of the increase of population. That project would only meet the needs of one-sixtieth of the increased population.

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes; but I say to the gentleman that this bill is the nose of the camel under the tent, and this will eventually involve a total expenditure on the part of the Government of probably $350,000,000.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. No such draft on the Treasury is contemplated by those in charge of the project.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I will yield.

Mr. CRAMTON. I was not so fortunate as to hear all of the gentleman's remarks, but only the latter portion of them, in which I thought the gentleman raised the question as to the advisability of utilizing power developed as an incident to irrigation work. Is that the position of the gentleman?

Mr. McFADDEN. I was referring to the receipts from the sale of power originating on these propositions——

Mr. CRAMTON. Prior to that the gentleman made the remark about the Government going into the power business, and I got the very general impression the gentleman felt we ought to discontinue more——

Mr. McFADDEN. No; I was simply giving facts in regard to the returns on these developments indicating there were power developments coupled with the reclamation projects, the total income being some $600,000 last year.

Mr. CRAMTON. But prior to that?

Mr. McFADDEN. I was not specifically criticizing the developing of the properties once they had been acquired, and my remarks were directed generally to the policy of these large appropriations for the construction of reclamation projects, especially since the Congress is now about to take up the problem of dealing with the surplus products of the farms, and because we all know and understand that these great areas, so watered by these projects and otherwise improved, are produced in direct competition with the farm products of the whole country.

Mr. CRAMTON. I got that. I was more concerned about what seemed to be a criticism of the appropriations which have been passed by this House in reference to reclamation and the power developed in Idaho, for instance.

Mr. McFADDEN. I will say I believe much of that could be dispensed with at the present time, particularly when we are called upon to inaugurate a policy to provide for the marketing of the surplus products of the farms of the whole country.

Mr. CRAMTON. Just where would the gentleman draw the line as to the completion of the projects under way for furnishing needed water to settlers now on the land?

Mr. McFADDEN. If I was in charge I would have an examination made by proper engineers to determine what was best to do under the circumstances.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McFADDEN. And the sooner we get at it the better.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will yield the gentleman five additional minutes. I understand the gentleman's statement is that these reclamation products are in direct competition with the rain-belt farmer and the other farmers throughout the country?

Mr. McFADDEN. I do not know that I included rain-belt farmers particularly.

Mr. SIMMONS. With the general products of the country?

Mr. McFADDEN. I am talking in connection with contemplated action being demanded for laws to govern marketing of the surplus crops of the farmer, and I will say to the gentleman all of these reclamation projects certainly produce agricultural products which come on the market and into competition with production, which is one of the reasons that necessitate action at this time, or at least Congress is being pressed for action at this time to solve the farm-relief problem.

Mr. SIMMONS. On part of it the gentleman is in error because the agriculturists on reclamation projects of necessity become specialists in farm production. Some are fruit farmers, of which there is no surplus in the United States. The project in my State is largely devoted to the growth of sugar beets, of which sugar there is no surplus in the United States. Following, the next crop is alfalfa, which is used with the refuse from the beets. We devote it to feeding cattle especially and that type of farm activities. I think a fair check on the reclamation projects of the country will develop that a great many of the products are not in competition and can not create a surplus in the United States.

Mr. McFADDEN. I appreciate what the gentleman says.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman will yield, the gentleman referred to that Idaho expansion. The largest expansion provided for in the pending Interior Department appropriation bill was in connection with the Minidoka project to furnish a supplemental water supply to the Gooding unit that is already developed. The settlers are there but are unable to prosper because of an insufficiency of a certain water supply. In such cases as that the gentleman does not ask that these settlers of Idaho should stay there and remain in deplorable financial condition just so that the farmers of Michigan and Pennsylvania shall prosper? Idaho is as much a part of the United States as Michigan and Pennsylvania.

Mr. McFADDEN. Oh, no. I only hold that Congress, when it deals with the general question of farm relief, should take reclamation into consideration as one of the factors involved.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. I thoroughly agree with what you say about the looseness in our uncoordinated policy. The Department of Agriculture advocates one thing and the Department of the Interior another. Should not these projects, so far as the production of agricultural products go, be O. K'd by the Agricultural Department before we proceed with them?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes; I think so.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. At present we have no coordination in the matter. As it is now the farmers' organizations themselves have recently gone on record in affirming the position of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes. There is one organization that I have specifically in mind. The National Grange are upon record in support of my suggestion.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS] enumerated several projects that he said would not be in conflict with the policy of preventing a surplus, as producing products in which there is no surplus. The Boulder Dam proposition was one where we were going to irrigate an enormous amount of land there to produce cotton. That, of course, would be in live competition with one of our basic crops.

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes. And the lands now made available for irrigation in Mexico will affect the growers of cotton in South Carolina, and if these cotton lands get into full production not only South Carolina will be affected but the whole South, because under existing conditions in Mexico cotton could be produced much cheaper than in the South, because of irrigation and cheap Mexican, Chinese, and Japanese labor.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. The gentleman from Nebraska refers to fruits as not having a surplus. But we do have at times a surplus of fruits.

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SPROUL].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I have been very much interested in the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] upon the importance of a threatened appropriation for the enforcement of the prohibitory laws of our country. I agree with the idea that $24,000,000 or $25,000,000 would be wholly inadequate to prevent the coming into this country of large quantities of intoxicating beverages if nothing further was done. His logic is quite good and quite clear and quite convincing to those who view the proposition from his viewpoint. But, ladies and gentlemen, the real prohibitionists of this country are not looking at the question through the glasses of the wet people. Those who have been students of governmental prohibition for approximately half a century know that not only he but others who look at the question as he does are looking at the question of enforcement from the wrong viewpoint.

The real prohibitionists of this country propose to destroy the market of the importer. The market of the importers, the gentlemen whom he would keep out if he were enforcing the law, is the inducement for bringing the liquor across the northern boundary line of this country. Whenever our laws are so constructed fundamentally that the consumers of liquor and the bootleggers, the importers' agencies, are put out of business, the question of importing and the cost of preventing it will have been solved.

So long, ladies and gentlemen of the committee, as our prohibitory laws tolerate the operation of distilleries in the private homes of our citizens, the importing question is not a very important one to the bootlegger and the consumer.

The only difference, perhaps, is in the quality of the goods bartered and consumed. By amending our laws which we have had for 10 years so that distilleries may not be operated in every home, and so that penalties and punishments may be imposed upon the violators of the law that will be really deterring; when we have amended our laws so that we can have inquisitions conducted whereby we can locate the violators of the law; whenever we provide additional courts in which the offenders against the law may be promptly tried—all of which will not require much money compared with the amount our friend from New York mentioned; and whenever we provide a court remedy which will be an effective substitute for the jury trial, as we can do if we only would, we will have destroyed the great inducement of our importers to bring the liquor within from without. These laws to which I have just referred are now being prepared for the consideration of both branches of this great Congress.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman from Kansas is a sincere advocate of prohibition. He also practices what he preaches. Now, can the gentleman give us any information as to what remedy we could apply which will prevent the foreign embassies and legations from transporting 800 quarts of liquor over the public highways and through the streets of the Nation's Capital? Does the gentleman think that it is fair that foreign embassies and legations be permitted to transport 800 quarts of liquor in a truck, as the newspapers of last evening stated, and at the same time prevent a workingman from having a glass of 2.75 per cent beer?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. I agree with the gentleman that a law can be enacted that will prohibit the maintenance and use of liquors at embassies.

Mr. SCHAFER. And the gentleman thinks it should be enacted?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Yes; I think that laws should be enacted prohibiting the keeping and use of liquors of any kind at embassies.

Mr. SCHAFER. I am glad to hear that from one of the most sincere and leading advocates of prohibition in public life.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. This question of law enforcement requires not only fundamentally the right kind of laws but it also requires in office the right kind of officers.

No matter how strong, ladies and gentlemen, the law might be made by Congress, unless the executive officers of the country and the judicial officers of the country are disposed to enforce those laws, they will not be enforced, and the same thing can truthfully and correctly be said of every other part of our Constitution and every other law in our country.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am interested in the gentleman's statement and I am as dry as he is, but the gentleman suggested a minute ago that there were measures pending which would enable us to deal with this by dispensing with jury trials and various other constitutional safeguards. I want to know whereabouts in this Congress that legislation is pending and what is the nature of it, because we have a Constitution which says something about that.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Well, I meant to say, if I did not, and I thought I did, that bills are now being drafted to provide for an action in equity against a person conducting a business in violation of the Constitution.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Does the gentleman advocate the padlocking of homes where they find distilleries?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Yes; and I think that should include any Member of Congress. No exception should be made.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I understood the gentleman, in response to the question propounded by my friend from Wisconsin, to say that he was in favor of 2.75 per cent beer?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. No.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Then I misunderstood the gentleman.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. No. I agreed with him about the embassies being prohibited from keeping and using liquors in Washington; that that should be done away with.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I understood the gentleman to say that would be fair.

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. No. Only as I have stated.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Does not the gentleman think that in the case of Congressmen there ought to be two padlocks on dry-drinking Congressmen and one padlock on wet-drinking Congressmen?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. That could be just as the gentleman wishes. However, I think that if a Member of Congress sets up a distillery in his own home, in violation of the Constitution, it ought to be padlocked. I think the time may soon come, if the conditions within a certain few States and metropolitan cities, together with the attitude of those States toward the Federal Government and its laws do not change that our Chief Executive will follow the memorable example of President Andrew Jackson in challenging our attention to our duty as States with reference to the Constitution of the Federal Government.

I merely take this opportunity to call attention to our duty as a Congress, and that is to so strengthen our prohibitory laws, fundamentally and with reference to remedies for securing evidence, so that we can destroy the market of the bootlegger. We should put the bootlegger out of business, and whenever we have put the bootlegger out of business the wholesale importer will have no way of getting rid of his goods. His market will be destroyed and he will be put out of business.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of New York. On the question of enforcement in the individual States I notice in Collier's current issue that Topeka, Kans., has become the beer center of the country instead of the city of Milwaukee. Would the gentleman suggest that we padlock Topeka; and after what the gentleman from New York said about Detroit, should we not give Detroit a life sentence under the Michigan laws?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Absolutely. I should say this with reference to Topeka and the Collier article, that if there are in Topeka violators of the law they should be punished the same as anywhere else; but in Kansas we have laws ample to enforce prohibition, both State and National, and I think we have an executive there now who will see that the laws are enforced. The appropriation requested by him is not for buying evidence; not at all. There are ample laws, but we may lack officers not disposed to enforce the law.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. Is not the State of Kansas, the gentleman's home State, the State where the governor had to specifically direct the State enforcement officers to enforce the prohibition laws, particularly with respect to the violators who are members of the legislature, who he claimed had been influenced by lobbyists at banquets where intoxicating liquors were freely served?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. No. I think the gentleman is not quite right.

Mr. SCHAFER. The press reports are incorrect, then?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. I think the gentleman misunderstood them or misconstrued them. In Topeka the law is violated when the executive officers are not discharging their duty, the same as it is anywhere else. There is a manifest disposition on the part of the present executive officers of the State to enforce the law, and there is plenty of law-enforcing machinery; there are plenty of courts, and the law will be enforced.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Does the gentleman favor the Senate amendment to the deficiency bill for the $24,000,000?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. No; I do not favor it. I think the gentleman who proposed it was without knowledge as to the need for it. What we need is legislation. We need some additional courts and we need the fundamental law changed so that the penalties would be large enough to deter would-be violators. As I said before, we need laws prohibiting the maintenance of distilleries in private dwellings.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I want to ask the gentleman what is the use of having more courts unless you appropriate for more jails, because you have not room enough now in the jails and penitentiaries for the persons who are being sent there?

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas. We would put the bootleggers out on the highways to work building roads.

Mr. LINTHICUM. But you have to have a place for them to stay at night.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

If there is no desire for further general debate, the Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For incidental and all other general necessary expenses authorized by law, $1,700.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, the paragraph about which I want to ask the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS] a question has been passed. The paragraph is at the bottom of page 4.

My attention was called by a colleague to this particular paragraph which relates to the issuance of registration certificates or identification tags for motor vehicles, with respect to the possibility of that provision applying to a temporary resident of the District who is paying a license upon his motor vehicle back in his home State and yet is required by law, after being here 30 days, to procure one of these license tags or certificates and being required to pay a tax here upon the same vehicle upon which he is paying a tax in his home State. I want to say, so as to rid the gentleman of any idea that it might apply to me, that I have no automobile in the District of Columbia, but I do know that a great many Members of Congress have their automobiles here. They come here in them and they take them back home. I assume the law of their State requires they shall submit to the tax assessor of the county a sworn statement of their personal property. They come here and use their automobiles during the sessions of the Congress. The law here requires after they have been here 30 days that they must have a license. When they go down to get this license they will be met with the statement, "You can not get your license unless you pay this tax." They are then put in the attitude of having to pay a tax both in their home State and here, although they are here only temporarily and are not actual citizens of the District. It seems to me there ought to be a qualifying amendment so as to protect those who are in this particular situation. This will be the situation if the gentleman who spoke to me has construed the paragraph correctly.

Mr. SIMMONS. This language is put in the bill, if the gentleman please, with the idea of requiring that a District resident shall pay personal taxes on his automobile. At the present time there are a large number of them who come to the District Building, give a fictitious address, and get a license so they can not be followed, and then they pay no personal taxes. Other thousands of them do not report their automobiles when they report their personal taxes. It is estimated that the District is losing from $75,000 to $100,000 a year on personal taxes on automobiles alone, and this, in spite of the fact that the license fee in the District is only $1.

I know of no requirement that a Member of Congress has to change his license plate from his home plate when he comes to Washington. We went into that at the hearings last year, upon the subject of reciprocity as between the District and the people who are here, as we are, on official business, and I think the gentleman will find that the statement of the traffic director is that there is no requirement that they shall take out a license here.

Mr. BYRNS. Then, as I understand, this registration certificate or identification tag does not refer to the license issued to the driver of the automobile?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; this is the automobile license for the car.

Mr. BYRNS. Of course I realize, under those circumstances, he could get his license tag from his home State.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BYRNS. And he would not then be liable for this tax.

Mr. SIMMONS. This does not affect his driver's license at all.

Mr. BYRNS. But if he gets his license tag here, he will then have to pay the tax?

Mr. SIMMONS. If he is operating here under a District license, he pays the District tax.

Mr. BYRNS. I have no objection to that; but I did think it would work an injustice if it was construed as the colleague who talked to me about it this morning thought it might be construed; but, of course, the statement of the gentleman from Nebraska relieves that situation.

Mr. SIMMONS. This refers not to the driver's license but to the automobile tag.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment in order to ask the gentleman from Nebraska a question. Is the license tax $1 a year or is that permanent?

Mr. SIMMONS. The license tax is $1 a year. The driver's permit, about which the gentleman from Tennessee speaks, costs $3 and is good for three years.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Some time ago the tax was $1 and that was permanent, was it not?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I think they have been paying $1 a year. They have been objecting to it, but they have been paying that.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I remember when we had to have two licenses, I got a District license and paid $1 for it, and, as I recall, it lasted me a good long time.

Mr. SIMMONS. Possibly, prior to the gasoline tax there was a different rate.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Does a man have to pay the tax on his car when he goes to get his license?

Mr. SIMMONS. What we are aiming to do is just what the State of Maryland now requires.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes; I know about that.

Mr. SIMMONS. When a man goes to get his automobile license he will take the receipt of the treasurer showing he has paid the personal tax on his car.

Mr. LINTHICUM. That is what we do in Maryland.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; and that is what we are aiming to do here.

The Clerk read as follows:

RECORDER OF DEEDS

For personal services, $104,020: Provided, That no part of the appropriations contained in this act for personal services and other expenses of the office of the recorder of deeds shall be expended without the prior approval of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, or under such regulations as the commissioners shall approve, and all expenditures from such appropriations shall be made and accounted for in the manner provided by law for the expenditure of other appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the paragraph down to the end of line 24, as legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I am not disposed to quarrel with the gentleman about the point of order, but I want to explain the purpose of the legislation, and then if he feels that he should make the point of order I am willing to have the Chair rule.

The purpose of the legislation is this—the recorder of deeds is one of two officers in the District of Columbia whose salary is paid by the District of Columbia, whose entire working force is paid from the funds of the District of Columbia, the rent of his building, the equipment, and supplies paid by the District of Columbia, and he performs a purely municipal function. However, he is one of two officers of the District appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

The sole purpose of the legislation is that the auditor of the District may have an opportunity to check the proposed expenditure of the District funds before they are made, and after they are made to check them up and see if they comply with the authorization of the expenditures that Congress has made. The legislation has no other purpose, and if the gentleman wants to make the point of order I shall not resist.

Mr. BACHMANN. I insist on the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am frank to say that my judgment is that the point of order is good.

The CHAIRMAN. In view of the statement of the gentleman from Nebraska and the fact that the proviso is legislation on an appropriation bill, the Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Northwest: Sixteenth Street, Kalmia Road to District of Columbia line, $64,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, with reference to Sixteenth Street and its extension from Kalmia Road to the District line, that is where the District is building our Sixteenth Street and the paving is to meet the paving by Maryland to the District line. The appropriation is carried with the understanding that it is not to be expended until the construction on the Maryland side has reached the District line. With that statement I ask unanimous consent to return to page 15, line 11, to correct the spelling of the word "public."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

PUBLIC PLAYGROUNDS

For personal services, $113,180: Provided, That employments hereunder, except directors who shall be employed for 12 months, shall be distributed as to duration in accordance with corresponding employments provided for in the District of Columbia appropriation act for the fiscal year 1924.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the proviso. It may be in proper form as reported from the committee but it is rather obscure.

Mr. SIMMONS. This language has been carried in the bill for several years and has not been changed; it is a proviso to which no point of order has been made.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I did not rise to make a point of order, but I would like to know what it means when it says—except directors who shall be employed for 12 months, shall be distributed as to duration in accordance with corresponding employment provided for in the District of Columbia appropriation act—

And so forth.

Mr. SIMMONS. The explanation I have is that these playgrounds employ directors largely during the summer months, a part on full time, and this legislation is to spread out the expenditure over 12 months to suit their own convenience in carrying out the purposes of the act. I will say that the language heretofore has caused no trouble.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the reservation of the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For personal services in the department of school attendance and work permits in accordance with the act approved June 4, 1924 (43 Stat. 367–375), and the act approved February 5, 1925 (43 Stat. 806–808), $36,900: Provided, That beginning July 1, 1931, and thereafter, section 3 of the act of the Legislative Assembly of the District of Columbia, approved June 23, 1873, entitled "An act to establish a normal school for the city of Washington" (sec. 42, ch. 57, of the Compiled Statutes in force in the District of Columbia), shall apply only to those graduates of the normal schools of the District of Columbia who shall at the time of their graduation rank within the first 25 per cent of their respective classes, arranged in order of their ratings received for their entire normal school course.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against this proviso; it is clearly legislation and there must be some purpose of incorporating a provision of that sort, and I would like some information as to why this arbitrary power should be given, making it 25 per cent in the respective classes. Evidently it would deprive all others who are not in that class of the opportunity of securing a position as teacher.

Mr. SIMMONS. The purpose of that is this: For a long number of years, dating back to 1873, the District schools in the elementary grades have been supplied with teachers entirely from the two normal schools of the District. It is an ingrowing system. We are now extending the course in the normal schools from two years to three years for elementary teachers, and beginning with the date of 1931, when the classes will have reached the full 3-year course of training, we seek here to provide that 25 per cent of the highest in the class shall receive a preferential status in the District schools. The other 75 per cent of those who graduate must compete with outside teachers on a competitive basis for positions, and this is done in order to enable the school officials of the District of Columbia to secure the best teachers they can get for the salaries which we pay. As the situation is to-day, the most mediocre teacher who graduates from the normal schools of the District secures a position in the elementary schools in preference to the best teacher that could come here from any place in the United States.

Mr. BANKHEAD. This proviso relates not only to the items carried in this bill but it undertakes to make absolutely permanent legislation with reference to this method of selecting teachers?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BANKHEAD. And gives priority to the highest 25 per cent?

Mr. SIMMONS. At the present time they all have priority.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is this a proviso authorized by existing law?

Mr. SIMMONS. No. The purpose of carrying it is to enable teachers that come, say, from the normal schools in the gentleman's State, if they can demonstrate they have an ability superior to the 75 per cent, to obtain a position here; that is, to enable the District officials to hire them. The language is the language submitted by the school officials, with one exception. The testimony of the school officials stated 25 per cent, but they submitted to us the language with a proviso that 50 per cent of the graduates should have a preference, and we put it back where the testimony of the officials placed it first.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Has the gentleman ever thought of the propriety of having legislation to this effect from the District Committee instead of putting the proposition into an appropriation bill? The gentleman admits that it is legislation.

Mr. SIMMONS. It could go to the District Committee, yes, and would, if the gentleman wants to take that position.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I want to reiterate a statement I made a few days ago, that if a member of the Committee of the Whole House, when an appropriation bill is under consideration, offers an amendment which is violative of the rules of the House, some member of the Committee on Appropriations or the subcommittee will rise to vigorously oppose it and will insist upon the point of order. It seems to me that in order to be consistent, when the committee itself is confronted with items that are patently out of order in an appropriation bill, under the rules of the House, they ought to carry the matter to the legislative committees and get substantive law to support their action.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the gentleman will turn to page 16 of the report of the committee he will see that we point specifically to the language to which he refers and state that it is legislation. There is no attempt made to hide anything. This is a proposition to enable the District of Columbia to get the best teachers it can get for the money that we pay.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I shall not make the point of order against the proviso, but it seems to me that this Appropriation Committee, with the great power that it has, in accord with the policy that they have of always objecting to amendments that are offered by Members from the floor of the House, wherever it is possible, ought to secure legislation to conform to the requirements of the House and not be constantly themselves violating the rules of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of troops other than Government employees, to be disbursed under the authority and direction of the commanding general, $9,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to line 6, page 82 of the bill, to strike out the word "bureau" and insert in lieu thereof the word "burial."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will make the change.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

NATIONAL CAPITAL PARK AND PLANNING COMMISSION

For each and every purpose requisite for and incident to the work of the National Capital Park and Planning Commission as authorized by the act entitled "An act providing for a comprehensive development of the park and playground system of the National Capital," approved June 6, 1924 (43 Stat. 463–464), as amended, including not to exceed $100 for technical books and periodicals, not to exceed $45,000 for personal services in the District of Columbia, and not to exceed $3,500 for printing and binding, $1,000,000, to be immediately available and to remain available until expended: Provided, That not more than $300,000 of this appropriation shall be available for the purchase of sites without limitation as to price based on assessed value and that the purchase price to be paid for any site out of the remainder of the appropriation shall not exceed the full value assessment of such property last made before purchase thereof plus 25 per cent of such assessed value.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SIMMONS: Page 87, line 3, strike out "$45,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$50,000," and in line 13, after the word "value," strike out the period, insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the acquisition of land outside of the District of Columbia."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Nebraska.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOOPER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 16422, the District of Columbia appropriation bill, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

VOCATIONAL EDUCATION

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report from the Committee on Rules for printing.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 297

At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

SENATE

THURSDAY, January 24, 1929

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Spirit of Infinite Love, have mercy upon this Nation and look with favor upon the people Thou hast planted, for without Thee we stand uncrowned, truth is perished in the streets, and justice fallen at our gates.

If we have failed to acknowledge Thy guidance, forgive our foolish pride and suffer us not to trust in our own might, lest following selfish aims we invite the shame of disaster. Therefore come and abide in our midst, bringing peace to the hearts of men; come like a voice of stillness that calls us in the watches of the night; come like whispering winds that sway with slumbrous rhythm the branches of the trees; come like summer seas that lave with their silent tides earth's lonely shores. Come, breathe on us, Breath of God, and make us wholly Thine. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Thursday, January 17, 1929, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills, and they were signed by the Vice President:

H. R. 10472. An act to authorize the appointment of Master Sergt. August J. Mack as a warrant officer, United States Army; and

H. R. 15472. An act to authorize the Secretary of War to lend War Department equipment for use at the eleventh national convention of the American Legion.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE—JOHN J. HELMS

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to recall the bill (S. 5386) extending benefits of the World War adjusted compensation act, as amended, to John J. Helms, from the Committee on Finance, to which it was referred, having that committee discharged from its further consideration, and to have the bill referred to the Committee on Military Affairs on the ground that it is a bill to remove a dishonorable discharge from the record of a soldier. It was improperly referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have no objection to the change of reference if that is the object of the bill. I have not seen it, so I will take it for granted that the Senator's statement is correct.

Mr. BLACK. It would affect the compensation of the beneficiary if the dishonorable discharge should be removed from his war record.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me ask the Senator from Alabama, did the soldier serve in the World War?

Mr. BLACK. He did.

Mr. SMOOT. All measures relative to compensation of soldiers of that war have always gone to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BLACK. I will state briefly just what this case is, so that the Senate may understand it. The soldier was dishonorably discharged and shortly thereafter became insane. The Veterans' Bureau has taken care of the case so far as insanity is concerned, but it can not remove the dishonorable discharge. It can not be removed by the War Department except by a special act, and this bill is for the purpose of removing the dishonorable discharge. It will also indirectly affect the amount of insurance which the soldier receives.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to the Senator's request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Committee on Finance will be discharged from the further consideration of the bill and it will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, has the order requested by the Senator from Alabama been made?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The order has been made.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me that a bill of this kind, referring to the insanity of some one, might reflect upon his posterity, and ought, therefore, to be considered in executive session. [Laughter.]

COMPACTS BETWEEN CERTAIN STATES

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I desire to make a request for unanimous consent. Last evening, just before the Senate adjourned, I reported from the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation five bills authorizing certain States to enter into interstate compacts. Inadvertently I overlooked the fact that the committee had authorized a slight amendment by eliminating three or four words in the language of the bills which were passed. I now enter a motion to reconsider the votes by which House bill 6496, House bill 6497, House bill 6499, House bill 7024, and House bill 7025 were ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, and I also ask that an order be entered requesting the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bills to which I have referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the motion to reconsider will be entered and the House will be requested to return the bills to the Senate.

DR. JOSEPH GOLDBERGER

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I ask permission to have published in the RECORD at this point a very brief bill, S. 5473, proposing a pension of $150 a month to the widow of Dr. Joseph Goldberger, and in connection with that to have printed a very fine brief editorial on Doctor Goldberger which appeared in the Washington News of the 22d instant.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DALE in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill and editorial are as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary H. Goldberger, widow of Joseph Goldberger, late surgeon, United States Public Health Service, and pay her a pension at the rate of $150 per month, in special recognition of the services of Doctor Goldberger in discovering the essential cause of pellagra and means of its cure and prevention.

[From the Washington News, January 22, 1929]

DEATH COMES TO A DOCTOR

Poking about among orphanages and asylums an idea began to dawn in the doctor's mind.

He observed that in some of the asylums the nurses' trays contained a glass of milk and a portion of fresh meat. The trays for the inmates lacked these two items. In some of the orphanages he discovered that the little codgers between 6 and 12 years of age got neither milk nor meat. They were too old for babies' milk and too small to earn meat by doing chores. And in each case, or enough cases to be indicative, it was those on the meatless and milkless diet that had the red rash, sore mouths, and wretched nerves that go with the dread disease pellagra.

Lack of fresh protein, the doctor determined, causes pellagra. Adding milk and good meat will cure or prevent.

This conclusion he reached in 1915, but it required many years to establish his proof and convince the world. Seven times he risked his life and that of his wife to prove that pellagra is not caused by any germ in the blood or skin or internal organs. They and loyal fellow workers allowed themselves to be injected with the blood and material of dying pellagra victims. They swallowed pellets made from the same diseased substances. Observers marked them for death, but they did not die.

They proved their case. They had the cure for a disease that had defeated all scientific research for centuries.

But the doctor knew this did not mean that pellagra would be eliminated or even controlled. He knew much about life. Brought to this country by immigrant parents when he was 5 years old, he had spent his childhood and youth amid the poverty of East Side New York. He knew that fresh milk and meat were not to be had on every table. He studied and searched for a cheap food that would prevent pellagra. He found it in yeast. He proved that a small amount of this inexpensive food, fresh or dried, will prevent the disease. And he made this discovery in time to save thousands of lives of Mississippi River flood victims.

The solution of the pellagra problem was not this doctor's only contribution to science and to humanity. In his years of work in the United States Public Health Service, beginning as an inspector at Ellis Isle, he worked on other diseases—yellow fever, typhus, dengue, diphtheria, measles, and influenza. He made many discoveries—some again at risk of his life.

Dr. Joseph Goldberger died the other day in Washington. With his death the family income stopped. It is proposed that Congress grant a pension to the widow, the woman who aided his work and shared many of his dangers and hardships.

Congress scarcely can refuse.

AMERICAN SHIPS

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very able address, in most of which I concur, entitled "American Ships," delivered at Jacksonville, Fla., by Mr. E. J. Adams.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GOVERNMENT OPERATION

It can be safely stated that the American people do not want their Government to engage in any business that can be successfully conducted by the people as individuals, copartners, or private corporations.

Government operation in any field of endeavor where private operation can function and survive is opposed by business men both large and small.

The position of President-elect Hoover against Government operation and for Government cooperation apparently meets with popular approval.

There are, however, some great essential public services that can not be rendered by private activity and must be supplied by the Government, and the cost, whatever it may be, borne by the people as a whole. Some of these are—

United States mail service (the largest business in the world).
Modern public highways.
River and harbor improvements.
The Panama Canal and Railroad.
Waterways from the Great Lakes to the sea.
The Alaska Railway.
Reclamation.
Flood control, and the Maintenance of an Army and Navy for national security.

Most of these activities produce no revenue and others produce less revenue than sufficient to make them self-sustaining, yet they are all essential services to the public in the benefits of which all the people of our country share directly or indirectly.

The mail service incurs an annual deficit of about $20,000,000 and has the use of space, rent free, in public buildings owned by the Federal Government worth millions of dollars more.

Appropriations from the Federal Treasury authorized by Congress since 1916 for modern highways suitable for motor traffic amount to $765,000,000. Expenditures by States and counties for the same purpose during this same period have been many times this vast sum.

Total expenditures for public highways in the United States during the year 1925 exceeded $1,288,933,707. The average annual expenditure since 1925 has been about the same. From 1916 to 1925 it was less but very large.

No direct revenue is received from these highway investments, but the benefits accruing to all the people justify the cost.

Over $1,500,000,000 have been appropriated and expended in the development and improvement of our rivers and harbors to aid water transportation and the transfer of tonnage from cars and trucks to ships. No direct revenue flows from these expenditures, but who will say it is an unwise expenditure of public funds to improve shipping facilities that expedite the service and reduce the cost of transportation?

The annual appropriations for the military activities and other expenses of the War Department incident thereto are over $300,000,000, and for the United States Navy Establishment the appropriations for the ensuing fiscal year are over $350,000,000.

No revenue is received from these large expenditures, but the security of our Republic and the safety of our people in life and property at home or abroad demands adequate preparation for the defense of our Nation.

For construction, equipment, and defense of the Panama Canal over $350,000,000, and for the construction, equipment, maintenance, and operation of the Alaska Railroad over $60,000,000 have been appropriated from the Federal Treasury.

The Panama Canal is self-sustaining, and present revenues show good monetary returns on the investment and indicate a refund to the Federal Treasury of all the money expended for its construction within the next score of years. This is the one outstanding Government investment in an essential public service that shows a direct monetary profit.

Three great factors control the prosperity of the Nation and the happiness of her people—production, transportation, and markets. The United States leads all peoples in volume of production. Overland transportation in the United States, both rail and motor, is unequaled anywhere. The American markets are the best in the world because the American people have more, earn more, buy more, and enjoy higher standards of living than any other people in the world, and the foreign commerce of the United States has more than doubled since 1914.

One vital thing we need, and that is an adequate American merchant marine to deliver the goods we sell in foreign markets and bring home the things we require and do not produce in sufficient quantity to meet our requirements.

Factories, farms, and merchants, great and small, require trains and trucks of their own to deliver the goods they sell to their customers. To depend upon their competitors for delivery of their goods to common customers is little short of commercial suicide.

The same economic principles underlie the commerce of nations.

The United States has secured and now enjoys a splendid trade with many foreign countries. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1928, our exports amounted to almost $5,000,000,000 ($4,877,000,000), and our imports slightly over $4,000,000,000 ($4,146,000,000), making a grand total of over $9,000,000,000 ($9,023,000,000). Over 60 per cent of our exports were products of the soil and about 37 per cent were annual crops. Five per cent were products of the forest and 24 per cent products of the factory which included 423,000 automobiles valued at $425,000,000, including accessories and parts exported. In 1922 we exported 52,000 automobiles valued at $80,800,000, an increase of over 500 per cent in six years in this one line of production alone.

Our imports consisted principally of rubber, silk, coffee, sugar, paper, pulp, tin fruits, nuts, and fertilizers.

In volume our foreign trade amounted to approximately 115,000,000 long tons (2,240 pounds) and required almost 6,000 ships, making an average of five round voyages each to transport it overseas. This means approximately 29,000 cargoes, equivalent to 4,500,000 carloads, or 35 freight trains extending from Chicago to New York or the Gulf of Mexico, or 45,000 trains of 100 cars each, or one solid line of loaded freight cars 35,000 miles long, equivalent to one and one-half times around the earth. Such is the volume of the present foreign commerce of the United States. To hold this trade in the markets of the world in the face of stronger and keener competition from rehabilitated Europe will require the best wisdom, skill, and devotion to our country's welfare.

Three things control trade—quality, cost, and delivery. In quality and cost the United States can meet all competition where mass production can be employed, but in delivery overseas the problem is difficult.

The people of the United States have all the factors required to hold and expand foreign markets for American goods save this one. They have the resources, power, skill, and energy to produce, the best overland delivery systems in the world, and the good will of buyers in foreign markets. The one thing lacking is the overseas link in our delivery system—an adequate American merchant marine.

Ships of all nations give first and preferred delivery service to the people of their own country, and it is considered the duty, established by custom of long standing, for the management and personnel in the operation of ships to serve, support, and secure the trade of the people in all ports for the producers of the country under whose laws the ships operate. This condition emphasizes the need for American ships in the American foreign trade.

The cost of building ships in the United States is approximately 50 per cent more than the cost in the principal foreign shipyards, and the cost of operation under the laws of the United States is about 50 per cent more than under the laws of our principal competing nations. This forms a barrier, under normal conditions and low freight rates, that American ships can not surmount without aid and cooperation from the American Government and the loyal support of the American people.

A ship subsidy (cash payment from the Public Treasury to ship operators) has been many times proposed, discussed, and rejected.

During the World War our Government acquired 2,543 vessels of all kinds, steel, wood, and concrete, good, bad, and indifferent, some fit and some unfit for peace-time commerce, but they attracted the attention of our people as a possible foundation or starting point for the building of a great American merchant marine.

Congress, in the merchant marine act of 1920, directed the United States Shipping Board to do all within its power to foster and develop an American merchant marine, privately operated where possible, and Government operated where private operation could not survive the foreign competition.

The board was directed to sell or charter the vessels of the Government to American citizens who would agree to operate them in trade essential to our commerce.

Congress also directed the board to seek for trade routes where American ships could be used to develop, expand, and extend foreign markets for American production.

The United States Shipping Board found and established 37 trade routes and allocated 350 ships for operation over such routes.

As fast as these new trade routes show earnings sufficient to attract practical ship operators of the United States, they are sold and passed into the private ownership of citizens of the United States, but always with a guaranty on the part of the purchaser that he will continue the operation established by the Government, for the protection of shippers that have transferred their business from foreign to American ships and thereby assisted in building up the transportation service established by the Government.

Thirteen such established lines with 110 ships operating over them have been sold to citizens of the United States; and the Government still operates, through experienced contract operators, 24 lines with 250 ships.

Before the World War about 70 per cent of our foreign commerce was carried in tramp ships—ships that made any port where profitable cargo could be found.

The establishment of definite trade routes and the operation of ships on schedule time by the United States has done much to stabilize our foreign trade and induce private operators, both foreign and American, to give scheduled service over definite trade routes until now about 70 per cent of our foreign commerce is carried over definite routes on schedule time at reasonable rates.

To properly serve the producers and shippers of the United States we must have dependable service over definite routes on fixed schedules at reasonable and stable rates published in advance of their effective date a sufficient time to protect the buyer and seller at home and abroad in their sales contracts and delivery commitments.

To establish new trade routes and operate an American delivery service over these routes during the pioneer days of trade building and expansion in foreign markets for American products has incurred some deficits.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1927, the Government operated an average of about 300 ships, and in this operation incurred a deficit of slightly less than $13,000,000 ($12,773,667.01). During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1928, with low competitive freight rates, the deficit incurred by the Government in the operation of these ships, including insurance, maintenance, betterments, advertising, and administrative expenses, was slightly over $15,000,000 ($15,100,156.45).

The freight bill on our water-borne foreign commerce was about $760,000,000 per year ($750,266,892) in 1927. (Figures not available for 1928.)

Over $530,000,000 ($531,139,853) was paid to the owners of foreign ships and less than $230,000,000 ($229,127,029) to the operators of American ships, private and Government, in 1927.

The Government deficit in 1927 is slightly over 1½ per cent, and in 1928 is slightly less than 2 per cent of the freight bill.

With the Government out of the picture, an increase in freight rates by conference and agreement between shipowners, foreign and domestic, would be possible and probable. An increase of 10 per cent in rates for one year would equal the deficit incurred by the Government in the operation of Government-owned ships for several years.

In 1914 the exports of the United States amounted to $2,364,579,148, and the imports to $1,893,925,657. In comparison with the exports and imports of the United States during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1928, our exports show an increase of $2,512,420,852, and our imports of $2,252,074,343 in 1928 over the exports and imports in 1914.

The balance of trade in favor of the United States in 1914 was $470,653,491, and in 1928 it was $731,000,000, showing an increase of $260,346,509.

From a business man's viewpoint, it is worth something to increase his volume of trade and the same is true when applied to the foreign trade of a nation.

The deficit incurred in the operation of about 300 ships was about one-half of 1 per cent of the increase in the exports of the increase in the balance of trade in favor of the United States in 1928 compared with the balance of trade in 1914.

Two things have contributed vitally and materially to this large increase in the foreign trade of the United States. One is the work done by the Department of Commerce, under the leadership of President-elect Hoover as Secretary of Commerce, in seeking out and helping our producers to win the good will of foreign buyers and consumers and inducing them to buy more and more of American-made goods and products. The other essential thing has been the improved transportation overseas by the establishment of a dependable schedulized definite delivery service under the leadership of the United States Shipping Board.

Most any business man would consider it good business to improve his delivery system if he could show increases in the volume of his trade at a cost of one-half of 1 per cent of his increased sales, and less than 6 per cent of the increase in his net profits.

Without a delivery service equal to that of any other nation competing for business in the same foreign markets we could not hold the market for American products, much less expand it, and all the work done by the Department of Commerce would avail nothing.

Salesmanship as practiced by the Department of Commerce and American producers must go hand in hand with transportation under the leadership of the United States Shipping Board and the progressive, courageous American shipping men if our foreign trade expands in proportion to increased production in the United States.

If the establishment and maintenance of an adequate American merchant marine as an efficient delivery system for American producers that sell in foreign markets is an important factor in increasing our sales to the people of other countries, as we insist it is, the next step is to make it self-supporting as a Government activity in behalf of the best interest of all the people and pass the ships to citizens of the United States for private operation as fast as such operation can be made profitable and still maintain the service essential to the well-being and prosperity of the American people.

To hasten this process the people must aid by shipping and traveling on American-flag ships, whether privately owned or Government owned.

Unless the producers and shippers of the United States patronize and use their own ships—their own delivery system—when the service and rates are equal to those afforded by other ships, it will be impossible to build up an adequate American merchant marine.

The American people are loyal and prompt to respond in any national emergency. When they fully realize the economic value of an American merchant marine to the everyday producer of our land, both agricultural and industrial, they can be depended upon to give their wholehearted support to American-flag ships.

All that Congress and all the Shipping Board can do to build up an American merchant marine is not enough without the loyal support and patronage of the American people.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, in strict conformity with the rule, I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to proceed for a few moments in explanation of a very important measure pending on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I have no desire to interfere with the Senator from Michigan making the speech which, I understand, he desires to make; but, on the other hand, this is the first opportunity we have had to consider the calendar for 10 days or more. The Senate will recall that on the last occasion when the calendar was called the Senate was considering the joint resolution providing for surveys in Panama and Nicaragua, but, at the request of a Senator, I consented to postpone further action on the joint resolution at that time, with the statement that I would ask that the joint resolution be again considered at the first opportunity. It was more or less a gentleman's agreement that it would be again considered upon the first occasion when the calendar was called. I feel that the importance of the joint resolution in every way justifies that we consider it at this time. I was going to ask when the calendar was called that the joint resolution be taken up and considered by the Senate. I hope that it can be passed without opposition, as I think I have met all requests for amendments to the measure. The resolution as it stands merely provides for a survey of those two important projects, so that Congress may be informed and be able to give intelligent consideration to one of the most important problems that we are facing. I hope that the joint resolution may be passed without debate, but if there should be any objection to the joint resolution I propose to move its consideration, in which event, of course, the Senator from Michigan could make his speech. I should like to have the regular order proceeded with so that this measure may at least be brought before the Senate.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, if permitted to speak, I shall conclude my speech in ample time for the Senator from New Jersey to do what he seeks.

Mr. EDGE. I do not doubt that, but the introduction of another subject before the Senate naturally brings on more or less controversy, and in any way, shape, form, or manner it will not interfere with the speech of the Senator from Michigan by having the joint resolution brought before the Senate. If I can have it passed unanimously, then there will be nothing more to be done. If I can not have it passed without objection, then I shall move to take it up, and I assume that, under the understanding, the joint resolution will be laid before the Senate. Then, of course, the Senator from Michigan can speak upon the joint resolution if he cares to do so.

Mr. VANDENBERG. But in that event a Senator could speak only for five minutes.

Mr. EDGE. Oh, no; under the rules of the Senate the Senator could speak from now until 2 o'clock if the joint resolution shall be laid before the Senate on motion.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Not on the motion to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. EDGE. After the motion to consider the joint resolution shall be decided affirmatively, the Senator from Michigan can speak from now until 2 o'clock. Under those circumstances, without in any way interfering with the Senator's speech, and so that at least I may have the joint resolution brought before the Senate, in accordance with the understanding, so far as we can have understandings without a unanimous-consent agreement, I ask for the regular order, so that consideration of the calendar may at least be begun. Then I will ask for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey whether by taking up the valuable time of the Senate now he is filibustering against the cruiser bill?

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I assure the Senator that I will not take five minutes further to explain the subject matter of the joint resolution. I think the Senate is entirely familiar with it. I ask for the regular order.

THE CALENDAR

The VICE PRESIDENT. The calendar, under Rule VIII, is in order. The clerk will state the first bill on the calendar.

The CHIEF CLERK. A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 1) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States prohibiting war.

Mr. BRUCE. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business No. 785, being Senate Joint Resolution 117, the joint resolution to which I have just referred.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I must object, as I desire to have the calendar called from the beginning. I myself have a bill on the calendar which should be considered and which is just as important relatively as is the joint resolution of the Senator from New Jersey. I am in favor of his joint resolution, but I object to singling out one measure on the calendar; therefore let us begin at the beginning and go through the entire calendar. I ask for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is called for. The clerk will state the next bill on the calendar.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 1414) for the prevention and removal of obstructions and burdens upon interstate commerce in cottonseed oil by regulating transactions on future exchanges, and for other purposes.

Mr. COPELAND. I ask that that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1728) placing service postmasters in the classified service was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRUCE. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I ask that that bill go over. An amendment is being prepared to it which it is desired to submit later.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. MOSES. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

WITHDRAWAL OF MARINES FROM NICARAGUA

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 57) requesting the President to immediately withdraw the armed forces of the United States from Nicaragua was announced as next in order.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Over.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama if there is any necessity of having the joint resolution remain longer on the calendar? It is accompanied by an adverse report. Why may it not be indefinitely postponed?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I am just wondering why our marines are not brought home now. The election in Nicaragua is over; the marines were to stay in Nicaragua until an election had been held and the Government of Nicaragua could function. We have gone in and set up their Government.

Mr. SMOOT. There is an adverse report on the joint resolution, and I think it should be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. HEFLIN. If the marines had been brought home earlier, the three boys who have recently lost their lives would not have been killed. I will let the joint resolution stay on the calendar for a while, because if something is not done to bring the marines home I am going to renew the fight later.

Mr. BRUCE. If the marines had been brought home from Nicaragua, how many Nicaraguans would have lost their lives?

Mr. DILL. When were we called upon to save the lives of Nicaraguans?

Mr. HEFLIN. And when were we called on to have American boys killed in order to save Nicaraguans?

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the joint resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT The joint resolution will be passed over.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 2679) to limit the period for which an officer appointed with the advice and consent of the Senate may hold over after his term shall have expired was announced as next in order.

Mr. METCALF. I ask that that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1263) to amend section 4 of the interstate commerce act was announced as next in order.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

ANDREW W. MELLON

The joint resolution (S. Res. 173) expressing it as the sense of the Senate that Andrew W. Mellon should resign as Secretary of the Treasury was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the resolution go over.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, was there objection to the reconsideration of Senate Resolution 173?

Mr. SMOOT. I asked that it go over.

Mr. HARRISON. I notice that this resolution expresses it as the sense of the Senate that Andrew W. Mellon should resign as Secretary of the Treasury. I merely wish to call attention of the Senate to the fact that if we are going to have action upon this resolution we had better act on it before the 4th of March, because we may not have an opportunity after that time to take the action proposed.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION PASSED OVER

Mr. BRUCE. I ask that that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 25) to declare the 11th day of November, celebrated and known as Armistice Day, a legal holiday was announced as next in order.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1729) extending the classified civil service to include postmasters of the third class, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BLEASE. I ask that that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

FOREIGN TRADE ZONES IN UNITED STATES PORTS OF ENTRY

The bill (S. 742) to provide for the establishment, operation, and maintenance of foreign trade zones in ports of entry of the United States, to expedite and encourage foreign commerce, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that that bill go over.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a resolution passed by the executive committee of the Connecticut Chamber of Commerce in relation to the bill the title of which has just been read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The resolution is as follows:

It was voted: That the following resolution be passed and forwarded to the Connecticut congressional delegation:

"Whereas there have been various bills, including calendar bill 729 and Senate bill 742, which bill is said to have the indorsement of the Treasury Department and the Department of Commerce, providing for the establishment, operation, and maintenance of foreign trade zones in ports of entry of the United States, which trade zones are to be either on Government land or on private land, and to be operated as private monopolies, and for the purpose of allowing foreign merchandise to be brought in and offered for sale, mixed, changed, repacked, without payment of duty, except such goods as are actually offered for consumption: Be it

"Resolved, That the executive committee of the Connecticut Chamber of Commerce, composed of over 1,100 members representing all branches of business, protests against the granting of such private monopolies, and also against the importation of merchandise to be offered for sale in competition with American production without the payment of duty."

Executive committee of the Connecticut Chamber of Commerce: Edward N. Allen, vice president Sage-Allen & Co., Hartford; Stanley H. Bullard, vice president Bullard Machine Tool Co., Bridgeport; John B. Byrne, vice president Hartford-Connecticut Trust Co., Hartford; F. S. Chase, president the Chase Cos., Waterbury; Frank Cheney, jr., Cheney Bros., South Manchester; Frank H. Johnston, president City Coal & Wood Co., New Britain; James T. Moran, president Southern New England Telephone Co., New Haven; Ernest E. Rogers, Lieutenant Governor of Connecticut; Henry Trumbull, treasurer Trumbull Electric Manufacturing Co., Plainville.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 1995) placing certain employees of the Bureau of Prohibition in the classified civil service, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRUCE. I ask that the bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1215) for the relief of Helen F. Griffin was announced as next in order.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2901) to amend the national prohibition act, as amended and supplemented, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRUCE. Over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

PROPOSED NICARAGUAN CANAL

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 117) authorizing an investigation and survey for a Nicaraguan canal was announced as next in order.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I object, for the purpose of permitting the Senator from New Jersey to make the motion which he desires to make.

Mr. EDGE. I will say to the Senator from Michigan that that procedure would, of course, afford him an opportunity to make a speech at this time, if the motion should carry; but I do not believe that the Senator really wants to object to the joint resolution from that standpoint, because he certainly will have an opportunity to make his speech during the morning, or, at any rate, during the day. So far as I have been able to learn, and after considerable consultation with other Senators, I think all objections to the joint resolution have been removed, and I had hoped that it could be passed without objection.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Then, the motion to consider the measure will promptly carry.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I suggest to the Senator from New Jersey that he do not make the motion under those conditions.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I assume that there is no opposition to the joint resolution; so let the question be put.

Mr. EDGE. I hope that the Senator from Michigan will withdraw his objection. I think that he is in favor of the joint resolution.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator from Michigan is entitled to protect his parliamentary rights. He feels that he has a matter to present to the Senate which is of fundamental importance, but the Senator from New Jersey has made it impossible—and entirely within his right——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I call for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is called for. The Secretary will state the next bill on the calendar.

The CHIEF CLERK. The next bill on the calendar is the bill (S. 2097) to provide for the protection of the municipal watersheds within the national forests.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I will speak for a moment on that bill.

Mr. President, before the regular order, I desire to reply to the Senator from Michigan, especially when we have similar interests in the measures now under discussion.

This joint resolution, in which I am interested as the chairman of the committee, as well as having made considerable study of the subject, has been on the calendar since March 21, almost a year. In fact, upon the request of Senators, usually based upon interests other than the measure itself, I have postponed action at least five times. It does seem to me now that the time has come when this very important joint resolution should not be used as a vehicle to force or press some other legislation; and I appeal to the Senator from Michigan to withdraw his objection, and permit the joint resolution to be passed at this time.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, if the Senator from New Jersey will permit me, I would suggest to the Senator from Michigan that as soon as the cruiser bill is taken up he can speak without limit, and get into the debate a little later. He would only have to wait until 2 o'clock anyhow.

Mr. MOSES. That is the voice of an expert, Mr. President.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, the Senator from New Jersey suggested that upon objection he would move to take up this bill, which would permit a reasonable presentation of the subject matter that I wish to present. If he desires to pursue that course——

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I call for the regular order.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Order of Business No. 785, the joint resolution of the Senator from New Jersey, having been passed over, would a motion now be in order to take it up?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is another measure before the Senate.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Therefore, Mr. President, the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan being inapplicable, I ask unanimous consent that we revert to Order of Business 785.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I object, Mr. President.

MUNICIPAL WATERSHEDS WITHIN NATIONAL FORESTS

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made. Is there objection to the consideration of Senate bill 2097, Order of Business 791?

Mr. BLEASE. Let it go over.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I wish the Senator would withhold his objection for a moment. This is a bill for which the Interior Department has asked for a number of years. It is of extreme importance to the people of the West, where small towns are obtaining their water supply from forest reservations. It simply empowers the Secretary of the Interior in his discretion to protect those watersheds. If the Senator realized the situation in many of our small communities near these reservations, I think he would not object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. BLEASE. I have some important bills here, too; and the Senator who is the author of this bill takes pleasure in keeping them from coming up. I object.

Mr. DILL. I am sorry the Senator objects on personal grounds rather than the merits of the bill.

Mr. BLEASE. When I am fought personally I am going to fight back personally.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from Washington that I have asked the Department of Agriculture to suggest some limitation to the power vested in the department under this bill; and I should feel compelled to ask that it go over until that could be worked out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the bill will be passed over.

NATIONAL INSTITUTE OF HEALTH

The bill (S. 4518) to establish and operate a national institute of health, to create a system of fellowships in said institute, and to authorize the Government to accept donations for use in ascertaining the cause, prevention, and cure of disease affecting human beings, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BAYARD. Let that go over.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will withdraw his objection.

Let me say that this is a very important bill. It is a bill to create a national institute of health. The purpose of it is to have a systematic study made of the diseases affecting human beings.

The measure is an absolutely altruistic one. It has the unanimous support of the Public Health Service of the Treasury Department, and of all the scientific institutions in the country that know anything about it. I believe if the Senator understood the measure he would not oppose it, especially in view of the awful epidemic of influenza that is now sweeping over this country.

Ten years ago we tried to fight influenza. We did not succeed. It killed thousands and hundreds of thousands of people. To-day it is just as bad as it ever was, and we know no more about it than we did then.

This bill simply seeks, not to create a new department, not to create a new bureau, but to carry on in a broader, better way in the Public Health Service the investigation of the diseases affecting human beings and causing so much sickness, so much unhappiness, so much loss, millions of dollars of loss every year.

If there is any good reason for fighting this bill, let us have it; but I beg Senators not to object simply because they can object to this great measure, which has been on the calendar for a long time.

I hope the Senator from Delaware will withdraw his objection and allow this bill to be considered.

Mr. BAYARD. No, Mr. President, I will not withdraw my objection, because I can truthfully say there are thousands of institutions throughout this country which are pursuing the same course of investigation that this particular institution would pursue; and I am wholly unwilling for the Federal Government to indulge in an absolutely unnecessary expense, as I see it, when other institutions, not only in this country but throughout the world, are carrying on the same work that the Senator desires by this bill to impose upon the Federal Government.

Mr. RANSDELL. Let me say to the Senator that we will cooperate with those other institutions. They are all desirous of having this bill passed. Their representatives have appeared before the committee and given their testimony. We do not interfere with them in the slightest degree; but we will secure their cooperation, and we will cooperate with them.

Mr. SMOOT. I call for the regular order.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I admit that there is no interference of any kind, but the proposed institute, as I see it, is wholly unnecessary, and I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the bill will be passed over.

Mr. RANSDELL subsequently said: Mr. President, in connection with a statement which I made this morning with reference to the bill to establish a national institute of health, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD, following those remarks, a letter from Mr. Mellon, Secretary of the Treasury, addressed to the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], chairman of the Committee on Commerce, dated the 21st instant.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DALE in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

JANUARY 21, 1929.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,

Chairman Committee on Commerce, United States Senate.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Reference is made to S. 4518, which was introduced in the Senate by Senator RANSDELL May 3, 1928. Its provisions are as follows: Enlargement of the Hygienic Laboratory and change of its name to the National Institute of Health; authorization of appropriations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of the act; acceptance of gifts to be used for the promotion of research; establishment of fellowships in the institute; appointment of scientists; utilization of the facilities of the institute by health authorities; and utilization by the personnel of the institute of the facilities of other scientific institutions wherever located.

The bill as now prepared does not create any new bureaus or new commissions, but utilizes existing governmental machinery. In reality it provides for orderly enlargement of the Hygienic Laboratory and aims to take advantage of its facilities for the training of scientific workers. In order to be substantial this enlargement will necessarily be gradual, depending on available facilities and the ability to secure properly trained personnel to carry on research.

The provision to create a system of fellowship is one of the most valuable parts of the bill. It will enable the National Institute of Health to encourage men and women of marked proficiency to devote their lives to the study of diseases of mankind. It will also supply contacts among scientific workers to collect and disseminate knowledge.

I am impressed by the authorization for the unconditional acceptance of bequests for the promotion of research. It should encourage private contributions toward the study of health problems, and insure their wise use for the solution of particular problems.

The principles of the bill have been indorsed by the leading scientific societies and many prominent scientists and physicians. These principles are meritorious, and I believe their enactment into law would be highly beneficial, in the promotion of research and the saving of life.

It may be added that the Bureau of the Budget advises that the proposed legislation is not in conflict with the financial program of the President.

Yours very truly, A. W. MELLON.

SUPREME COURT REPORTS FOR COURT OF CUSTOMS APPEALS

The bill (H. R. 9049) to amend section 227 of the Judicial Code was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, may I inquire of the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE], who reported this bill, as to the particular manner in which it amends the section of the code referred to?

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, under the present law the Attorney General has held that he has no authority to furnish copies of the United States Supreme Court Reports to the Court of Customs Appeals.

Mr. BRATTON. This is the bill which the Senator and I discussed, then?

Mr. BLAINE. Yes. It is simply to furnish that court with copies of the Supreme Court Reports.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

GRAZING FACILITIES WITHIN NATIONAL FORESTS

The bill (S. 2328) to promote the development, protection, and utilization of grazing facilities within national forests, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let that go over.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his objection for a moment? I desire to say that this bill has been on the calendar for some time. The questions involved have been given very serious study over a period of years, and the Department of Agriculture is in accord with the main purposes of the bill. The only difference between the department and the committee at the present time, as far as I am aware, is the question of the fees to be charged for grazing stock in the national forests. That is a debatable question, of course, but the department is to-day collecting at least four or five times the cost of the administration in the national forests.

The stock industry to-day is in such condition that it is asking for relief as a part and feature of farm relief. My own feeling has been for some time that the grazing fees that have been charged over a period of years are as high as they should be, or at least that no advances should be made at the present time. If the department were to carry out its proposed program within the next two or three years, the rates now charged would be almost doubled, and I submit that the industry is not in position to stand that additional charge at the present time.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have written some constituents in regard to this bill and am awaiting a reply.

Mr. PHIPPS. I wanted to make the statement I have made so that the Senate would be informed, because at an early date I desire to bring the bill up for consideration in the regular way.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I would like to make a suggestion to the Senator. It would seem to me that such a bill would be difficult of administration. It provides for the free grazing of livestock kept for domestic purposes. It seems to me that under it there would devolve upon the department the obligation of determining that the livestock permitted free grazing were kept for domestic purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under objection, the bill will be passed over.

INCREASES OF POSTAL SALARIES

The bill (H. R. 5837) to increase the salaries of certain postmasters of the first class was announced as next in order.

Mr. BLEASE. Let that go over.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, will not the Senator withhold the objection?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator withhold his objection?

Mr. BLEASE. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. MOSES. This measure, as will be seen from the notation on the calendar, is a House bill upon a subject which was considered by the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and upon which the committee made a unanimous report. Evidently, when the substitution was made of the House bill for the Senate bill which was upon the calendar, the report accompanying the Senate bill was not left with the House bill as it stands on the calendar; but, briefly, the circumstances are these:

In the course of the legislation of February 28, 1925, revising the salaries of postal employees, the first-class postmasters were the only persons in the Postal Service who did not benefit by the legislation. With the growth of the postal business, especially of the first-class offices, it has seemed to the committee that an injustice was done to those men in that grade of the service.

The bill now on the calendar coming over from the House is a much more economical bill, I will say to the Senate, than that which the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads recommended, and the House bill represents, I think, a much more extended set of hearings on the subject than the Senate committee was able to give.

Both committees being in favor of the principle involved in the measure, the question was what schedule of salaries could be agreed upon, and while the schedule provided in the House bill is not as generous or as extensive as that provided in the Senate bill, it seemed, in order to advance the legislation, that the proper method was to substitute the House bill when it came over to the Senate, and now reaching it on the calendar, I hope Senators will not object to it.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, is it not also a fact that the Senate at a previous session passed a bill providing for salaries substantially as they were fixed in the Senate bill which the Post Office Committee later reported favorably? In other words, this legislation has passed the Senate?

Mr. MOSES. The essential features of the bill as reported from the Senate committee in the present Congress were contained in a bill passed in the Sixty-ninth Congress and sent over to the House, but which there failed of action.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, at the request of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] I am compelled to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will go over.

TRAVEL PAY TO CERTAIN SOLDIERS

The bill (S. 1513) granting travel pay and other allowances to certain soldiers of the Spanish-American War and the Philippine insurrection who were discharged in the Philippines was announced as next in order.

Mr. DILL. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over under objection.

Mr. FRAZIER rose.

Mr. DILL. I am objecting to the bill at the request of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], I may say. Personally, I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under objection, the bill will be passed over.

FIFTEENTH AND SUBSEQUENT CENSUSES

The bill (H. R. 393) to provide for the fifteenth and subsequent decennial censuses was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I have a very important amendment on the table relating to that bill, and it would be impossible to discuss my amendment at any length of time the Senate would tolerate now, I am sure.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, the delay in passing this legislation is interfering with the work of the Census Bureau, and I hope the Senator from Maryland will arrange at an early date for a consideration of the measure. When I was Director of the Census Mr. Steuart, the present director, was associated with me in that work, and he is one of the most efficient public officials I have known. Congress should pass this measure without delay.

Mr. BRUCE. I am ready to take the amendment up at any time at all. I have not the slightest desire to obstruct the passage of the bill. On the contrary, I would like to promote and accelerate the passage of the bill, but this amendment I have offered is one which will take some time to discuss.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under objection, the bill will be passed over.

IMMIGRATION QUOTAS

The bill (S. 1437) to subject certain immigrants, born in countries of the Western Hemisphere, to the quota under the immigration laws was anounced as next in order.

Mr. PHIPPS. Let the bill go over.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Colorado will withdraw his objection to the consideration of this bill. It has been unanimously reported by the committee, and is recommended by the American Federation of Labor, the American Legion, the Women's Auxiliary of the American Legion, and many other patriotic organizations. I hope the Senator will not object to the consideration of this measure. It is a matter of the greatest importance to the entire country.

Mr. PHIPPS. I regret that I must insist upon my objection. I would like very much to discuss the matter with the Senator.

Mr. HARRIS. I give notice that I will move to take this measure up at the earliest opportunity, and will urge its passage without delay.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under objection, the bill will be passed over.

LEMUEL SIMPSON

The bill (S. 2192) for the relief of Lemuel Simpson was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws and laws conferring rights and privileges upon honorably discharged soldiers, their widows and dependent relatives, Lemuel Simpson, late private of Company C, Black Hawk Regiment Cavalry, Missouri Volunteers, and late corporal and second sergeant of Company K, Fifty-fifth Regiment Indiana Volunteers, shall be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of said Company C, Black Hawk Regiment Cavalry, Missouri Volunteers: Provided, That no back pay, pension, bounty, or other emoluments shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

Be it enacted, etc., That chapter 15 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia is hereby amended by striking out the provisions of said chapter in entirety down to subchapter 1 thereof and substituting in lieu thereof the following:

"CHAPTER XV

"CONDEMNATION OF LAND FOR PUBLIC USE

"SEC. 483. Land for District of Columbia: Whenever land in the District is needed by the commissioners of the District for sites of schoolhouses, fire or police stations, or for a right of way for sewers, or for any other municipal use authorized by Congress, and the same can not be acquired by purchase from the owners thereof at a price satisfactory to the officers of said District authorized to negotiate for the same, application may be made to the Supreme Court of the District by petition in the name of said commissioners for the condemnation of said land or said right of way and the ascertainment of its value.

"SEC. 484. Petition; what to show: Such petition shall contain a particular description of the property selected, with the names of the owners thereof and their residences, so far as the same may be ascertained, together with a plan of the land to be taken.

"SEC. 484a. The jury commission of the District of Columbia shall prepare a special list of persons having the qualifications of jurors, as prescribed by section 215 of this code, and being also freeholders of the District of Columbia. The jury commission shall from time to time as may be necessary write the names contained in said special list on separate and similar pieces of paper, which they shall so fold or roll that the names can not be seen, and shall place the same in a special box to be provided for the purpose, and shall thereupon seal and lock said special box, and after thoroughly shaking the same shall deliver it to the clerk of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia for safe-keeping; but the same shall not be unsealed or opened except by said jury commission. From time to time, as ordered by the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, or one of the justices thereof holding a special term for the trial for condemnation proceedings, the jury commission shall publicly break the seal of said special box and proceed to draw therefrom by lot and without previous examination the names of such number of persons as the said court may from time to time direct to serve as jurors in condemnation proceedings, and certify the names so drawn to the clerk of said court. At the time of each drawing of condemnation jurors from said special box there shall be in said special box the names of not less than 100 persons possessing the qualifications hereinbefore prescribed. Except as in this section specially provided, sections 198 to 217, inclusive, of this code, so far as the same may be applicable, shall govern the qualifications of said jurors in condemnation cases and the duties and conduct of said jury commissioners under this section. No person shall be eligible to serve as a condemnation juror who has served as such juror within one year.

"SEC. 485. Citation to owners: The said court, holding a district court of the United States, shall thereupon cite all the owners and other persons interested to appear in said court, at a time to be fixed by the court, to answer said petition; and if it shall appear to the court that there are any owners or other persons interested who are under disability, the court shall give public notice of the time at which it will proceed with the matter of condemnation; and at such time, if it shall appear that there are any persons under disability who have appeared or who have not appeared, the court shall appoint a guardian ad litem for each such person, and shall thereupon order the jury commission to draw from the special box the names of as many persons as the court may direct, and from among the persons so drawn the court shall thereupon appoint a jury of five capable and disinterested persons, to which jury the court shall administer an oath or affirmation that they are not interested in any manner in the land to be condemned and are not related to the parties interested therein, and that they will, without favor or partiality, and to the best of their judgment, appraise the value of the respective interests of all persons concerned in such lands.

"SEC. 486. The court, before accepting the jury, shall hear any objections that may be made to any member thereof, and shall have full power and authority to pass upon any such objection and to excuse any juror or cause any vacancy in the jury, when empaneled, to be filled; and after the jury shall have been organized and shall have viewed and examined the land and premises affected by the condemnation proceeding, they shall proceed, in the presence of the court, to hear and receive such evidence as may be offered or submitted on behalf of the District of Columbia and by any person or persons having any interest in the proceeding. When the hearing is concluded, the jury, or a majority of them, shall return to the court, in writing, their appraisement of the value of the interests of all persons, respectively, in such land where said appraisement shall be recorded. In making their decision the jury shall take into consideration, whenever a part only is taken, the benefit to the remainder of the tract, and shall give their appraisement accordingly.

"SEC. 487. The said court shall hear and determine any objections or exceptions that may be filed to any appraisement of the jury and shall have the power to vacate and set any appraisement aside, in whole or in part, when satisfied that it is unjust or unreasonable, in which event the court shall order the jury commission to draw from the special box the names of as many persons as the court may direct, and from among the persons so drawn the court shall thereupon appoint a new jury of five capable and disinterested persons, who shall proceed as in the case of the first jury: Provided, That if vacated in part the residue of the appraisement as to the land condemned shall not be affected thereby: And provided further, That the objections or exceptions to the appraisement shall be filed within 20 days after the return of the appraisement to the court: And provided further, That the appraisement of the new jury shall be final when confirmed by the court.

"SEC. 488. If the appraisement of the jury should not be objected to by the parties interested, it shall be confirmed by the court, or, if the appraisement of the new jury is confirmed by the court, the commissioners of said District shall pay the amount awarded by the jury out of the appropriation made therefore or deposit the same in the same manner as directed in section 491n of said Code of Law, and thereupon the land condemned shall become and be the property of the District.

"SEC. 489. In every case involving the condemnation of land in the District of Columbia, at the close of the hearing thereof, the court shall fix a time in which the jury shall return its verdict or to report to the court the reasons why said verdict or appraisement can not be returned by the time fixed: Provided, That the court shall have the power, within its discretion, to extend the time for the return of the verdict or appraisement.

"SEC. 490. It shall be optional with the commissioners to abide by the verdict of the jury and occupy the land appraised by them, or, within a reasonable time to be fixed by the court in its order confirming the verdict, to abandon the same, without being liable to damage therefor.

"SEC. 491. Nothing herein contained shall affect any suit or proceeding heretofore begun, now pending, or hereafter to be instituted by or on behalf of the United States for the condemnation of land for any purpose; but all such suits and proceedings shall be conducted in accordance with existing law or such laws as hereafter may be enacted."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The CHIEF CLERK. Strike out the period at the end of the bill and insert in lieu thereof a colon, and the following:

Provided further, That no part of the amount of any item appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum which in the aggregate exceeds 10 per cent of the amount of any item appropriated in this act on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I think the amendment should be pending.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under objection, the amendment will go over.

Mr. BRUCE. What is the nature of the bill?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It is not the bill, it is an amendment that is now being considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment and the bill will go over, under objection.

EXPLOSION AT NAVAL AMMUNITION DEPOT, LAKE DENMARK, N. J.

The bill (H. R. 12236) to provide an appropriation for the payment of certain claims of persons who suffered property damage, death, or personal injury due to the explosion at the naval ammunition depot, Lake Denmark, N. J., July 10, 1926, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I think the bill should be explained.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, if I may have an opportunity briefly to explain it, the bill provides for the payment of the award which has been allowed by the Navy Department and the accounting department, amounting to $216,528.49, providing payment for personal injury and property damage because of an explosion at Lake Denmark at the naval ammunition depot, several years ago.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator if the bill includes all the claims?

Mr. EDGE. No; it does not include all the claims, but merely the claims which the accounting department has passed upon. It is approved by the accounting department and approved by the Navy Department, and has the unanimous support of the subcommittee of the Committee on Claims.

The people involved have been without any remuneration for over two years. The bill has the unanimous approval of all the departments and committees having responsibility.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, on the statement made, I think the bill should pass.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Claims, with amendments, on page 1, line 5, to strike out "$161,622.10" and insert in lieu thereof "$216,528.49"; on page 2, line 5, after the word "session," to insert the words "and House Document Numbered 310, Seventieth Congress, first session"; and in line 8, after the numerals "1800," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, however, That should any of the civilian claimants in the above-mentioned documents decline to accept in full settlement the amounts so recommended, the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and directed to reopen and reinvestigate such claims and transmit each such claim with supporting papers and a report of his findings of facts and recommendation to the Comptroller General of the United States who shall award the claimant or claimants such amount or amounts as he shall adjudge fair and just, according to the said act of March 2, 1927 (44 Stat. pt. 3, p. 1800).

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $216,528.49, or such portion as may be necessary, to enable the Comptroller General of the United States to make payment of claims in full settlement for property damage, death, or personal injury due to the explosion at the naval ammunition depot, Lake Denmark, N. J., July 10, 1926, to the respective persons and in the respective amounts as recommended by the Comptroller General of the United States, and as fully set forth in House Document No. 202, Seventieth Congress, first session, and House Document No. 310, Seventieth Congress, first session, pursuant to the act of March 2, 1927 (44 Stat. pt. 3, p. 1800): Provided, however, That should any of the civilian claimants in the above-mentioned documents decline to accept in full settlement the amounts so recommended, the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and directed to reopen and reinvestigate such claims and transmit each such claim with supporting papers and a report of his findings of facts and recommendation to the Comptroller General of the United States, who shall award the claimant or claimants such amount or amounts as he shall adjudge fair and just according to the said act of March 2, 1927 (44 Stat. pt. 3, p. 1800).

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, what is the reason for the increase in the amount allowed from $161,000 to $216,000?

Mr. EDGE. For the reason that a number of additional claims have been allowed by the Navy Department between the time the bill was introduced in the House at the last session of Congress and the present time. It is all covered in the report as an additional allowance because of additional claims approved.

Mr. OVERMAN. Presented and approved by the Navy Department?

Mr. EDGE. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Can the Senator give any information with reference to how many other claims there may be?

Mr. EDGE. The report says there are, I believe, still 47 claims pending on which they have not had opportunity to make a complete examination.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, there is no report in my file. I want to inquire of the Senator if it is conceded on the part of the Government that there is liability?

Mr. EDGE. As a matter of fact I can not answer that directly. Of course, the causes of the explosion have never been successfully established, but the Navy Department after long inquiry, which the Senator may recall, decided without question that the personal and property damage to those who resided around the reservation, as recommended by their representatives, should be paid. Congress enacted the necessary legislation instructing the Navy Department to make the investigation and report the total of the awards.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let us suppose the explosion was occasioned by a bolt of lightning that struck the arsenal.

Mr. EDGE. After thorough and complete inquiry on the part of the Navy Department that possibility was never established.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I merely instance that as one of any number of causes which might have occasioned the explosion without any kind of responsibility upon the part of the Government of the United States. I would like to know what is the basis upon which we are going to pay the property owners and those suffering losses in the various amounts involved?

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] was a member of the subcommittee, and he can no doubt answer the Senator from Montana much better than I could.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, the liability was fixed by the department against the Government and has never been disputed by anyone. Congress enacted a law authorizing us to make the investigation as to the amounts the various people were entitled to receive.

Mr. FLETCHER. It was determined that there was foundation for the claims?

Mr. CARAWAY. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Was it referred to the Navy Department to ascertain the amount of the damages and then submit it to the Congress?

Mr. CARAWAY. I do not so understand. I do not think there is any question as to liability. I do not see how there could be.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Apparently the liability of the Government has been conceded by the department, but I would like to know whether that was conceded out of possibly the persuasive eloquence of the Senator from New Jersey or whether there was some foundation in fact for the conclusion that the Government was liable?

Mr. CARAWAY. I do not think there could be any shadow of doubt about the liability. I think it is conceded by everybody.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Can the Senator tell us what is the basis of the concession?

Mr. CARAWAY. I do not have it now in mind, as it has been some time since I have had active connection with the matter. It came to the committee and was agreed upon, and the legislation was recommended and enacted providing for the investigation, and it then came back for this settlement. As to the method by which they computed the damage I can not enlighten the Senator. For instance, where one was injured personally, I understand they allowed him the amount of his doctor bills and his lost time, but allowed him nothing for his pain and suffering. I think they have been entirely too strict, and I think the settlement is made to the advantage of the Government and against the people who suffered the injuries and the loss of property.

Mr. EDGE. May I call the attention of the Senator from Montana again to the fact that on March 2, 1927, a bill passed by Congress was approved by the President instructing the Navy Department to make the investigation, apparently assuming the responsibility. The bill now before the Senate is the result of such investigation ordered by the Congress.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That does not enlighten me as to the situation. Congress directed an investigation into the amount of damages which had been sustained and a report on that investigation has been made. It is reported that so much is due. Now, the question arises as to whether we should authorize the payment, and in order to do so it did seem to me we should have some kind of information indicating why the Government is in any way liable.

Mr. EDGE. The committee and the board of inquiry, as set forth in the report, raise no question as to the liability.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But they were not called upon to investigate the question as to whether the Government was or was not liable. They were simply called upon to investigate the amount of damages.

Mr. EDGE. Will the Senator from Montana advise me how it would be possible for us to decide, after the inquiry had been completed and report made, whether it was an act of the Almighty through a bolt from heaven or because of the carelessness of some particular individual employed by the Government?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If that question had been investigated by any judicial or other tribunal, of course, they would make a report to us giving us the facts, showing that there was liability upon the part of the Government of the United States.

Mr. EDGE. In my judgment the report fully sets forth the liability.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide an appropriation for the payment of claims of persons who suffered property damage, death, or personal injury due to the explosion at the naval amunition depot, Lake Denmark, N. J., July 10, 1926, and to provide a means for further investigation and payment in certain cases."

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVES IN CONGRESS

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 11725) for the apportionment of Representatives in Congress.

Mr. VANDENBERG obtained the floor.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Michigan yield to me?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, now that the Senator from Michigan has been able to have his bill placed before the Senate upon motion, which motion, I may say, I supported, I am going to ask him if he will permit unanimous consent that we revert to Calendar No. 785, being the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 117) authorization an investigation and survey for the Nicaraguan canal, with the understanding that if there shall be any objection I shall of course withdraw the joint resolution, and if there shall not be any objection, then, we may vote on the joint resolution and accomplish what we have been endeavoring to accomplish.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I feel that the reapportionment bill is of such importance that nothing should intervene until it shall have been acted upon. Therefore, I object to the request of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I greatly appreciate the courtesy of the Senate in permitting me to make a statement about the pending reapportionment bill. I thoroughly understand the intent of the permission, and there is no possibility, I am well aware, of passing the proposed legislation in the remainder of the morning hour. My sole purpose is to present to the Senate and the country my conception of what I believe to be, without any possible chance for argument, the fundamental constitutional challenge that lies at the bar of the Senate of the United States at this time.

Mr. President, it has been my privilege to report from the Committee on Commerce a bill for the apportionment of Representatives in Congress. A significant subtitle might appropriately describe it also as a bill for the honest apportionment of presidential electors. But a still more pertinent and all-inclusive definition can proclaim it a bill to validate the Constitution of the United States.

In this latter character it could not be outweighed in importance by any other legislation pending in the forum of the Senate. Other matters may seem, in the vicissitude of the moment, more immediately necessitous. But in the last analysis the Constitution stands, or nothing else matters.

This is my justification for intruding upon the Senate's conscience at a time when so many other momentous problems clamor for attention. I feel honor bound and oath bound to put the issue to my colleagues. Under the rules of the Senate and in consideration of present and prospective congestion on the calendar, I am forced to make my own opportunity for this presentation. I am persuaded that the issue warrants my action. When great States and great constituencies are outrageously victimized in their fundamental rights by the congressional evasion of basic and mandatory constitutional responsibilities, I am persuaded that the Senate will first condone and then welcome what otherwise it might classify as intrusion upon the regular order of business. Nothing can be paramount to the Constitution.

I listened within the past few days to an illuminating debate dealing with the necessity in many senatorial minds of finding new ways to bring the Nation into harmony with the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution. There have been many formulas proposed by distinguished gentlemen in the last few months for the purpose of attaining the same end. One proposes a $25,000 reward for the best means for enforcing prohibition; another offers $25,000 for the best formula for repealing prohibition. In my judgment, Mr. President, the formula this Nation needs is not for enforcement or repeal, but a formula that shall reevangelize the American people into an understanding that everything we have and are and can ever hope to be is dependent upon constitutional sanctity, and none of us can choose which section of the Constitution we shall honor and which section we shall scorn.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I am very sorry I can not yield to the Senator from Maryland. I am anxious to conclude before the hour of 2 o'clock, and I do not propose to be detoured into a discussion of prohibition.

Mr. BRUCE. I merely desire to ask the Senator from Michigan a question.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I decline to yield, Mr. President.

Mr. BRUCE. Very well.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I raise the point solely to say that impulse and example in high places in our Government are the best factors of which I know for encouraging constitutional fidelity in the body of the Nation, and I find no such example, I find no such impulse when I confront the fact that for eight years a fundamental challenge at the very root source of constitutional guarantees has been ignored and evaded in these halls. I shall be as brief and concise as possible in presenting this issue. My sole purpose is to acquaint the Senate with the contents and the objectives of House bill 11725 and to amplify Report No. 1446, which has been filed with the Senate.

Mr. President, this is a measure passed on January 11 by the House of Representatives and reported without amendment to the Senate on January 15. It sets up a just rule for the reapportionment of the House, with a maintained limit of 435 Members, on the basis of the 1930 census. It seeks to protect this approaching census against a contemptuous repetition of eight years of failure or refusal to put the 1920 census to its mandatory constitutional usages. Thereby it seeks to order constitutional justice as between the States of the Union and to guarantee a cure for the insufferable trespass of nearly a decade past. It is an insurance policy covering the constitutional rights of the American people.

In order that interested Senators may not break my sequence I state at the outset the six phases of the problem which I shall treat. Thus, perhaps, any interrogatories may await their particular target, and I shall be glad to be interrupted at any time in respect to any of these concerns.

I shall briefly discuss:

First. The basic constitutional challenge as it confronts this Senate.

Second. The effect upon the Electoral College if nullifying contempts persist.

Third. The effect on seats in the House of Representatives.

Fourth. The wise decision to limit the size of the House to 435 Members.

Fifth. The proposed delegation of ministerial power to the Secretary of Commerce in the event any decennial Congress fails to act independently as the spirit of the Constitution requires.

Sixth. The use of the so-called "system of major fractions," which is involved in the mathematical problem of this hour.

These are the pertinent factors upon which the Senate must inform itself—if, indeed, it is not already informed beyond my powers of added illumination—in concluding that it should give early and decisive approval to this bill to validate the Constitution of the United States. So I hasten to pursue this schedule, always addressing the one objective, namely, that past defaults, which have been variously branded as "brazen defiance," as "tyranny in the raw," and as "insufferable political selfishness"—to borrow a few of the less invidious epithets—shall come to an end here and now.

CONSTITUTIONAL DUTY

Our first logical consultation in any matter of constitutional concern is the great charter itself. Therefore I ask the Senate to turn to Article I, and to turn there, I regret to observe, for the first time since August 8, 1911, when the last reapportionment act became a law. The very numeral which identifies the article is significant. It is No. 1. It is, in other words, the base, the starting point, the genesis, whence rises the entire subsequent structure of the Republic. No. 1 means No. 1—not only No. 1 in the foundation layers of the Constitution but No. 1 in the constitutional responsibilities of a faithful Congress. Omitting detail, here is this No. 1 mandate in the Constitution of the United States:

> Representatives * * * shall be apportioned among the several States * * * according to their respective numbers. * * * The actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States and within every subsequent term of 10 years * * *.

Mr. President, in the face of this mandatory language, particularly when it is read in the light of the vivid debates out of which it sprang, I can not see any rational escape from the conclusion that a regular decennial census and a regular, sequent, decennial reapportionment is the paramount constitutional responsibility resting upon Senators who take a special, and presumably binding, oath to support and defend this primary instrument of American Government. I should let this rest as an axiom were it not for the fact that it has been strangely attacked by some time arguments which have tried to chisel the mandatory challenge out of it, and were it not for the even more aggravating constitutional contempts which contemporaneously have spurned and flaunted and nullified it for the past eight sterile years.

Once more, note the precise language: "Actual enumeration shall"—not may—"be made within every term of 10 years" and "Representatives shall"—not may—"be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers."

If this language means anything at all, Mr. President, it means that there should have been a 1920 census—which there was—and an immediate reapportionment based thereon—which there was not, and which there has not been from that day to this. Such a lapse, I submit, raises what ought to be a question of constitutional privilege in the Senate when, at last, we are invited by the House of Representatives to join it in a warranty that 1930 shall be guaranteed against a renewal and a perpetuation of this constitutional affront, which popular complaisance will not much longer tolerate.

Does the Constitution require decennial census and prompt reapportionment based thereon? It does, not only in its letter but also in its spirit. Here are my reasons:

I rely first upon a reasonable construction of the actual language: "Enumeration shall be made" and "Representatives shall be apportioned." I rely, secondly, upon the expressed intent of the framers—the authors of this language—which may not be binding testimony in a court of law, but which is binding testimony in the court of public opinion.

The constitutional convention of 1787 almost broke upon the problem of representation. It resolved its hazardous perplexity by establishing a Senate in which every State, regardless of population, has equal voice, and a House of Representatives in which every unit of population is intended to have equal voice, regardless of its distribution as between States. The convention intended that one rule should be as sacred as the other, even though it threw extra protection around the smaller State and its right to two Senators. Indeed, the very fact that the less populated State has this special constitutional protection ought to emphasize the impropriety of any complaint upon its part when the more heavily populated State asks for its constitutional rights in the House of Representatives. Indeed, the heinous crime of attempting to reduce the constitutional representation of a State in the Senate would be no greater ravishment of the theory of the Constitution than is the crime of robbing some other State of its constitutional representation in the House of Representatives. The former infringement would produce revolution. The latter, however, is supposed to produce only passing protest. What a tragic paradox!

I said I rely for my constructions upon the intent of those great men who framed the Constitution. James Madison declared to the convention that the States "ought to vote in the same proportion in which their citizens would do if the people of all the States were collectively met." His Virginian colleague, Mr. Randolph, proposed the census for the express purpose of creating an enumeration out of which equitable reapportionment should flow, and time and again he warned against the iniquity of permitting any divorce between these functions. Mr. Hugh Williamson, of North Carolina, declared it would be "the duty of the legislature to do what is right" in this respect, and that it could not be "at liberty to do or not to do it."

I shall not trespass with needless multiplication of these exhibits. Suffice it to add that the great Mr. Justice Story later declared that decennial reapportionment is "a duty positively enjoined by the Constitution." I believe it has been correctly said in a previous congressional report upon this subject that "the founders of our Government would have been amazed at a situation in which a population three times the population which existed at the time of the adoption of the Constitution is denied fair and equitable representation in the House of Representatives."

This leads me to my third reliance, when I declare that congressional failure to reapportion is an ugly constitutional default which the Senate should cure in this session, now that it is challenged by the House to do so, regardless of whether it does another single thing between now and the 4th of March, when a President will be inaugurated whose credentials spring from an Electoral College not constitutionally constituted because of this same poison at the well-springs of the American system. My third reliance is the existing fact of representative inequalities which make a travesty out of those pretended equalities which no man will deny that the Constitution presumably preserves.

The last apportionment in 1910 embraced 91,000,000 people. The 1920 census reported 105,000,000 people. The 1930 estimate is, speaking roundly, 123,000,000 people. The difference between 1910 and 1930 is 32,000,000 people. These latter people to-day are virtually disfranchised. The congressional structure made to fit 91,000,000 people is serving 123,000,000 people. Nothing could be more grossly un-American. Nothing could do greater violence to fundamental rights supposedly established in 1776 and supposedly stabilized in 1787.

I do not intend to permit invidious comparisons to intrude upon this argument. I hope I should be making the same argument if my own State of Michigan were one of the beneficiaries of this lapse instead of one of the chief victims. But, Mr. President, I set it down here simply by way of illustration that there are three congressional districts in Michigan which together had a population of 1,400,000 back in 1920, and which to-day probably have a population of 2,500,000, an average of over 800,000 to a district, whereas there are many other districts in other States with not more than 160,000 people. There are as many as 1,500,000 people in one congressional district in California represented by one Congressman, whereas there are whole States elsewhere in the Union approximating 1,500,000 people with as many as six or seven or eight Congressmen.

Surely there is no need to prolong or multiply this prejudicial arithmetic. I but state the obvious. The records are familiar and well known; but they are no more familiar or better known than the plain fact that it has been our constitutional duty for eight years to correct them, and that we dare not longer deny a prospective correction when it is now offered to us by the House itself. I repeat that it must have been the mandatory intent of the framers of the Constitution that this horrible travesty upon equality of representation never should persist. Temperate language can not assess the outrage.

One more—a fourth reliance—I submit in support of my constitutional interpretation.

Precedent and practice have something to do with the fixation of constitutional principles. From 1790 to 1910 Congress never permitted more than a maximum of two years to intervene between the completion of a census and its validation in a reapportionment. Frequently it has acted within one year. For 120 faithful years, in which constitutional oaths meant what they said, Congress never lapsed in this momentous duty. Then came the nullifying interlude. A sterile and deadly interim has evaded or ignored the plain and paramount mandate—mandate No. 1—in our great basic charter; and I am forced to put the chief responsibility where it belongs. It does not belong upon the House of Representatives. It belongs, let us confess, upon this Senate. The House did do its constitutional duty, entirely consonant with tradition, by promptly validating the 1920 census. It passed a reapportionment bill on January 19, 1921. This bill was received by the Senate on January 20, 1921, and sent to the then existing Census Committee. From that committee it never emerged alive. It was not embraced; it was embalmed.

I have found that many Senators have forgotten that dark entry on the record. I do not criticize them. It is not my right. The issue never was raised on the floor of the Senate; but such is the fact. I submit that it puts the Senate of to-day under special obligation to see to it that no legislative congestion upon the calendar or any other untoward event shall conspire to repeat such jeopardy to fundamental constitutional rights. Otherwise, we can not acquit ourselves of setting a dubious—yea, a lethal—example to a citizenship which must support and sustain the Constitution if our inheritance shall persevere.

All that we are, all that we have, all that we can ever hope to be, are finally dependent upon constitutional integrity. I have heard able Senators argue by the hour upon this floor over comparatively technical points of constitutional construction in a scrupulous effort to be meticulously faithful—technical points that have been as Greek to my layman's mind—technical points in law which there is a Supreme Court to decide. Surely they will not be less devoted when they confront a constitutional challenge so plain that a child can read and understand, yet a challenge upon which no Supreme Court can ever pass to protect the injured—a challenge resting wholly upon the conscience of this Congress.

I have been particularly struck by the observation upon this score of a distinguished Detroit jurist, Circuit Judge Alfred J. Murphy, who clearly labels failure to reapportion as a species of treason.

ELECTORAL COLLEGE

Here is another ominous consideration.

Mr. President, a just representation in the Electoral College is involved in a default in constitutional apportionment and this contemplation is quite as insufferable as the trespass upon congressional equities. Not only does a failure to reapportion pursuant to the mandate of the Constitution taint the validity of Congress; it also taints the validity of the Presidency itself. Thus does the challenge pyramid. We are indeed dealing with the well springs of republican institutions, the streams of which can rise no higher than their source. It is appalling that so vital a concern should have been even momentarily ignored. It is appalling that eight years should have come and gone—that four Congresses and two Presidents should have been chosen in the interlude without correction in this constitutional lapse. But it will be still more appalling if the Senate shall not now promptly join with the House, upon the latter's unselfish initiative, and bring this nullification to a decisive end. A jeopardized Electoral College is the final affront to constitutional integrity and ordered government.

The Senate is entirely familiar with the fact that presidential electors are apportioned to each State according to the combined number of their Senators and Representatives. Hence, ipso facto, if a State is robbed of its fair quota of Representatives, it is robbed of its fair quota of presidential electors. But let me remind you of the precise constitutional language upon this score. I am quoting Article II, section 1, paragraph 2:

> Each State shall appoint * * * a number of electors equal to the whole number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress.

There is a grave question immediately raised as to the actual validity of a presidential election recorded through an Electoral College not composed of electors apportioned to the States according to the number of Representatives to which each State "may be entitled." Not the number of Representatives which each State actually has—do not neglect the exact language—but the number to which each State "may be entitled." Perhaps it will be replied that a State is "entitled" only to such a number of electors as it has been assigned by the process of law, however false to the Constitution the given law may happen to be. But it is not to be forgotten that when the junior Senator from Washington raised this point in a radio address last summer, there was widespread speculation over the baneful possibilities. No such defect could be successfully conjured when presidential results are as decisive as those of 1924 and 1928—I make this observation with entire sympathy for those upon the mourner's bench—but the fact remains that two Presidents have now been chosen out of Electoral Colleges in which many States have not had the voice to which they are "entitled" by the spirit, if not the letter, of the Constitution. If this infirmity persists until the presidential election of 1932, here will be a minimum of 23 misplaced electoral votes. Any time a President is chosen within the limits of these misplaced electoral votes—and it is interesting to note in passing that the presidential election of 1916 was determined by precisely this 23 margin—there is present the seed of trouble. Such a question never may be raised. But it is constitutional negligence to leave the question even remotely open.

Mr. President, we all remember historically the cataclysm that swept America in 1876, when a presidential election hung upon 1 electoral vote, and when the canvass had to be submitted to a special expedient branch of the American Government raised for that exigent purpose.

The late Vice President Thomas R. Marshall said to me that nothing prevented a second Civil War at that time except the selfless patriotism of Samuel J. Tilden. If we have behind us the unanswerable reminder that any doubt upon the validity of an electoral college can bring us that close to a breach, we are indeed negligent in a fundamental responsibility if we do not close the breach now that we have contemporary opportunity.

Mr. President, entirely regardless of the legal phase, the equitable phase is beyond palliation. Smaller States have their liberal right of spokesmanship protected by absolute and permanent equality in Senate membership. This in turn gives them a constitutionally sustained preference in the Electoral College under any circumstances. Again, merely for the purpose of illustration, let me point out that this gives Nevada one ultimate presidential elector for every 26,000 people, while the State of California, on the basis of 1930 estimates, will have but one presidential elector for every 365,000 inhabitants. I do not complain against this sort of seeming discrepancy so long as it is supported by constitutional warrant, and I heartily agree with the Constitution's theory that it takes something more than congested centers of concentrated population to make a nation. But after the smaller State has been freely and permanently awarded this tremendous advantage—this handicap allowance, as it were—I do most vigorously protest against a further allowance as a result of congressional indisposition to rectify the disparities disclosed by each succeeding census. It is not a pleasant task for the less populous States to give up an occasional Congressman, and thus also an occasional presidential elector, pursuant to constitutional order. But let the less populous States remember that they have special and peculiar protections embedded in this Constitution, and they should be the last to encourage any breach in the constitutional wall. This bill, while still leaving Congress to its own conscience in the first instance, puts an ultimate watchman on this wall and arms him with the power of vigilance if others sleep.

Just one more specific exhibit upon this particular score. If the existing apportionment were to persist into 1932, here are some figures that have been prepared to show relative discrepancies as between four States: Massachusetts will have one presidential elector for each 242,000 of its people; Texas will have one for each 281,000; Michigan will have one for each 317,000; and California will have one for each 365,000. The spread, in four States of comparable size, will be from a unit of 242,000 to a unit of 365,000.

If we reapportion on the basis that it is estimated this bill will work, the State of Massachusetts will have one for each 257,000 of its citizens; the State of Texas one for each 256,000; the State of Michigan and the State of California one for each 250,000 of their citizens. Under the present apportionment 123,000 more citizens are required to give California an electoral vote than in Massachusetts. Under the new system the entire range in those four States will be a matter of 7,000 citizens only.

I submit that this is a type of equity which the Senate must approve. We must be fair with each other, one State to another. We must accept our obligations as well as our privileges under the Constitution. Presidents and Congressmen must be chosen with a just regard for the constitutional rights of every State. They have not been for eight years. They will not be for an indefinite time to come if this bill is not passed by the Senate, because the practical fact is that no other bill can survive this session, and each succeeding session will face progressively multiplying obstacles, and every Senator familiar with the facts knows that both of these statements are absolutely true.

ESTIMATED EFFECT ON DISTRIBUTION OF REPRESENTATIVES

It is somewhat speculative to anticipate what the congressional effect of this bill will be on the basis of the 1930 census. The only possible prospectus is that of the Census Bureau itself, which prophesies a 1930 population of 122,537,000 for the purpose of this reapportionment. The population base in 1920 was 105,000,000. In 1910 it was 91,000,000.

The 1930 estimate may not be precise. But the Census Bureau is sufficiently accurate in its past performances to make the use of its figures reliable for present purposes.

On this base this bill will change 23 seats in the House of Representatives. Eleven States will gain. Seventeen States will lose. Twenty States will be unaffected.

I dislike, however, to discuss this bill in terms of "loss" and "gain." No State may truthfully be said to have "gained" anything when it merely stabilizes its equality of rights pursuant to the guarantees of the Constitution. No State may accurately be said to have "lost" anything when it settles back to a basis of constitutional equalities.

It is only the Constitution itself which "gains" or "loses" in this contemplation. It "gains" strength and stability when it is scrupulously obeyed and faithfully honored. It "loses" vitality and life when it is ignored or evaded—no matter how plausible the expedient excuse.

Perhaps there is still another "loss and gain," namely, in the prestige and dignity and honor of the Congress itself. We "gain" the respect of the Nation when we obey the instrument of which we are the oath-bound creatures. We proportionately "lose" when we are guilty of constitutional contempts against which the people cry out in protest and outrage.

I dare to believe that no Senator will vote upon this bill pursuant solely to the effect of its arithmetic upon his State. Any such opportunism would reduce constitutionalism to the basis of mere huckstering.

The prospective effect of this reapportionment is as follows. Eleven States gain as follows:

Arizona	1
California	6
Connecticut	1
Florida	1
Michigan	4
New Jersey	2
North Carolina	1
Ohio	3
Oklahoma	1
Texas	2
Washington	1

Seventeen States lose as follows:

Alabama	1
Indiana	2
Iowa	2
Kansas	1
Kentucky	2
Louisiana	1
Maine	1
Massachusetts	1
Mississippi	2
Missouri	3
Nebraska	1
New York	1
North Dakota	1
Pennsylvania	1
Tennessee	1
Vermont	1
Virginia	1

Twenty States are unaffected: Arkansas, Colorado, Delaware, Georgia, Idaho, Illinois, Maryland, Minnesota, Montana, Nevada, New Hampshire, New Mexico, Oregon, Rhode Island, South Carolina, South Dakota, Utah, West Virginia, Wisconsin, and Wyoming.

Without intending invidious comparisons in any degree, an analyst is bound to emphasize the spectacular demonstration of constitutional fidelities made by the majorities in those House delegations from some States which will have fewer Congressmen as a result of the expected operations of this bill, yet which are recorded on this recent roll call in favor of the bill. They are from the States of Maine, Massachusetts, New York, and Pennsylvania.

SIZE OF THE HOUSE

This bill decides, at least for the time being, that the total membership in the House of Representatives shall not exceed the existing limit of 435. If it had nothing else in it the bill would be emphatically worthy and challenging upon this score alone. To register the decisive opinion of the present Congress that it is time to stop the everlasting expansion in House membership to suit mere political exigency would be a tremendous service to American institutions. One distinguished Member of this body told me recently that he thought efficiency and effectual democracy would be promoted if the limit could be set back to 200. In other words, he correctly distinguishes between quality and quantity in the measure of democracy. As practical men we must recognize the impossibility of any such present pursuit, however. If it has taken 8 years to get an agreement in the House to retain the existing limit, it would take 80 years to get an agreement for a large and revolutionary reduction. To defeat the attainable for the sake of straining for the unattainable would be a distinct disservice to the Constitution and to the principle of limitation itself.

There is nothing sacrosanct about this number 435. It simply happens to be the contemporary limit upon which the House itself has taken a courageous stand, refusing all efforts to blow it higher. If the House, with the acute self-interest of its own Members at stake, is willing to register this principle of limitation, it would be a tragic lapse if the Senate should neglect or refuse to agree.

Heretofore the usual method for obtaining agreement to decennial reapportionment has been the expedient recourse of increasing the total membership in a sufficient degree to permit every sitting Member to retain his seat. As a result of this elastic pursuit of the course of least resistance the size of the House has doubled in less than 100 years. The greatest rate of growth has been in the more recent decades. On the basis of 1930 estimates it would require a House of 534 Members—an increase of nearly 100 in 20 short years—to permit a ratio of representation under which no State would lose a Member. It requires no wrench of the imagination, if these expedient trends be not stopped, to foresee a comparatively early day when the size of the House would approach sheer chaos. Already benches have had to be substituted for desks in the other Chamber to accommodate the distinguished throng. Soon they must hang out the "standing room only" sign. It would consume nine 8-hour days to permit each Member to make a 10-minute speech on one subject. The result is not greater articulation for democracy. The result is less, rather than more, freedom of action. Indeed, freedom of action, which, after all, is the true measure of democracy, already has become a legend. The distinguished junior Senator from Ohio, who returns to this body after another honorable turn of service in the other House, openly declared as long ago as 1921 that after a membership in the House under four apportionments the one outstanding thing with which he was impressed was "the diminished prestige of the House and the diminished standing of the individual Member." Here, in this pending bill, is the golden opportunity for the Senate to join the House in the declaration of the great and essential principle of limitation.

We do not thus depart from the intent of the founders of the Nation, Mr. President. Rather, we validate their prescient warnings. Innumerable proofs are available. I content myself with two. I take it that none will deny the authority of the Federalist Papers as an interpretation of what was in the minds of the constitutional fathers. In their tenth chapter is this admonition:

> Representatives must be raised to a certain number in order to guard against the cabals of a few, and, however large it may be, they must be limited to a certain number in order to guard against the confusion of a multitude.

Precisely that sensible limitation the Senate now is invited to join the House in registering. Again—and this is tremendously significant and pertinent—the Federalist Papers in their fifty-eighth chapter have this to say:

> In all legislative assemblies, the greater the number composing them, the fewer will be the men who will in fact direct their proceedings. * * * The people can never err more than in supposing that by multiplying their representatives beyond a certain limit they strengthen the barrier against the government of a few. Experience will forever admonish them that, on the contrary, after securing a sufficient number for the purposes of safety, of local information, and of diffusive sympathy with the whole society, they will counteract their own views by every addition to their representatives. The countenance of the government may become more democratic, but the soul that animates it will be more oligarchic. The machine will be enlarged, but the fewer, and often the more secret, will be the springs by which its motions are directed.

I am sure the argument requires no further amplification upon this score. A correct reflection of constitutional intent and of contemporary necessity is plain as day. The House has decided for itself that it wants limitation upon its total membership. This is the first time since 1840 that so courageous and salutary a disposition has been evidenced. The Senate, which is itself a limited body, can not in conscience and public duty do less than agree. The pending measure invites us to join in this contribution to the best welfare of America's effectual democracy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DALE in the chair). The Senator from Michigan will suspend while the Chair makes an announcement which, the Chair will state, does not take the Senator from the floor.

The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 11526, the so-called cruiser bill.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I shall conclude very briefly, and I am sorry to intrude even for 15 minutes upon the time of the unfinished business, which I support with all my heart and soul.

DELEGATION OF POWER

Now we come to a feature of the apportionment bill which is the subject of some attacks which, while no doubt well meaning, are imaginary rather than real. They provide an excuse rather than a reason for opposition. I refer to the ministerial rôle assigned to the Secretary of Commerce, who is directed to do a specific problem in arithmetic subsequent to each decennial census. This arithmetic ultimately controls a reapportionment only in the event that the next Congress after the completion of a census fails promptly to meet its own independent constitutional responsibility to make its own reapportionment on the basis of any arithmetic which it chooses to consult. In other words, there is no external intervention unless and until Congress fails to do its own constitutional duty—as it has failed for eight sterile years—and even then the external intervention is merely the automatic operation of a rule which Congress itself ordains and which Congress subsequently can revoke whenever it is thus minded.

Here is the theory of the pending measure as approved by the House in respect of its own affairs. If Congress fails to reapportion in 1930–31, then automatically the House is reapportioned in accordance with the tabulation transmitted by the Secretary of Commerce in his ministerial capacity as provided in the bill and as now ordered by this Congress. In such an event he has no latitude or discretion of action. He enjoys no legislative function. He is told by Congress to take the 1930 census count, and by the method of so-called "major fractions" to divide it among the States into 435 congressional seats. There can be no speculation as to the result. There is only one result which any mathematician can reach. Congress thus subordinates its independent wisdom only to fundamental arithmetic, which not even a congressional filibuster could succeed in denying. Two and two inevitably make four in spite of sound and fury.

Mark you, Mr. President, this arithmetic does not become authoritative until after Congress has had a full, free, fair chance to write its own reapportionment law on this or any other basis which it may see fit to embrace. It is only in the event that Congress again persists in contempt of the constitutional mandate to "apportion Representatives among the several States, according to their respective numbers," that an automatic reapportionment occurs on the basis of the arithmetic done by the Secretary of Commerce. In other words, the bill in this particular boils itself down to this simple proposition. The 1930 census must result in constitutional reapportionment either (1) by the next Congress, according to its own free will and accord, or (2) according to a formula which Congress now expresses the belief is the proper and suitable formula.

What are the conjured objections?

First, it is argued by some distinguished gentlemen that this is an unwarranted and even an unconstitutional delegation of power to the Secretary of Commerce. But the truth is that it is no delegation of "power" at all. It is the delegation of an immutable problem in arithmetic and nothing else. It is the delegation of the task of doing a straight sum in mathematics to which there can be but one answer. This is purely ministerial. It is not legislative. It is not discretionary. Compare this with the wide and vital discretions which Congress has sublet to the Interstate Commerce Commission or to the President under the terms of the flexible tariff law. This latter delegation of power goes to the very heart of congressional prerogatives. Yet it has been upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States, in J. W. Hampton, Jr., & Co. against the United States, a decision rendered on April 9, 1928. The rôle of the Secretary of Commerce under this bill is but the lengthened shadow of his rôle when he takes the census itself. Congress does not iniquitously sublet its constitutional functions when it permits the Commerce Department to enumerate the people. No more does it violate any sensible rule when it asks him to apply a divisor, named by Congress, to the results of his enumeration. I am forced to say that gentlemen who criticize the alleged questionable constitutionalism of this simple process which is aimed to cure the larger and fundamental and paramount unconstitutionalism of continuing denial of the first article in the Constitution, seem to strain at a gnat and to swallow a camel.

A second alleged objection is that we are attempting to bind a future Congress and to strip it of autonomy. Such solicitude is touching but irrational. Every law we pass, Mr. President, binds a future Congress unless and until a future Congress changes it. We do not wipe out all the statutes every two years. We amend or repeal that which proves serially objectionable. Precisely the same authority stays with any future Congress in respect to this reapportionment rule. We simply say that if a future Congress does not want to establish its own rule in its own untrammeled right, then this present rule shall apply. We do not estop independent action in the future. We merely protect the integrity of the Constitution against inaction; and such inertia, I am persuaded, is not a congressional prerogative, even though it may be a habit.

For myself, Mr. President, I only regret that we can not establish a rule which does bind the future in relation to this constitutional fundament which involves the root sources not only of the representative arm of the Government but also the root sources of the Executive arm, as controlled by the Electoral College. There is no doubt about what the resurrected founders of the Republic would say if they were here. Mr. Randolph, of Virginia, bluntly put it to the framers of the Constitution in the Convention of 1787. He declared his apprehension lest "a pretext should never be wanting to postpone alterations in apportionment and keep the power in the hands of those who possessed it." He frankly argued his fears that "if the legislatures are left at liberty, they will never readjust the representation." He intended, in respect of these legislatures, to "tie their hands"—note the literal phrase borrowed from Randolph himself—"in such a manner that they could not sacrifice their trust to momentary consideration." He specifically warned that "if a fair representation of the people be not thus secured, the injustice of the Government will shake it to its foundations." I could support him by many other quotations from the great men who sat in that God-inspired forum. Suffice it at this point, however, to drop down to March 1, 1832, and to note prophetic words from the lips of John Quincy Adams:

> I should hope that a great and inveterate defect in the apportionment laws might be remedied. I would not prematurely despair of the Republic, but my forebodings are dark, and the worst of them is in contemplating the precipice before us.

No, Mr. President, if there is any legitimate criticism of a weakness in this bill it is not that it does bind future Congresses to obey the Constitution and to save us from the mockery and the anomaly of unrepresentative representation. It is, rather, that it does not thus bind. It does not bind any more than precisely the same type of legislation in 1850 prevented a subsequent Congress from going back to the old practice. This bill is no novelty. It had its forerunner, I repeat, in 1850. Neither on the basis of precedent nor logic can it be assailed to-day simply because it undertakes to invoke an automatic reapportionment in the event that the next Congress fails to initiate its own interpretation of the 1930 census.

Ah, but it is thus wrong because it is anticipatory, another critic says. But, Mr. President, better that great victimized constituencies, robbed of their constitutional rights for nearly a decade, should be permitted at least to "anticipate" justice at the hands of Congress than that they should see and hear nothing but grandiloquent gestures which "keep the word of promise to the ear and break it to the hope." Personally I should prefer, even at this late day, a straight-out reapportionment, with a 435 limit, based upon the 1920 census. Thus there would be no break in the continuity of congressional fidelities. But it were silly, or even hypocritical, not to face the realities.

The realities are these: First, this is the only reapportionment legislation which the House will approve in the present Congress; second, the next Congress will face the 1930 census, under which shifts in population will prove to have been so much greater than under the 1920 census that the human difficulties which have prevented a 1920 reapportionment will be multiplied to an extent to make 1930 reapportionment all but impossible; third, thus we shall drift to 1940—drifting all the while toward such resentments as in other days led our forefathers to actual revolt against the tyranny of taxation without representation.

We face a condition, not a theory. Senators who in such circumstance cling to theory and ignore conditions may be utterly conscientious—and I never quarrel with conscience—but they put us at the mercy of a quorum of mere words. Candor compels us to judge the future by the past. If this bill fails on the responsibility of the Senate, then all reapportionment fails for many years to come. Thus constitutionalism fails. Those who may be content to embrace the counsels of perfection as an excuse for rejecting the realities of fact in this vicissitude assume a hazardous responsibility.

MAJOR FRACTIONS

The bill provides that "the method of major fractions" shall be used in handling the arithmetic incident to the ultimate computation and allocation of Representatives. It is a specific and standard method with an identified meaning for mathematicians. I confess that it is something like an income-tax return in baffling the layman. But so is any other of the possible fraction methods that might be embraced. In other words, "major fractions" suffer no greater infirmity upon this score than would any other kindred recourse. I will endeavor to submit the contemplation in the plainest language possible.

Since 1790 there have been three different "fraction methods" used in determining apportionment among population remainders in the States after populations have been divided by the accepted quota figure.

So-called "rejected fractions" were used from 1790 to 1830. Since they were long since "rejected" in fact as well as name, it is needless to dwell upon them. They permitted no representation for any fraction, large or small.

Then so-called "major fractions" were used in the single reapportionment of 1840. This was the only reapportionment which actually reduced the total size of the House.

Then from 1850 to 1900 the so-called "Vinton method" was substituted. It broke down in certain ultimate anomalous situations in which it became evident that the larger the fraction the smaller the chance of its recognition.

In 1910, the last year that any reapportionment bill passed both branches of Congress, despite the plain mandate of the Constitution to the contrary, Congress returned to "major fractions." It was used in 1921 in the House bill which the Senate pigeonholed. It is used in the present bill. It is the method under which the sitting House was chosen. It is the method which the House has refused to change in connection with the present legislation. It is a refinement of the 1840 method as improved under the auspices of Prof. Walter F. Willcox, of Cornell University, who has been chief statistician for the Bureau of the Census.

The only controversy to-day is between so-called "major fractions" and a new system of so-called "equal proportions." The difference between the two methods is this: "Major fractions" reapportions the House absolutely on the basis of straight population. "Equal proportions" reapportions on the basis of a ratio between the individual in a given State and the whole population of that State.

Suppose Congress should want to make the total House membership 436 instead of 435. Who would get the 436th Congressman? According to "major fractions," that State would get the 436th Congressman which has the largest absolute number of unrepresented people—in other words, the State with the largest actual remainder. According to "equal proportions," that State would get the four hundred and thirty-sixth Congressman in which its own unrepresented portion bears the highest ratio to the total population of the State. "Equal proportions," in other words, is a mathematical subterfuge to cheat actual equality in the consideration given to citizens in different States. "Major fractions" is the method whereby every citizen, regardless of habitat, has the same weight in the apportionment to remainders. Under "major fractions" every State with more than 50 per cent of a remainder after its population is divided by the key apportionment number, gets a Congressman. A State having less than a 50 per cent remainder never gets the extra Congressman. Under "equal proportions" the reverse may be true.

The actual net difference between the two methods, of course, is small. It would have affected the seats of but three Congressmen on the basis of the 1920 census.

I submit that we should retain "major fractions": (1) Because it is the method approved by the House which should control its own problem in this respect; (2) because it is the method of the last reapportionment, the one under which the present Congress sits; (3) because it is the only method by which unadulterated recognition is given to straight population comparisons between the States—and it was the constitutional intent that population should be paramount in dictating House membership and apportionment; (4) because any other method now available would be an untried experiment. We learned through the "Vinton method" how treacherous these experiments may be. Certainly it is no time to embrace experiments when we are writing what purports to be a permanent and automatic system for future reapportionments.

CONCLUSION

Mr. President, I have concluded my analysis and discussion of this bill. I shall hope that the Senate shortly will permit it to come to a vote. I have omitted nothing pertinent to the real issue before us—namely, the practical possibility of getting legislation that will cure the existing constitutional mockery. By the same token I have refused to follow detours into irrelevant matters. For example, I have not discussed the interesting suggestion that the enumeration for apportionment purposes should count "citizens" instead of "people." That proposition must stand upon its own subsequent merits. It requires a constitutional amendment. It does not belong in this debate. Neither have I discussed the much-mooted fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution. This question of the alleged denial of suffrage to certain citizens raises an issue of fact—namely, Is the right of suffrage unconstitutionally abridged?—a fact violently controverted; it raises an issue of law—namely, if the denial were proven to exist, does not the fifteenth amendment direct offended parties to the Supreme Court for relief, instead of to the Congress, as might have been the case if the fourteenth amendment stood alone? James G. Blaine specifically made this latter deduction in his great Twenty Years of Congress.

I repeat, Mr. President, that I have deliberately omitted such collateral considerations in this discussion, precisely as I think it is the duty of the Senate to omit them from the scope of its immediate decision. Our immediate problem deserves to be settled without complication. The paramount importance of the basic challenge entitles it to an unhampered day in the forum of this parliament. All such by-products were excluded from the bill by the House most intimately affected by its terms. We do well to emulate this example.

The bill may not suit all Senators either in detail or prospectus. It is not altogether such a bill as I should have preferred. For example, I repeat that I dislike to leave a 10-year blemish on the constitutional record of the Congress by failure to have reapportioned pursuant to the 1920 census. But that blemish merely would be hidden—it could not be cured—by eleventh-hour repentance on the eve of another census. Infinitely greater will be the blemish if in a quarrel over past iniquities we here create a further and continuing iniquity which this bill would cure. Pride of opinion in such a moment deserves to be subordinated to pride of accomplishment.

Ever since I arrived in this Chamber, where I now gratefully acknowledge my colleagues have been uniformly considerate and hospitable, Senators have told me that reapportionment was simply awaiting House initiative. Although I disagreed with the attitude, I repeatedly heard it said that this is inherently "the business of the House." You know the familiar idiom, "When the House acts the Senate will agree."

Well, Mr. President, the House did act in 1921 and the Senate did not agree, although in times past the Senate passed 8 out of 13 House reapportionment measures without amendment. Once more the House has acted. Once more we are put to the proofs of the good faith with which the Senate has excused its own share of responsibility for eight years of failure to validate the fundaments of the Constitution. The Senate committee to which this bill was referred reported it back without amendment in 24 legislative hours. I dare to hope that the Senate now will discharge its own final responsibilities to the Constitution with like wisdom and like decision.

Abraham Lincoln found it possible to utter this confident challenge in his first inaugural message:

> Think, if you can, of a single instance in which a plainly written provision of the Constitution has ever been denied.

It is a hapless commentary that Lincoln, if here, would not dare to repeat that challenge in this modern day and age. It is doubly dangerous that he could not utter it within this congressional sanctuary.

Senators, such a situation can not go on. Its implications are too hazardous. The country must find here in its Congress a dependable example in fidelity. Here and now the Senate confronts an acid test. We and we alone can save this situation. The Constitution pleads with us for friendly ears.

> It was not made with the mountains,
> It is not one with the deep:
> Men, not gods, devised it,
> Men, not gods, must keep.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I wish to join with the Senator from Michigan in urging prompt and favorable action upon the measure which the Senate by a record vote agreed to consider. I can conceive of no responsibility resting upon the public servants of the American people greater than that of preserving representative government as defined in the Constitution of the United States. We may err about this or that piece of legislation; we may make mistakes in other features of our public service; but if we lack the capacity and the purpose to meet our basic obligations as defined in the Constitution providing for the preservation of real representative government, we are unworthy of the confidence of the American people.

I consider it a blot upon the record of the Congress of the United States that for eight years we have failed to comply with a plain primary duty intrusted to us by the Constitution of the United States. The apportionment of Representatives in the Congress is not a political question; it is a patriotic question. It is a question of public servants showing to the American people their faith in and observance of the very essence of the fundamental law. The worst nullifier of the Constitution of the United States for the past eight years has been the Congress of the United States. Its conduct has been nothing else but plain, deliberate, intentional nullification, disregard, and disrespect for the people's chief political safeguard and guaranty of liberty, the Constitution. Some of those responsible for this condition are those who go about through the country preaching about the sacredness of the Constitution, pleading that it must be preserved in its integrity, and accusing men who suggest remedial changes in our Constitution as being enemies of our Government and enemies of our Constitution and of giving expression to Bolshevistic views. Some of the people claiming to be "holier than thou" in Americanism are the very persons who are responsible for this outrageous nullification.

Mr. President, I come from a State which, under this apportionment bill, will lose one of its Representatives. What has that fact to do with this question? How can I justify nullification from selfish motives? It makes the offense less condonable. Massachusetts should lose one of its Representatives, if other States have increased in population in excess of the increase that has been made in the State which I have the honor in part to represent. It is not a question of which State shall have the largest number of Representatives, which State shall lose Representatives, or which State shall gain Representatives; it is a question of giving honest representation to the States entitled to such and ending false and dishonest representation in the Congress. It is a question of preserving and giving expression to the plain terms and obligations of the Constitution. It is a question of preventing a clique in the Congress from setting up a government that supersedes constitutional government.

Mr. President, this question, it seems to me, is primarily one that we would ordinarily expect the House of Representatives to settle for itself. The House has given us its judgment; its verdict is here. Why should we hesitate to accept that judgment on a matter which very intimately and very particularly relates to the future composition and membership of that branch of the Congress?

Let us abandon dilatory tactics on this measure; let us hesitate to filibuster upon a question that tests our capacity to give expression and fidelity to a fundamental principle of our Constitution. Let us demonstrate to the people of this country that we are sincerely intent in our purpose to preserve, I repeat, representative government—true representative government—in America. That is the chief and in fact the only question that is at issue here. I plead with my fellow Senators in the case of this one particular measure to show the American people that we are not lacking in capacity to perform a plain, simple, and elementary duty that preserves to them one of their most sacred constitutional rights.

I sincerely hope that early action will be taken, and I suggest to the Senator from Michigan that he try to reach an understanding with the leader of the majority party to hold night sessions, to make this bill a special order for certain nights, when it will be discussed and debated, if debate is to be held, and that final action be had upon this measure if upon nothing else during this session. I place this bill in importance above every other measure before the Senate of the United States, and in saying that I am not unmindful of the importance of other pending measures.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. I should like to ask the Senator a question as to the urgency of action on this bill. I see the bill itself does not contain any provision that will affect the next election of Members of Congress; that it does not take effect really for four years. Why should we get in such a hurry to act on it? The bill provides that action shall be taken after the next census, the taking of which has not even commenced. We have not even passed the law to provide for the taking of the next census. There are two sessions of Congress before anything can happen under this bill. The bill itself is four years dilatory.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The bill is eight years dilatory. An apportionment bill should have been passed eight years ago. I suppose anyone can find excuses or reasons for postponing action, but we have waited eight long years for the judgment of the House of Representatives. They once gave it to us six years ago, but by dilatory tactics we defeated that bill. It is asserted we are going to do that now; it is asserted that a handful of Senators here propose to prevent action upon this bill, and that the Senate will again have the responsibility of delay. We have, I repeat, the judgment of the House of Representatives, the body primarily interested, the branch of Congress which is particularly affected by this proposed legislation. How any Senator other than one actuated solely by considerations of selfish motives and selfish interests can oppose this amendment is beyond my understanding. I can not conceive why there should be any more delay here on the bill than there was in committee, which, to its credit, within 24 hours unanimously reported in favor of the passage of this measure. If we could fully realize what this measure means in the example of respect for law, in this instance fundamental law, it would illustrate to the country, we would in 24 hours pass the bill and go on record as favoring the action taken by the House.

Mr. BROOKHART. Then why not make it effective at once by applying it to the present census?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I should be very glad to make it effective at once, so far as I am concerned, but I repeat that would only mean that the Senate would be differing with the House, and that the House could accuse us of trying to substitute our judgment as to the composition of that body for their own judgment, and we would be in chaos once more. It seems to me the thing to do now, having their judgment, is not longer to delay acting on the measure.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator approves of the House action in postponing the time for the taking effect of the bill for two years?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I do, sir, because there is nothing else to do under the circumstances. If I had my way and was drafting this bill—and I would have presented it long ago—I would have had it applied to the census of 1920; but, I repeat, the bill reflects the judgment of the House of Representatives, and there is nothing else for us to do, it seems to me, but to act and act promptly, and that I urge.

Mr. BROOKHART. Would not this bill be a direct precedent for approving the passing over of a whole 10 years after the taking of a census without a reapportionment?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Whatever this bill may do, I hope our action will not be a precedent; I hope the action of the Congress in delaying its plain duty all these years will not be a precedent. The country should be spared any further exhibition of defiance of liberty, for liberty must begin with respect for law by lawmakers. Had the amendment to the Constitution which the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] proposed been adopted by the House during the last six years we would not have, in my opinion, some of the criticism that exists in the country to-day because of the failure of the Senate to act promptly on a good many measures.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to say to the Senator that, while I do not agree with him that we should avoid making an amendment to the bill if we think there ought to be one, I do most heartily agree with the Senator that this measure is very important, and I should like to ask him why he thinks we ought to pass the bill in the exact form in which the House passed it.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I have not urged that, sir. I have said that this bill represented the judgment of the House and that we ought not to interfere with it by amendments in such a way as to cause a deadlock between the two branches and cause the bill to fail.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, that might occur.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. But the fact that the members of the Senate committee, representing both political parties, including a number of Senators from States most affected by this bill, have unanimously approved it has great weight with me.

Mr. NORRIS. It has with me also; I am not considering the report of the committee lightly, but all legislation here, no matter whether it affects the Senate directly or the House of Representatives directly, it seems to me, ought to be considered on the basis of what is the consensus of opinion and the judgment of the Senate as to what is wise in the matter of amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think the Senator will agree with me that this is somewhat different from the average bill; that this measure is particularly and intimately connected with and associated with the work and the composition of the House of Representatives.

Mr. NORRIS. That is true.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And while it is true we ought to examine it with care and make amendments if we think it advisable to do so, yet such action on our part should not delay the passage of the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. But the country is also directly and intimately interested in anything that concerns the House of Representatives. I do not mean any disrespect to them; I do not know that I would favor an amendment such as suggested by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART]; but, at least, it is perfectly proper to debate it, and I would vote for an amendment if I believed it would improve the bill. If we should amend it, the House would have the opportunity of agreeing to our amendment or of disagreeing and putting it into conference and thrashing out the difference.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am very glad to get the Senator's view. I would expect a Senator who has stood so valiantly in this country for pure representative government to be militantly supporting a measure of this kind. It seems to me at least that those of us who have claimed to represent an intent to protect representative government should do our utmost to secure favorable action in the Senate upon this measure.

Mr. NORRIS. I am wondering from what the Senator has said if there is opposition to this bill from some Senators on the ground that some States would lose membership in the House of Representatives.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is brazenly declared in the press and it is whispered about here, and it is said that that opposition comes from the group which has opposed apportionment bills in the past from the particular States whose representation would be diminished.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator will have to modify that statement. I was a Member of the House of Representatives when we passed a bill of this kind, and I was strongly opposed to the bill which we passed, on the ground that it increased the membership at that time, and I did not think the membership ought to be increased. The number of Representatives was something over 300 then. I do not think the membership of the House ought to be increased now, although, like the Senator, I in part represent a State that would lose one Representative if this bill should pass. I should like to vote for an amendment that would cut down the membership.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. So should I if there was any hope of getting the House to concur.

Mr. NORRIS. I have just been talking with a Member of the House of Representatives who opposed this bill in the House, and yet he frankly admitted to me that the House of Representatives ought to be cut down in membership. He had other reasons for his opposition to it. There is no disguising the fact, however, that the House of Representatives is too large to do good work as a legislative body. I have always been afraid that we would get a bill over here that would increase the membership of the House, and I should hate to see that kind of a bill passed.

Both the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] agree that this is a very important measure, and I think much more important than the cruiser bill that is now the unfinished business; and yet both the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Michigan have been discussing this bill while the cruiser bill was officially before the Senate, and it is before the Senate now. If the reapportionment bill is of this importance, why does not the Senator from Massachusetts or the Senator from Michigan make a motion to take it up, and let up dispose of it officially? We can not get very far with it if we do our debating while some other bill is before the Senate.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think the Senator will agree that I have not consumed very much of the time of the Senate in discussion of this bill. I think I have had the floor about 15 minutes, half of which time has been devoted to answering questions.

I can well understand, in view of the Senator's attitude toward the cruiser bill, why he should welcome a motion to have that bill displaced. This is a bill that I should vote for to displace the cruiser or any other bill. I do not care at this time to assume authority for its direction and leadership, however. The Senator from Michigan is responsible for that; and if the Senator from Nebraska can induce him to make a motion to that effect I shall be glad to join with the Senator in voting for it. In conclusion, let me urge with special emphasis that we act promptly and favorably upon this bill. We owe it to ourselves, to the prestige and dignity of the Senate, and above all to our fellow countrymen to act.

CONSTRUCTION OF CRUISERS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11526) to authorize the construction of certain naval vessels, and for other purposes.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the unfinished business which is now before the Senate is a matter of very great importance to the national defense.

I reported this bill from the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate last May. Since that time I have been trying to get action on the bill almost every day that the Senate has been in session. Hitherto I have not been successful.

I realize that debate on the bill is legitimate, and I expect that there will be debate on it; but I should like to ask the Senate to stick as closely as possible to the subject matter of the bill. There are a number of very important appropriation bills that have to go through at this session, and I do not want to see them blocked. If Senators will give their attention to this bill, and will stick to the subject matter, we can get action on it, I think, within a very few days.

I have already, on January 3, made a speech explaining the purposes of the bill. The senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] has made a very able and full explanation of the bill. So has the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS]. I am now ready to go ahead with the bill and with the amendments to the bill. There is but one committee amendment; and unless Senators wish to talk on the general subject matter of the bill at this time I should like to go ahead with that amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to discuss a matter which becomes relevant by reason of an amendment which I propose to offer later. I can either present the matter now or I can present it at a later time, whichever best suits the convenience of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. It will be entirely satisfactory to me if the Senator will present it now.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the amendment which I propose to offer reads as follows:

First. That the Congress favors a restatement and recodification of the rules of law governing the conduct of belligerents and neutrals in war at sea.

Second. That such restatement and recodification should be brought about if practically possible prior to the meeting of the Conference on the Limitation of Armaments in 1931.

There are two phases of this question of preparedness. One is the mechanical side, we might call it, that of armaments. The other is the economic side, or, as we might call it, the human side.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. Does anybody object to the Senator's proposed amendment?

Mr. BORAH. It was not reported by the committee.

Mr. WATSON. Was it before the committee for action?

Mr. BORAH. It was.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator does not provide, I notice, by the terms of his amendment, as to how this recodification shall be brought about. Does he intend to explain how that should be done?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

I did not put into this amendment a specific provision that the President should call the conference, for the reason that it is not necessary to do that. My desire is to have an expression of view upon the part of the Senate as to the wisdom of doing so. I could put in, as I did formerly with reference to the disarmament conference, an authorization for calling one; but such authorization is not essential to the President's action. He may do so as well without it as with it.

Mr. President, I think we are on the eve of a naval race with Great Britain. The situation is not dissimilar to the situation existing between Germany and Great Britain from 1905 to 1914. Of course, so far as the governments are concerned, there will be, as there always is, the assertion of the utmost friendliness, and that there is no intention to engage in a naval race. That was true with reference to the expressions of the Governments of Germany and England from 1905 to 1914. The fact is, however, that we are building a navy looking at England, and England is building a navy looking at us; and the discussions here and the discussions in Great Britain show unmistakably that the two Governments are building with reference to each other's action.

The basic principles for a naval race are already admitted in this discussion. There must be some reason for this. I assume that neither Government would wish to expend large sums of money for the building of battleships or cruisers unless there really was some justification for it. Whether or not that justification is a sound one, it is a controlling one, in my judgment, in this particular situation.

Before stating what I conceive to be the controlling reason for this, let me call attention to a book which has just been published by Commander Kenworthy, who is now a member of the British Parliament.

In discussing the subject of naval building in this book, entitled "Peace or War," we find statements which are exceedingly interesting in view of the fact that they can be almost duplicated from the literature between Germany and England from 1905 to 1914.

At page 112 of this book he says:

The European nations, on the other hand, resent the supposed superiority complex of the United States, hate her for demanding repayment of the debts, and are jealous of her wealth and material prosperity. Is what I say doubted? Ask any American tourist or business man who knows Europe. If events move in the next 10 years as they have moved in the last 9 years, England will stand at the head of a European federation, a federation of mutual mistrust and disappointment with America.

Farther on, I read:

When the English newspaper with the largest circulation and probably the greatest individual influence began to attack America in its columns, just as it had attacked Germany before the war, and France at the beginning of the century, official influence was brought to bear on its owner who, hurriedly, over his own signature, wrote an article in another of his newspapers denouncing the criticism and praising the United States. The successful editor, with great prestige in British journalism, who had initiated the attacks on America was dismissed, and it was hoped the incident was forgotten. But now the attacks have begun again. "Let the eagle scream," say the hack writers in London and are answered by the brothers of the pen in the States.

At page 117 it is said:

For 300 years the English people have been schooled by a ceaseless propaganda into believing that their future lies upon the waters, that their bread and butter depends upon sea power and that only by an overwhelming navy can the prosperity, the power, and the very existence of the British Empire be maintained. So long as war is a legal process and the ultimate means of settling disputes between peoples, this doctrine is sound. Any nation threatening British hegemony at sea has incurred the hostility of the British ruling class and their lead has been followed by the British people. Spain, Holland, France, Germany, each in turn threatened British sea power, and each in turn was fought and overthrown.

In the periods of reaction after every war, the Admiralty has been hard put to it to extract the necessary money from a depleted treasury to maintain an overwhelmingly strong navy. In order to wring credits from Parliament, it has been necessary to point to a bogey, a menace to Britain's sea power. At the beginning of this century, France; yesterday, Germany; to-day, whom?

In the years immediately following the armistice, the British Admiralty automatically indicated America, the next strongest sea power, as the potential enemy, just as they tend to indicate America again to-day. Now the policy of the British Admiralty is simplicity itself. It is to maintain a navy, with the requisite fortified harbors and bases, of such strength as to be able to overbear any rival. * * * It must be realized that the Board of Admiralty is normally able to force its will upon any British government.

In recent years it forced its own shipbuilding policy upon the reluctant government of Ramsay MacDonald, the first socialist government in England. The Board of Admiralty knows not party politics; and when an overwhelming conservative majority, under Mr. Baldwin, took the place of the labor government, it coerced that government in council and inflicted a defeat on the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. Winston Churchill, the most powerful individual minister in British political life, in the cabinet councils.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. In just a minute.

Again, on page 120, it is said:

Military tournaments, naval reviews, parades of troops, are becoming popular again in England. The annual aerial pageant, staged by the air force near London, is becoming a great national festival. It always winds up with a mimic battle in which dummy towns are blown to pieces by real bombs dropped by war airplanes. This part of the spectacle is the most popular with the crowds. True, there have been a few cinematograph films showing the horrors of war, and one film advertising the League of Nations. But they are not so popular as frankly propagandist films produced in England with the assistance of the British War Office and Admiralty glorifying war. Whilst British statesmen prate of peace £115,000,000 a year, far more than the taxpayers can afford, is spent on armaments.

I might take the time of the Senate to read equally significant statements from our own country, from the press, even from some of the speeches in the Senate. We are repeating the arguments and reasserting the surmises of the old days before the World War.

To my mind the reason for this disturbance, for this uneasiness, and for this appeal which is being made successfully is the conditions with reference to sea law, or maritime law. When the great World War closed there was no such thing as a rule or a principle of law to guide and control the use and operation of commerce on the seas. That is the condition of affairs to-day. If a ship engaged in commerce puts out from one of our ports it has no assurance, if war breaks out anywhere, that the ship will not be intercepted or that it will not be dealt with under the rules of dominancy of the sea, and regardless of what the rights of a neutral ought to be. The legitimate foreign commerce of all nations has no protection other than that of force.

This is the one thing which enables those who are interested in building great navies to argue with success the necessity of a great navy. If there is no rule to govern the use of the seas save the rule of force, necessarily those who are engaged in commerce will look to their governments for protection based upon force, and the governments will necessarily supply it. Theories and plans for peace will give way before the demand of vast interests for protection, and the question is, Can that protection be given by law or must it depend alone upon navies? I want to try the protection of law.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, before the Senator started to discuss the subject matter of his amendment he made the statement, as I caught it, that he believed this legislation was the forerunner of a race between the nations for naval supremacy. I wanted to ask him how he believes it possible for the countries to engage in a race for naval supremacy when, as I understand the pending bill, we are providing for ships well under the maximum provided by the only successful disarmament conference the world has ever known, the one in Washington in 1920.

Mr. BORAH. That will end in 1931, and of course this is simply a preliminary to what will transpire, if some understanding is not reached for the removal of those things which seem to make large navies necessary. The Senator must admit that if there is no understanding with reference to the use of the sea by neutral ships for commerce, no law governing it, and if the protection to which they are entitled depends entirely upon navies, navies will be increased from time to time in accordance with the demands of those who are using the sea, for the protection of the commerce of the countries. It is my belief that while all obstacles can not be removed, and all controversies can not be put at ease, a vast amount may be done by a complete agreement as to the rights of neutrals in the use of the sea. I feel that we ought, not in the spirit of antagonism but in a spirit of friendliness, seek an agreement with the great naval powers on this question of maritime law.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield further, I have not indicated any opposition to the Senator's amendment. As far as I understand it, I can see no objection to having a clear definition of the law of the sea as proposed. I simply reverted to the statement the Senator had made in opening his discussion, that there was plain indication of a race for naval supremacy between the nations of the world, and in asking the question how that can be, with the limitations so clearly fixed by the only successful disarmament conference ever held, unless in some future conference, perhaps the one in 1931, as it is automatically to be called under the terms of the Washington conference, such increase should be permitted. At the present moment the increase is not permitted, and in 1931 we will sit around the table just the same as every other nation, I presume, and sincerely hope and trust against further increases, and, if possible, I certainly hope it will be that there will be further decreases.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, we are not building these 15 cruisers merely in order that we may comply with the treaty which we made. That has not been the basis of discussion. Nobody has referred to it. The discussion has been over the question, What is the size of England's Navy? Parity! The burden of every argument about cruisers is this—England has more than we have.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHIPSTEAD in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. There is no limitation imposed, as yet, on the construction of cruisers by agreement between nations.

Mr. BORAH. No. That is correct.

Mr. EDGE. That is true.

Mr. HALE. The Senator surely does not think we are trying to get a navy superior to that of England, does he?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I do think so; but not by this bill. But that is the ultimate aim. What was the $800,000,000 proposed for?

Mr. HALE. Not by this bill, certainly.

Mr. BORAH. Let me make my position plain. If we can not have an agreement with reference to the use of the sea, if our commerce depends for its protection entirely upon our Navy, if England stays with the proposition that she proposes to dominate the sea, we will build a navy superior to England's undoubtedly. In my judgment, it is just as inevitable as time. If there can not be an agreement as to disarmament and an agreement with reference to the rights of neutrals, the United States will go forward until she will build a navy which will prevent interference with the commerce of the United States, in case any nation sees fit to undertake to interfere with it.

Mr. HALE. And the Senator thinks that we should not do that?

Mr. BORAH. I think we should, if that happens; but I think, in the first place, before we do that, and before we start on a naval race, we ought to make every effort possible, first, to bring about a complete understanding with the naval powers with reference to naval building; and, secondly, a complete understanding with reference to the freedom of the seas. If it is impossible to have an understanding with reference to the freedom of the seas, if it is impossible to have an understanding with reference to the size of navies, then, if it is for the protection of our commerce, we will undoubtedly build what we think is necessary to protect our commerce, and all the arguments in the world will not militate against the prime necessity of the United States protecting her commerce. We may protect it without building a navy, and I hope we can, but if we can not, we will undoubtedly build a navy. Let us try in every honorable way to avoid that program.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, does not the Senator think that we would be in a better position to get such an agreement if we showed that we were strong?

Mr. BORAH. They know we are strong. There is no doubt in their minds that we are strong.

Mr. HALE. Yes; but just now we do not happen to be strong in the particular class of ships covered by this bill.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator will strike out of this bill the time limit, so as to give the negotiating power complete freedom to negotiate during the coming year or two with reference to disarmament and the freedom of the seas, I will cease my discussion, and vote for the bill.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator think we could get further with paper ships than with ships that are under actual construction?

Mr. BORAH. I think we could. I think that if we had the authority to build 15 ships, or more or less, whatever we thought was necessary, and if the negotiating power had that authority behind him, he could negotiate just as successfully as if we had started building the ships.

Mr. HALE. Why does the Senator think so?

Mr. BORAH. I think so for a number of reasons.

Mr. HALE. I can not conceive what they can be.

Mr. BORAH. There are a great many people who take a different view of it. But I think we can so proceed as to possibly secure what we desire without spending so much of the overburdoned taxpayers' money.

Mr. HALE. Does not the Senator think that Great Britain would rather have the status quo maintained, as far as freedom of the seas is concerned, as long as she has naval supremacy?

Mr. BORAH. I presume that is true, if that was all there was to it.

Mr. HALE. The Senator thinks that?

Mr. BORAH. I presume that is true, yes; if everything could stop there.

Mr. HALE. Then does the Senator think that England would be in any great hurry to enter into an agreement that would change that state of affairs?

Mr. BORAH. I think that the United States, with our strength and our capacity to do what will be necessary if no agreement is reached, can afford to be patient and considerate in her first efforts to secure an agreement. I believe we should make all reasonable sacrifice to avoid a great naval race.

Mr. HALE. Is there any better way we could show that than by going ahead and building ships?

Mr. BORAH. While we are conducting these negotiations I want to save the taxpayer, if it is possible to do so. I do not want to have the Government build 15 cruisers if it is not necessary to do so. In my judgment—and the Senator knows it is the judgment also of the administration, and I presume they are in a position to know as much about it as we are—with this bill passed and the time limit taken out the President of the United States would be in a position to effectuate results as fully and completely as if we were building the ships, and in the meantime we would not have been to the expense of building them.

Mr. HALE. Does not the Senator think that if the time limit were taken out the President would still go ahead with the construction of the ships at the present time?

Mr. BORAH. No. If I thought so I would not ask to have it taken out. I believe the President would like to save this expenditure.

Mr. HALE. The Senator does not think so?

Mr. BORAH. No. I think he would seek first an agreement.

Mr. HALE. In spite of the stress the President has laid upon the importance of having not paper ships but ships?

Mr. BORAH. The President has said that he would like to see the time limit taken out.

Mr. HALE. Yes; the President has said that, and that has always been the President's view with regard to building cruisers. We had that question up before in connection with the matter of building the last three of the eight cruisers provided several years ago. The President took the same view then, and the Congress took the view that we were the ones to provide and maintain a Navy, and we did appropriate for the ships.

Mr. EDGE. Just one more question, Mr. President. Is it not well to consider the future in the light of our experience in the past? As I recall, when the successful disarmament conference was held in 1920, discussing the limitation of battleships, the position of the United States was one of having a larger number of ships of that character than other nations, or being stronger, and it seemed to have a very decided effect upon our ability to secure disarmament agreements, so far as they refer to those ships.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator from New Jersey is repeatedly referring to the great results of the Washington conference. When one analyzes the results of the conference, he must reach the conclusion that it merely postponed the real issues underlying the question of naval disarmament.

Mr. EDGE. The Senator admits that it made some headway, does he not?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is true that the United States made a great sacrifice. We destroyed a large number of first-class battleships in process of construction, and the competition in the building of other destructive war vessels, at least as far as other naval powers were concerned, went right ahead. What is the use of limiting one class of ships and leaving other classes of ships unlimited? What is the advantage to the United States in pursuing that system of limitation, particularly when it is made to apply to those vessels of greatest interest and value to the United States?

I say that a study of the results of the Washington conference, and the history of events subsequent to that conference, will convince one that he is not justified in boasting that the conference accomplished great results.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I said in my opening remarks, there are two sides to this question of preparedness. The only phase of it that the Senator from New Jersey and the Senator from Maine are willing to think about is that of building ships. I want security for our commerce but I feel that much may be done to enjoy that security aside from building cruisers. I feel, too, that we are under the highest obligation to protect the American taxpayer.

There is another side to this question aside from battleships, and I think I might read a paragraph from President Coolidge's message which I believe states it adequately. He said:

> The one weak place in the whole line [of our defense] is our still stupendous war debt. In any modern campaign dollars are the shock troops. With a depleted treasury in the rear no army can maintain itself in the field. A country loaded with debt is a country having no first-line defense. Economy is the handmaid of preparedness. If we wish to be able to defend ourselves to the full extent of our power in the future we shall decide as soon as possible to finish payment for the last war, otherwise we would face a crisis with a part of our capital resources already expended.

When we are building navies and organizing armies there is the other side of the question, and that is the extent to which we are depleting our economic power. Modern wars are wars of the people. They are no longer conflicts between armies and navies. They are conflicts between nations and peoples, and every element of national strength and every ingredient of strong and wholesome nationals are involved in wars in these days. The citizen and not the soldier is the true measure of the nation's strength in war as well as in peace. The economic and financial power of a nation will ultimately determine the question of victory. We should consider, when we are considering building programs, the question of our debt, of our taxes, of our economic strength, and of our financial power. Therefore, any program that postpones to a reasonable time the expenditure of money until we can know whether agreements can be had which remove the necessity of the expenditure seems to me a reasonable program of preparedness. It seems to me just and fair to those upon whom the burden of building falls.

It is for that reason that it has seemed to me we could very well afford to say that we will cut out the time limit in the bill and that we will then propose during the coming year a plan with reference to disarmament and a plan with reference to establishing the rights of neutrals at sea. If we are unable to secure it, having exhausted our means to bring it about and done the best we may to secure it, then we will know what our duty is and we will be prepared to discharge it. But before undertaking it, it is not only prudence but it is justice to the American people and the taxpayers, before we start upon that building program, to exhaust every means to avoid it.

Before we start upon this naval race, the consequences of which no mortal can foresee and few would be bold enough to prophesy, we should seek in all proper ways to avoid it, to minimize its extent, to remove as nearly as may be any justification for it. The great contributing cause is that nations must now carry their trade across the lawless ocean. That which God in His wisdom and mercy designed for the benefit of all, man would dedicate to the strong only. Here is the wicked incentive. We should lead out in removing it. Let us seek to shield our people from the unspeakable curse of a naval competitive race between the two branches of the English-speaking peoples. For myself, I want our Government and our people to stand before the bar of public opinion when its judgment shall in the future be rendered upon the result of the doings of these days, clean of every fault, free from connivance or negligence. If our people are to be burdened with more and yet more taxes and the whole world be menaced with another conflict springing from commercial rivalry, if the worst is to come, I want this country to enter no plea of confession and avoidance. I want it to be able to declare, "Not guilty"; to assert and to prove that it is free from every sinister purpose, every willful act. I would seek an understanding, first, with the leading nations, and, next, with all nations, reduce that understanding to the terms of treaties to the effect that those who would use the ocean for legitimate commerce and trade, for peaceful pursuits, come not behind, not subsequent, not subordinate, but prior to and ahead of those who would use it for war. I would assume that all nations would be willing to make such treaties. But if they are not, if such an understanding can not be reached, if the ocean is to be a place of lawlessness and force, then we shall know our task and understand how to meet it.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] thinks because we are within the limits of the treaty, although the treaty does not cover this particular ship, but within its spirit we will say, that therefore we are not engaging in a naval race. If the Senator will go back and refresh his recollection with reference to the controversy between Germany and England from 1900 to 1914, and the constant assertions upon the floor of the House of Parliament and in the Reichstag of Germany that there was no naval race, that the relations of the governments were friendly, that there was no intention of building against each other, he will not be misled by these superficial statements or these surface indications. The fact is that in the discussions in the press, in the discussions upon the floor and everywhere else, we discuss our Navy in comparison with the size of the English Navy.

Mr. EDGE. The Senator will surely admit that there is some difference between the situation existing to-day, or since 1920, with some degree of agreement as to disarmament, and the situation existing between 1904 and 1914 when the World War commenced. Certainly we have made some headway. I agree with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] that we did not get as far as a large majority of the people, perhaps, would have had the conference go. Nevertheless we made a start, even though at a sacrifice to the American Navy; and certainly that condition did not exist from 1904 to 1914.

Mr. BORAH. Those conditions are not, in my judgment, going to affect the final result. I think that the naval disarmament conference to which the Senator refers did some good, and I have no doubt that those in charge of it did the best they could under the circumstances. But when they avoided entirely the question of undertaking to adjust the rights of neutrals at sea, they left the thing about which we have been thinking and around which we have been organizing ever since.

What was it at Geneva that constantly disturbed the minds of the conferees and prevented them coming together? It was not the difference merely between 8-inch guns and 6-inch guns. It was the question of how they could protect their respective commerce at sea, one of them believing that it could be accomplished this way and another believing it could be better done in that way, but both of them thinking all the time about that which they did not dare to speak, and that was the question of what were the rights of those who want to engage in legitimate commerce when war breaks out. I am not one of those who believe there is any danger of Great Britain attacking deliberately the United States. I know that there is no danger of the United States deliberately attacking Great Britain.

But suppose Great Britain gets into war with any country, what becomes of our commerce under the conditions which now prevail at sea? It is not that we expect a direct conflict between the nations or an aggressive attack in one form or the other, but it is the condition which we leave open so that the moment war breaks anywhere our commerce is solely at the mercy of our ships, because there is no right of law and no rule by which they may be guided.

I want to go back for a moment. Benjamin Franklin as far back as 1783 undertook to have this written into our treaty of peace:

> All merchants or traders with their unarmed vessels employed in commerce, exchanging the products of different nations and thereby rendering the necessary convenience and comforts of human life more easy to obtain and more general, shall be allowed to pass freely unmolested.

That is the essential, indispensable element of maritime law, if we are going to avoid a naval race. If Great Britain and the United States and the naval powers are not willing to say that legitimate commerce, commerce engaged in carrying the products of the farm and of the manufacturers, can be carried the same in time of war as in time of peace, we may rest assured that nations like Great Britain and the United States, which have such stupendous commerce, will build navies necessary to protect their commerce in time of war. There is no limit to that building. When we think of the amount of damage which five or six little armed vessels of Germany did to the commerce of the world during the World War, and then undertake to build a Navy sufficient to protect our commerce, there is practically no limit to which the building may go.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And we have not effected a very complete limitation of armament when we leave submarines, torpedo boats, cruisers, and all other classes of war vessels, surface and subsea, wholly unrestricted, save first-class battleships.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is quite right.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I can not understand, if the Senator will permit me to continue for just a moment, how anyone can think that the Washington conference accomplished any great and substantial benefit to the United States by reason of the fact that we threw upon the scrap heap or destroyed a large number of first-class ships on the theory that we were securing a limitation of naval armament, when the conference left the cheaper and more destructive forms of battleships wholly unlimited.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, permit me to read another statement. This is no new doctrine which I am advocating. Jefferson said:

> Reason and usage have established that when two nations go to war those who choose to live in peace retain their natural right to pursue their agricultural, manufacturing, and other ordinary vocations, to carry the produce of their industry for exchange to all nations, belligerent or neutral, as usual.

President Wilson in his address to the Congress in 1917 said:

> The paths of the sea must alike in law and in fact be free. The freedom of the seas is the sine qua non of peace, equality, and cooperation. No doubt a somewhat radical reconsideration of many of the rules of international practice hitherto thought to be established may be necessary in order to make the seas indeed free and common in practically all circumstances for the use of mankind, but the motive for such changes is convincing and compelling. There can be no trust or intimacy between the peoples of the world without them.

The sea belongs to all nations. It belongs to no one nation. It is a common of all people, and the idea which has grown up during the last centuries that any partciular power can dominate the sea and control it in time of war is so utterly at variance with all ideas of right and justice in the use of this great common that the time has come when we ought to ask the nations to come together and put aside the doctrine of those old days.

> The free, constant, unthreatened intercourse of nations is an essential part of the process of peace and of development. It need not be difficult either to define or to secure the freedom of the seas if the governments of the world sincerely desire to come to an agreement concerning it. It is a problem closely connected with the limitation of naval armaments and the cooperation of the navies of the world in keeping the seas at once free and safe.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. I simply want to get the Senator's definition of the term "freedom of the seas." Great Britain professed during the peace conference never to have understood precisely what Mr. Wilson meant by "freedom of the seas." Does the Senator think that the term precludes the right of blockade during war?

Mr. BORAH. My idea of freedom of the seas is that it is the right of neutral nations to carry their commerce as freely in time of war as in time of peace except when they carry actual munitions of war or when they actually seek to break a blockade. But the blockade must be a blockade sufficient to prevent the passage of ships and not merely a paper blockade. But as to all legitimate commerce, outside of the actual munitions of war and outside of speeding to a particular port where it is blockaded, there ought not to be any interference with the neutral powers. A minimum of belligerent rights and a maximum of neutral rights.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. FESS. In exercising the right to search a vessel for contraband the freedom of the seas is, I think, violated by enlarging on the list of contraband articles during the war.

Mr. BORAH. The idea of making anything contraband that the dominant sea power wishes to make contraband is obnoxious to the idea of the freedom of the seas.

Mr. FESS. That is precisely the point I was raising.

Mr. BORAH. I am speaking now of the right to carry everything in legitimate commerce except actual munitions of war, and that is the only definition of the freedom of the seas, in my judgment, that will ever be satisfactory.

Mr. FESS. And that was one of the rights which was constantly violated during the World War, as to which we protested time and again.

Mr. GLASS. Yes; and then we proceeded to engage in the same violations after we entered the war.

Mr. FESS. That is probably so.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; we did; and, of course, Mr. President, if the question of the freedom of the seas shall never be settled we always shall.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Idaho yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. NEELY. The eulogy of the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] upon the Limitation of Armament Conference and the comments by the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] upon the same conference, impel me to inquire of the able Senator from Idaho if he will not state the relative naval strength of Great Britain and the United States immediately before the Limitation of Armament Conference and at the present time?

Mr. BORAH. No; I am unable to state that with accuracy.

Mr. NEELY. Can the Senator from Idaho inform us of the value, first, as a fighting force, and then in dollars and cents, of the ships that the United States destroyed as a result of the limitation of armament conference?

Mr. BORAH. No; I can not.

Mr. NEELY. Would the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] or the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] supply that information to me?

Mr. BORAH. Will not the senior Senator from West Virginia permit me to go ahead with the subject, and when those Senators discuss the bill, perhaps, he can get the information he desires from them?

Mr. NEELY. Very well; I do not want to divert the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, here is the situation as it is still contended for by Great Britain. I ought to say preliminarily that the conditions under which the British Empire has been built up might justify in former times the contention which Great Britain has always made. But under present conditions that doctrine can not stand against the cause of peace and the right of those who want peace. I am not citing these matters for the purpose of attack, but I am calling attention to a situation that must be remedied if these two great English-speaking nations are to dwell in anything like proper relations toward each other. I hold in my hand a book which has been just published entitled "Freedom of the Seas," by an English writer, who says:

For whenever the pinch has come British sea power has made short work of rights of neutrals or the responsibilities of belligerents.

That is true. The minute war breaks anywhere, and the dominant sea power enters it, or becomes involved, it makes short work of the rights of neutrals; in other words, all the legitimate pursuits upon the sea must give way to the dominancy of the sea power which may be involved.

The Premier of England during the war said as to England:

We are not going to allow our efforts to be strangled in a network of judicial niceties. * * * Under existing conditions there is no form of economic pressure to which we do not consider ourselves entitled to resort.

A short time ago a debate took place in the House of Lords in which this matter was discussed at length, and some of the statements made by Lord Wemyss might well serve as the basis for the United States building an unlimited navy. If the doctrine which is here pronounced represents the views of the English Government, and the English Government is going to contend for that doctrine in the future, in my judgment, much as I should dread to see it, because I would regard a naval race as second only in disaster to a war, there is no way to prevent the United States, and I do not suppose anyone would undertake to prevent the United States, building a Navy sufficient to protect itself against such doctrine. Lord Wemyss says:

So long as our fleet is unhampered by diplomatic restrictions—

He was speaking then particularly of the Paris agreement of 1856.

So long as our fleet is unhampered by diplomatic restrictions this country is able on account of its peculiar conditions, the result of geographical position, to wage war in a manner which has been denied, either entirely or in a very large measure, to other nations—a manner which is swifter, surer, less destructive, and far less costly in the expenditure of either life or treasure than ever can be the case with war waged on land—at sea, by cutting off our enemy's supplies and refusing to him the use of those resources which alone make it possible for him to continue to wage war at all.

In other words, the moment war breaks all neutral nations must remain away from that region of the world in which Great Britain thinks it is inimical to her interest to have them.

What very few Englishmen understand is that our fleet, in common with all fleets, is possessed of a power other than that derived from its weapons, its guns and torpedoes, a power without which it would be unable to achieve its aim. I refer to the immemorial right of all belligerents to suppress entirely upon the sea all of those resources and supplies of the enemy upon which his continued resistance must always chiefly depend. It is not a self-arrogated right. It derives its existence neither from government nor from parliament but from an ancient, historic, and universally acknowledged rule of the law of nations, that international law which for centuries has by common consent regulated the actions of the civilized countries in their dealings with one another, especially in the matter of maritime war.

Up to the year 1856 a belligerent's rights in this respect were entirely unrestrained—that is to say, that he was empowered by this rule of the law of nations to seize, to confiscate for his own use, all his enemy's goods, whatever their nature, wherever they might be found, under whatever flag they might be found, with, of course, always due compensation to an innocent neutral carrier. It was a right which, from the very nature of things, could be fully exercised only by the belligerent which held the command of the seas. But the command of the seas is for this country essential.

That is to say, without the command of the seas they could not continue to wage war.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator tell us when that declaration was made?

Mr. BORAH. It was made on the 10th of November, 1927. With all proper respect to the learned gentleman who made use of the term "command of the seas," I undertake to say, Mr. President, that that term has become obsolete or, if not obsolete, obsolescent. No nation is going to be permitted to enjoy the "command of the seas." The United States will not consent to its commerce being subject to the whim of some other power; and, in my opinion, Great Britain herself will soon be able to see that the old theory of the "command of the seas" will work to her detriment quite as much as that of any other nation. Suppose the submarine warfare had been carried just a little further than it was during the World War; the only salvation for England would have been the right of neutrals to carry food to her people. The conditions of warfare have so changed that neutral rights may be as essential to the preservation of England as the command of the seas was at one time.

Therein is to be found the reason for all those attempts which from time to time have been made to suppress those rights—not by denying their necessity or impugning their legality—for of that there has never been, and can not be, any question—but by trying to get us to renounce them, either by threat or by persuasion or by means of negotiations with the promise of some imaginary return that might be of some use to us.

That is, belligerents' rights—

This is an illuminating paragraph.

A wavering neutral is all the more likely to favor in the end the British Empire successfully waging war with a full offensive force, than a British Empire hesitating and showing weakness, for it is strength and not weakness which attracts neutrals as was proven by the late war.

In other words, the dominancy of the sea or the command of the sea or the right of belligerents to destroy neutral commerce may not only be used for the purpose of defeating the actual enemy, but of forcing other nations to join with the dominant sea power for the purpose of bringing that about; and we all know how effectively that power was used during the war.

So, Mr. President, while we are considering this bill we really have in our minds the sole question of how we are going to protect our commerce. I do not think many think of the use of the Navy in any other light. I do not suppose for a moment that we expect, as I said a moment ago, a direct attack, but we do have this stupendous commerce scattered all over the world, and it is an essential part of our national life. It has been said that Great Britain would perish without her foreign commerce. The United States, if it should not actually perish, would suffer to such an extent without its foreign commerce that the American people would not for a moment abide by the result, but whether it is more acute and more direct in the case of the one or the other makes very little difference, because the moving, controling question is how to protect our commerce against the inroads of those who may be engaged in war. To protect commerce is to protect national life.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, would it interrupt the thread of the Senator's argument if I should ask him a question?

Mr. BORAH. No.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator has made two or three very significant statements. The first is that the old doctrine, if it may be called such, of the command of the sea, is either obsolete or obsolescent, and that the United States will not tolerate either Great Britain or any other nation having command of the sea in the future. I ask the Senator, in order that I may get his view, how are we to prevent that thing happening except by adequate preparedness on the sea?

Mr. BORAH. I presume the Senator was not in the Chamber a few moments ago.

Mr. WATSON. No; I was called out.

Mr. BORAH. In the first place, I would postpone the actual building of additional ships for the Navy until I could be absolutely satisfied, first, that there could be no agreement between Great Britain and Japan and the United States and the other naval powers with reference to the size of the respective navies; and, secondly, that there could be no agreement with reference to the rights of neutrals at sea. I would bend our energies to bring about those things. And I would proceed with such clarity and certainty of purpose that a failure to secure an understanding would and could be regarded as final and therefore a challenge for us to proceed.

I do not think the danger is so immediate and imminent as to necessitate any action other than an honest effort to come to an understanding with those nations.

Mr. WATSON. How, then, does the Senator construe the Geneva conference?

Mr. BORAH. As I said a moment ago, the thing that troubled the conferees in the Geneva conference was the question of commerce, just as I am speaking of it here.

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. We avoided the discussion of this matter at the disarmament conference in 1921—that is, the discussion of the rights of neutrals. We avoided a discussion of it at Geneva, and yet, in my opinion, the reason why we were unable to get any limitation upon cruisers and submarines at the disarmament conference in 1921, and the reason why the Geneva conference failed, was because of the fact that they had no understanding with each other as to the right to the use of the sea. What both countries and all countries were seeking to do was to protect their commerce. That is what they had in mind. The method of protecting it by an agreement or understanding as to the rights of neutrals was not undertaken at either place. Great Britain thought she could protect her commerce by her 6-inch guns. She has her coaling stations and her naval bases scattered all over the world. She can coal where we can not.

Mr. WATSON. That is true.

Mr. BORAH. She does not need the size of cruiser that we do, or the size of guns that we do.

Mr. WATSON. That is true.

Mr. BORAH. But she had in mind protection of her commerce. It was not a question of the difference in the size of the guns, except as those guns are applied to the protection of the commerce of the country. When we came to consider our guns we again considered what was necessary to protect our commerce. There was no rule, no law, no guide for the protection of it. Both of them were thinking of their commerce. What I say is, let us make a determined effort to come to an understanding, first, upon this question of the freedom of the seas, and, secondly, as to the use of the Navy under those conditions.

If we can not reach an understanding—and we can well afford to be patient; we can well afford to bide our time; we can well afford to make any reasonable sacrifice to bring it about—then, if we can not get it, we shall know our duty and we will be prepared to discharge it.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, does the Senator really believe that the fact that Great Britain had more cruisers than we had, and would have been compelled to scrap some in order to come down to a common basis, had nothing to do with the outcome of the Geneva conference?

Mr. BORAH. I think the basic proposition was the question of protecting the commerce of the respective countries. Great Britain did not expect any deliberate attack from the United States that she would ever have to use her cruisers to repel.

Mr. WATSON. That is quite true; but at the conference in Washington she was entirely willing that we should scrap capital ships; in fact, she depended upon us to do that, she scrapping practically none and we hundreds of millions of dollars' worth, because at that time we were first in that kind of naval construction. At the Geneva conference she was first in cruiser construction. Is not that true?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. She would have been called on to make a great sacrifice as compared to anything we would have been called on to make, and she did not choose to do it and declined to enter into an agreement to do it. Is not that true, I ask my friend?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I think that entered into the matter; but what was the moving power behind all of it?

Mr. WATSON. A desire to protect commerce.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly. If we can protect commerce in a different way than that of building cruisers, is not the Senator in favor of doing it?

Mr. WATSON. Why, yes; if there be any way to do it; but I do not know how it can be done unless we adequately prepare and let the world know that we intend adequately to prepare, just as they are doing. The Senator well knows, as well as anybody in the world, that both in letter and in spirit they violated the terms of the 1921 disarmament conference and we did not.

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not admit that. I do not feel that Great Britain has violated that treaty.

Mr. WATSON. And even after they entered into the Kellogg peace pact they paid no attention to it. They have gone on building since that time, regardless of the fact that they were entering into that pact.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator from Indiana has made a very important statement. In what respect did the other parties to the Washington conference violate the agreement as to limitation of armaments?

Mr. WATSON. The Senator well knows what England proceeded to do after that agreement was entered into. It has all been set forth here. I have not the figures. They violated it, in spirit only, in this respect——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Oh, well, now, wait just a minute.

Mr. WATSON. No; I want to answer the Senator's question.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. All right.

Mr. WATSON. In this respect only: We agreed to scrap to the basis of 5–5–3 with England and Japan. That is correct; is it not?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No; we agreed to scrap——

Mr. WATSON. On capital ships.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. We agreed as to capital ships, battleships, first-class battleships.

Mr. WATSON. Yes; and aircraft carriers.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. We did come down to that common basis. There was no agreement as to cruisers.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No.

Mr. WATSON. But they immediately started out to build cruisers on a great scale.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well. There being no agreement as to cruisers, how can the Senator say that the building of cruisers by a party to the Washington conference was in violation of the agreement entered into there?

Mr. WATSON. In spirit.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not think that statement is warranted. It is an important statement that the Senator has made.

Mr. WATSON. I think it is entirely warranted. In other words, my idea is that they took advantage of a situation in a manner in which they were not warranted in taking advantage of it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator well remembers that there was a positive refusal upon the part of some of the parties to the Washington conference to enter into any agreement limiting cruisers or submarines and some other classes of vessels.

Mr. WATSON. That is quite true; but was there a single soul who attended the Washington conference who believed, or did the honorable Senator from Arkansas himself believe, at the time that conference was held, that growing out of that conference—animated, as it was, by a spirit of disarmament and of complete fairness on the part of all nations—England would immediately begin to build largely of cruisers, even though cruisers had not been mentioned in the contract?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Destroying the parity of 5–5–3; that is the point.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, having refused to enter into any agreement respecting the limitation of other than first-class battleships, having expressly declined to make a contract with respect to cruisers, I can not say that it was a violation of the terms of the Washington conference, either in letter or in spirit, for the parties to that conference to proceed with the construction of vessels which they had declined to limit in the conference. It is a queer process of reasoning that prompts the Senator from Indiana to conclude that having thrashed the matter out in the conference, and having failed or refused to enter into any agreement respecting the limitation of these other vessels, anyone might not have anticipated that the logical result would be the building of those vessels not limited.

The effect of the conference was that we were first in sea power by virtue of the battleships we then had and those that we had under process of construction. When we destroyed them, we assumed a subordinate position in that particular.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the chair). Does the Senator yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have not the floor. The Senator from Idaho has the floor. I shall be glad to answer the question if I can.

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Was not the dominant, controlling thought and purpose of the agreement arrived at to preserve a certain relative strength of the three navies, namely, 5, 5, and 3? And while it is quite true that there was no specific agreement as to certain types of war vessels or war instruments, was not the spirit of the conference and the agreement to keep and maintain the relative naval strength at 5, 5, and 3?

I gathered that that was the idea of the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. Precisely; entirely.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. In answer to the Senator's question, I do not think that any person can say truthfully or accurately that the effect of that conference was to impose the ratio of 5–5–3 on any other class of naval construction than that pertaining to first-class battleships; and the fact that the conference refused to enter into any such agreement is a sufficient answer to the Senator's question. They expressly limited first-class battleships and they declined to limit cruisers; and anyone with a reasonable knowledge of history might have anticipated that there would occur just what did happen.

We entered the conference with a greater sea power than perhaps any other nation, due largely to our supremacy in first-class battleships. We emerged from it in a subordinate position. There is not any doubt in my mind about that.

Mr. WATSON. That is entirely right.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not think it is promotive of a proper understanding of this subject to insist that bad faith was displayed on the part of any party to that conference by pursuing a policy of naval construction with respect to ships that were not limited by that conference, particularly in view of the fact that no agreement was entered into in the conference after the whole subject had been discussed at great length. I think anyone might have anticipated that Great Britain would build cruisers, that Japan would build cruisers, and that by virtue of the conference the only limitation that would result would be in the ships in which the United States stood first.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I think the very fact that they refused to be limited indicated what they were going to do.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is exactly the view I am taking and expressing; and I can not understand how anyone can express great disappointment at the building of cruisers by Great Britain in view of the fact that she refused to enter into any agreement to limit them.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I have expressed no disappointment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator from Indiana has.

Mr. WATSON. As far as the letter of the agreement is concerned, they lived up to it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. But so far as the spirit was concerned, which was one of disarmament and one of coming down on the sea to the parity of 5-5-3, I do not think Great Britain did live up to it.

Mr. GLASS. Does the Senator think, if I may inquire, that France has been guilty of bad faith because she has persisted in building submarines, when she expressly declined to permit submarines to be regarded as——

Mr. WATSON. If nations are to act in absolute good faith——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will please address the Chair.

Mr. WATSON. Pardon me. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BORAH. I do.

Mr. WATSON. I obey the commands of the Chair. If nations are to act in absolute good faith, if nations come together with an agreement to disarm, and they agree in terms as to disarmament and as to how far it shall be carried, and then if, after that, certain nations proceed to arm along other lines, I think their action is a violation of good faith and of the real spirit of a conference of that character, which is disarmament on the sea.

Mr. GLASS. Does the Senator think France has been guilty of bad faith in persisting in building submarines?

Mr. WATSON. She may not be from her viewpoint. She is from mine.

Mr. GLASS rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BORAH. Let us get back to the subject.

I want to read a concluding declaration from Lord Wemyss's address, which says:

That declaration—

The declaration of Paris—is a mere declaration of intention; it is binding, of course, upon its signatories so long as they remain signatories, but there is no reason, moral or legal, why any of them should not retract from it at any time they like. If, therefore, it could be decided by the Government, and by them made known to all the world, that in any future war in which we might unhappily be engaged our fleet would be used with its full effective strength, as in the old days—

Prior to the declaration of 1856, when there was no restraint—

our power in the world would become once more what it was in the past—a naval, and not a military one, not only securing us against the necessity of ever again having to break forth into vast military operations, but securing also Europe in a large degree from the continuation or the extension of any military conflagration that may break out there.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BORAH. Just a minute, and I will.

Here, Mr. President, is the clear declaration that it is to the interest of Great Britain to recur to the times prior to 1856, when there were no supposed limits upon the power of belligerents, when it was under no obligation to respect the rights of neutrals; that if that can be the policy of Great Britain again, Great Britain is coming into her own in complete supremacy of the sea, as she enjoyed that supremacy in those days. I think there is no question which presents itself to this body and to this country so serious as that question, as presented by the debate in Parliament which I have just read, Great Britain contemplating, through its spokesmen, the policy of utterly disregarding all neutral rights.

That being true, Mr. President, is it not incumbent upon us, in justice to our own people, in justice to our taxpayers, in justice to the future peace of the world, to inquire if that is to be the policy, or if the very opposite may not be established as the policy, to wit, the complete recognition of the rights of neutrals at sea? Unless we can have that understanding, while I do not like to engage in prophecy, I venture the opinion that in 1931 the last vestige of the disarmament conference will be wiped out, and the two great nations will engage in building navies according to what they believe is necessary to protect their commerce. And if we come to building a Navy to protect commerce we must not only build against England, but we must build against any combination at sea that England can make; and if that were the case, the future to me would have nothing in store save that of a fearful burden of taxation upon the American people, and possibly in the end another cataclysm like that of 1914.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, with the purpose of the Senator's resolution I am entirely in sympathy. I find, on looking over the records of the Naval Affairs Committee, under date of May 3, 1928, the following:

The committee then took up the proposed amendment submitted by Senator BORAH with regard to the restatement and recodification of the rules of law governing the conduct of belligerents and neutrals in war at sea, etc. It was agreed that the proposed amendment be not added to the bill; but that should Senator BORAH offer the same on the floor of the Senate when the bill is before the Senate, the chairman be authorized to accept it.

I am entirely willing to accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho. I must say, however, that I can not agree in any way with the reasoning of the Senator——

Mr. BORAH. The Senator will remember the old English chancellor who said on one occasion that "Your reasoning is d—— poor, but your conclusions are all right."

Mr. HALE. I say, Mr. President, that I can not understand the reasoning of the Senator when he says that if we take out the time limit we are going to be in a stronger position to force Great Britain and other countries to enter into an agreement about the rights of neutrals.

Mr. BORAH. Let us defer that for the present. I want to complete this matter.

Mr. HALE. I thought the Senator had finished.

Mr. BORAH. No; I have not finished; I have not had a chance to finish.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator for a question.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The Senator has mentioned the agreement of Paris of 1856. In Paris an agreement was reached determining the rights of neutrals. If I am not mistaken, that agreement was again entered into by the declaration of London of 1909.

Mr. BORAH. The declaration of London went much further. It undertook to define conditional and unconditional contraband, and went much further; but the declaration of London was never accepted by Great Britain.

Mr. HALE. Or any other government.

Mr. BORAH. So she was never bound by it; but the declaration of Paris was accepted by Great Britain. But the United States never accepted, though we were willing to accept it if private property should be free from seizure at sea.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Did not Great Britain accept the declaration of London?

Mr. BORAH. No; Great Britain did not accept the declaration of London.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I thought there was a great deal of discontent among certain of the English people, because the British Government had signed that treaty with the United States.

Mr. BORAH. It was thrown out in the House of Lords. It never became binding on Great Britain.

Let me read the declaration of Paris, which the learned gentleman was discussing here, in order that we may have before us just what he had in mind when he said that they ought not longer to be bound by it. The declaration of Paris provided:

1. Privateering is and remains abolished.

2. The neutral flag covers enemy's goods, with the exception of contraband of war.

3. Neutral goods, with the exception of contraband of war, are not liable to capture under enemy's flag.

4. Blockades, in order to be binding, must be effective; that is to say, maintained by a force sufficient really to prevent access to the coast of the enemy.

That was the declaration of Paris, which they find onerous and too restrictive at this time.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. May I ask the Senator another question? During the last World War we heard a good deal about the command of the seas. Was there anything done by Great Britain at that time that was not done prior to 1856, so far as control of commerce at sea was concerned?

Mr. BORAH. No; I think Great Britain used the same means to effectuate her ends that she would have used had the declaration of Paris never been made.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. In fact, she had command of the seas?

Mr. BORAH. Yes; exactly. I do not want to leave the English side of the discussion without saying that there is a tremendous sentiment in England in favor of the freedom of the seas. Whether it extends to the present Government or not, I do not know.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator be kind enough to define what he means by the expression "freedom of the seas" from the English standpoint?

Mr. BORAH. I can not, from the English standpoint.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator says that there is a great deal of sentiment in England for freedom of the seas. What does that mean from the English standpoint?

Mr. BORAH. If I may use now that subdivision of sentiment in England to which I am referring, then by "freedom of the seas" they mean exactly what I am contending for; that is, the right to carry all commerce except actual munitions of war, and to break a blockade.

This article in the Nation, under date of December, 1928, states:

At the root of Anglo-American differences there lies the question of sea law in time of war. At present there are wide differences of opinion as to the rights of a belligerent to interfere with neutral commerce; and very serious friction arose with the United States in the early years of the late war over the rights which we claimed and the way in which we exercised them. To us the Americans seemed exasperatingly small minded in badgering us, when we were fighting for our existence, with the miserable commercial grievances of this citizen of Boston or that citizen of Chicago. To the Americans, we seemed to be exploiting the fact that American opinion was prevailingly pro-Ally, and therefore unwilling to press its protests to the last extremity, so as to prejudice neutral rights, which represented in their eyes an important principle. This experience bit more deeply into the American consciousness than we perhaps realize, and explains many subsequent Anglo-American misunderstandings.

* * * * * * *

In an able article in Time and Tide, of December 9, Mr. Leonard Stein quotes certain passages from Mr. Gibson's concluding speech at the Coolidge conference, and draws the following conclusion:

"Reading between the lines, it is fairly clear that what lay behind American obstinacy on the question of the 8-inch guns was—at least in large measure—a fixed determination to challenge, in any future war at sea, the unlimited interference with neutral commerce, which was an essential feature of the British blockade of Germany."

This does not, in our opinion, overstate the case. If ever again we attempt to exercise belligerent rights at sea, whether in execution of the covenant or otherwise, we shall have to reckon with that "fixed determination," to which Mr. Stein refers. It would seem wiser on every ground to reckon with it in advance of any such contingency, by coming to a clear agreement with the United States and other powers on the definition of sea law.

But, however that may be, how near a thing it was that the blockade hurt Germany more than the submarine hurt us! Just a slight change in the relative effectiveness of submarine attack and anti-submarine measures and the weapon of economic pressure would have been turned against us. Is not this a warning? If we are the strongest naval power in Europe, we are also the people which is easily the most dependent on uninterrupted supplies from overseas. If we have the most to lose in the former capacity from a restriction of belligerent rights, in the latter capacity we have by far the most to gain. Whether we stand to gain or lose on balance depends on the technical conditions of the time, which change, as all history shows, with extreme rapidity, and which, as the portent of the submarine suggests, are changing now in a way which diminishes the importance of what we stand to lose and enhances the importance of what we stand to gain.

But that is not all. There is a big difference in kind between what we stand to lose and what we stand to gain. We stand to lose in the power to exert economic pressure on other peoples—a weapon of offence, and, if it ever operates effectively, a very cruel one. We stand to gain in the security of our own people from starvation. Is not this latter object one which we should rate higher than the former, even from a narrowly self-interested standpoint?

There are public discussions of this matter which lead me to believe that there is a very strong public sentiment in England against the dominancy of the sea, or the assumed dominancy of the sea, which England has heretofore undertaken to maintain. But whether the sentiment is there or not, it seems wise upon our part to ascertain whether the English Government proposes to retain the dominancy of the sea established over the sea during the World War, because at the close of the war neutral rights were utterly destroyed; and all efforts to reinstate them, or to rehabilitate them, or to have an understanding concerning them since the war have utterly failed.

If that continues, the proposal will not be 15 cruisers, it will be many more than 15 cruisers, and there will be perfect justification for the increase. The United States, with her tremendous commercial interests, which she must protect just the same as she protects the property of her citizens on land which is entitled to the protection of our country, the United States, with her vast and increasingly great commerce, will protect that commerce. If she can not do it by understanding, by agreement, by law, she will do it by the supremacy of her Navy.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Idaho a question. We are so far below the ratio that was fixed by the Washington conference that I ask if we could not consistently take up this question of the freedom of the seas just as well after we had built the 15 cruisers as before?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not want to have the Government spend thirty or forty million dollars for a battleship if there is no need of it.

Mr. BRUCE. I look at it this way: That even if we agreed with England on the freedom of the seas, we should still need as many as 15 cruisers.

Mr. BORAH. We might or we might not. We might come to an understanding with reference to the limitation in regard to cruisers.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator think England would scrap any of the new cruisers she has just built?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know whether she would or not.

Mr. HALE. From any indication that we have seen up to date in history, does the Senator think she would?

Mr. BORAH. I think that England, of course, will always maintain what she can maintain under any agreement that she may make with us. I would rely on her treaty agreement.

Mr. HALE. Even if a limitation were made as to the rights of neutrals, would not a navy still have to be kept up?

Mr. BORAH. A reasonable navy.

Mr. HALE. Would she not have to have a reasonably strong navy to establish an effective blockade and keep it up?

Mr. BORAH. What I am seeking to do is to avoid the necessity of building against England. If we can have an understanding with reference to our rights, I think that may be provided under certain circumstances. We will always have to have a navy. We will always have a reasonable navy. But a wholly different navy from what we will build if there is no agreement.

The Senator can understand my position, I think, which is that if we can not have any protection of commerce except that of the Navy, we will go ahead regardless of cost, regardless of the question of self-defense, and build according to our idea of what is necessary to protect our commerce.

Mr. HALE. I think it is generally considered that that means a Navy equal to that of any other nation in the world. Beyond that we do not care to go.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. MOSES. If I understand the argument of the Senator from Idaho, he looks forward to a new conference on naval disarmament to take place within the current year or hopes that one may be brought about.

Mr. HALE. No; not on naval disarmament.

Mr. BORAH. I regard this as a part of the program of disarmament.

Mr. MOSES. They are all cognate questions.

Mr. BORAH. It is useless to talk about not building ships if we are not going to have some idea of free use of the seas.

Mr. HALE. The Senator's amendment does not provide for a disarmament conference.

Mr. BORAH. No.

Mr. MOSES. No; and in that view it seems to me it is well understood that no keel can be laid down under this legislation within the current year; that is, I assume that is the case, but if we had the authorization and the money appropriated so that we may lay down the keels, we will be in a much stronger position when we go into the conference which the Senator foresees and which I hope may take place, and in which I trust the question of the freedom of the seas will be finally disposed of and that the question of naval disarmament may be disposed of, and that the Senator's great dream of codification of international law may result. We will be in a much stronger position, I think, in a conference of that sort if we sit down at the table with a stack of blue chips rather than a stack of blueprints.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is talking about "blue chips." I do not understand that language.

Mr. MOSES. Of course, I am speaking in the vernacular, and I know perfectly well none of my scholarly colleagues will understand it.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. BRUCE. I am really desirous of getting at the Senator's view of the subject. I am sometimes inclined to think that this effort of ours to arrive at some basis of naval parity with Great Britain is largely responsible for all the international misunderstanding and distrust which has sprung up between us and Great Britain. Sometimes when a man tries hard to fall asleep he finds it more difficult to do so than when he does not try at all.

Mr. BORAH. Especially if he has an uneasy conscience.

Mr. BRUCE. It seems that the disarmament conference of 1921, instead of resulting in anything practical in the way of real disarmament, simply inspires two nations, which had been on most friendly terms with each other, with a certain amount of mutual misconception and distrust. I do not know whether we will gain anything more, if, indeed, as much, from a similar conference in 1931.

Mr. BORAH. I would not want to take that view of it. It may be possible that we can not accomplish what we would like to accomplish, but would not the Senator feel better if we made an honest effort to bring that result about and failed? Would not he feel better with reference to the future, whatever expense we might incur or if any disaster should come, to know that we had done our part?

Mr. BRUCE. I unquestionably should feel that way if I were looking forward to the conference of 1921 and not looking back at it. But it seems to me that the results which flowed from the Washington conference have been truly unfortunate, so far as promoting anything like a good understanding between Great Britain and the United States. The Senator knows that until we had the Washington conference there was, except during the World War when we were smarting under British interference with our commerce, no distrust of the British people or of the British naval power, and that we had long been in the habit of regarding the British Fleet as a great safeguard to human civilization rather than a menace.

Mr. BORAH. I do not admit that I had been.

Mr. BRUCE. Before the World War came along and our commerce was interfered with, we never thought of trying to build up our Navy to a footing of equality with the British Navy, though some naval officers may possibly have wished that to be done. It can not be denied, I think, that during the World War, after all, the British Fleet was the most powerful arm that the liberty and civilzation of mankind had.

Mr. BORAH. I have heard that argument also made, but I am not going to accept it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. In view of what the Senator has said, particularly in view of the expressions from the English newspaper and the Member of Parliament, as I assume he was, does the Senator think that there is ground for rational hope that we would accomplish what we all seek to accomplish, and what the Senator seeks to accomplish, by pursuing the course suggested in the proposed amendment? I agree with practically everything the Senator has said and my immediate question may be an idle one, but in view of all that has been stated does he think there is ground for rational hope that England will abandon the position which she appears to have taken?

Mr. BORAH. So far as we are at present situated, we are in the same position we were at the close of the war. I have no means, any more than any other Senator, of knowing what we might accomplish by it, but I know it is the right thing to do if we can, and if somebody does not undertake it, it will never be done. The United States is in position now, and England knows it perfectly well, to build any navy that the United States thinks is necessary to protect her commerce. If we make the proposition to protect it, in part at least, through law and by means of understanding as to what the law should be, it does not seem to me possible that England can refuse. It may be she is just as anxious as we to come to an understanding. Are not her people bending under their load of taxes? Is not there every reason why she should wish to lift that burden? Let us not assume the contrary until we have done our part.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. If we are to pursue the course indicated by the suggested amendment, will the Senator be good enough to point out the steps to be taken?

Mr. BORAH. As I said in the beginning, I did not undertake to put into the amendment a direction or authority for the President to call the conference.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. That is what I was leading up to.

Mr. BORAH. For the simple reason that it is not necessary. He may do so if he desires without that authority just as well as with it. But I do undertake to put on record the views of the Senate, the other member of the treaty-making power, with reference to the matter, which would be behind the President if he sees fit to undertake it.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The Senator is making a very interesting argument. Will the Senator tell me what he means by "protecting American commerce"? Just what does that phrase mean? I have heard it used a great deal in the discussion here.

Mr. BORAH. I mean the right of American commerce to plow the seas undisturbed by any belligerent power unless that commerce is actually carrying munitions of war.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. In time of war?

Mr. BORAH. In time of war.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. MOSES. Does the Senator mean to limit it absolutely to munitions of war? The Senator will remember that in the early days of the World War a great part of our grievances with reference to our commerce upon the high seas arose with the expansion of the list of prohibited articles which might be carried in neutral bottoms.

Mr. BORAH. I was limiting it to actual instruments or munitions of war.

Mr. MOSES. The Senator will remember the numberless complaints, well founded in many instances.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator has either got to reverse my position or I will have to reverse his. I mean we shall carry all commerce undisturbed unless we are actually carrying munitions of war to the enemy.

Mr. MOSES. But the phrase "munitions of war" may be very narrow.

Mr. BORAH. No; they did not undertake to expand the munitions question. They undertook to expand the question of contraband to include mules and horses, food, and everything else.

Mr. MOSES. Yes; and rubber and cotton and many other commodities which only by a great stretch of the imagination could be considered as being contraband of war.

Mr. BORAH. I was not discussing contraband, which is a much wider term, but actual "munitions of war" is easily defined and well understood.

Mr. MOSES. If that is the Senator's proposal, of course nobody can question the right of a belligerent nation in that respect.

Mr. BORAH. Certainly not.

Mr. MOSES. But when we consider the great number of grievances which we had during the early years of the war, when the dockets of the Admiralty courts in British ports were clogged with cases due to the seizure of our bottoms which were dragged in there, and our consular and diplomatic seal violated more than once in the matter of the mails——

Mr. BORAH. That is what I would undertake to control.

Mr. MOSES. If we are going to have a conference it must take a wider view than that with reference to contraband and freedom of the seas. It should carry the very thing the Senator has been contending for the last 10 years to my knowledge, which goes back to codification of international law, especially with reference to the rights of neutrals on the high seas.

Mr. BORAH. I do not think there is any difference of view between the Senator and myself.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Does not the Senator think our commerce was limited or interfered with by belligerents to the extent that we were doing business with the world practically under a license or under the authority of the French and British Governments?

Mr. BORAH. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Does that constitute protection of American commerce by obtaining a license from a foreign belligerent?

Mr. BORAH. Oh, certainly not.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Does not the Senator think it is the business of the Government of the United States to use its Navy to keep the channels of trade open to the United States in time of war, so long as we are a neutral?

Mr. BORAH. I think if we can not keep the channels of trade open by law or by agreement or treaty, then we will keep them open, if we can, by our Navy. I think we have the right, as has been the doctrine of this country from the very beginning, to trade in time of war just as we have to trade in time of peace.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator knows perfectly well that if we can not keep our channels of trade open by agreement and by understanding, into which we are willing to enter, we will have a navy sufficient to protect it.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Suppose we have a big navy and are strong enough at sea to keep the channels of trade open, and in the case of war our commerce is interfered with and the Government of the United States sends a note to the belligerent country interfering with our commerce, protesting against its interference, and then the American ambassador who happens to be at the seat of government of that country tells the foreign office of that country not to take the protest of the Government of the United States too seriously, that it is for home consumption, and that nation continues to interfere with our commerce. What good is the Navy of the United States under those circumstances?

Mr. BORAH. That hypothetical question involves a matter which might be very seriously disputed if it were submitted to an arbitral tribunal—that is, as to whether the ambassador did all those things or not. I would not want to say that he did.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Would the Senator deny it?

Mr. BORAH. No; I would not deny it, because I have no information upon which I could affirm it or deny it, but I have always had a very serious doubt about whether he did it or not.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FRAZIER. The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs raised the question as to whether or not England might scrap any of her new cruisers if a disarmament conference might be held in the future. At the time of or after the 1921 disarmament conference the United States, as I understand it, scrapped quite a lot of new material. According to a statement of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] a few days ago in a speech on this question 465,800 tons of new construction, on which $150,000,000 had already been expended, was scrapped by the United States. In view of the attitude we took at that time, it seems to me it would be unfair to question England's attitude that she might take in the event of another conference.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not consider that we are proceeding upon the theory that the ships which we are proposing to build would really be sufficient to do anything in case of war.

Mr. HALE. They would be sufficient to do something, although not so much as should be done.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly. I think we must be proceeding upon some other theory than that of sufficient protection to our commerce in case of war. We are exercising our judgment as to what is reasonably safe, knowing at the same time that if war should break out it would not by any means be sufficient.

Mr. HALE. But eventually we would have to reach the point that would be safe; and this is at least a start in that direction. I should like to know when the Senator thinks we would be justified in going ahead and building? Since the Washington conference we have undertaken practically no construction, while the other nations of the world have gone ahead with great programs of construction. In the Senator's mind, when are we to begin?

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is considering solely the building programs of other governments.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator think that we can let all of the other nations get ahead of us?

Mr. BORAH. Let me answer the Senator's first question, and then I will answer the second. The Senator is making a comparison. What I say is that if we could come to an understanding with them during the coming year, either upon the question of the freedom of the seas or as to naval armaments, we could avoid building in the future. It may be that we would want to build these 15 cruisers; it may be that we would want to build more; I do not know; it could be done according to agreement. The Senator does not anticipate that we will actually need these cruisers within the next year or two, does he?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, we never know when we will need them.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator really thought there was a possibility of war, and that we would therefore have need of cruisers, he would propose three times or four times the number he is proposing now.

Mr. HALE. I think, Mr. President, that if we have a sufficient number of cruisers there will not be any war, because, on account of our strength, the other nations will not want to have war.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator really thinks that 15 cruisers would prevent war, I will vote for the bill.

Mr. HALE. I think that they will do a great deal toward preventing war.

Mr. BORAH. Let me call attention to some figures, then.

Mr. HALE. I think they will do a great deal toward preventing other countries trampling on our rights.

Mr. BORAH. Let us see.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment; one at a time.

At the beginning of the war Great Britain had 128 cruisers; she commissioned 75 large armed merchant ships; she built during the war 40 cruisers; and in addition she had the help of the French, Japanese, and Russian cruisers. The Germans, with 4 light cruisers manned with 4-inch guns, sunk 200,000 tons of British shipping and 30,000 tons of allied shipping.

Again, at the height of the war, Great Britain had all together 4,000 armed ships of all kinds trying to prevent her merchant ships from being sunk; but Great Britain and her allies during that time lost 7,000,000 tons of shipping. Great Britain and her allies had 104 cruisers on two trade routes, and 70 of them were hunting for 1 German ship—the Emden. If we were building for war, for the protection in time of war, we would not build 15 cruisers, but many more. The Senator has compromised upon the proposition. What I am saying is that the Senator can well afford to defer the building until he makes an effort to see what we shall ultimately have to do.

Mr. HALE. I do not think we will get anywhere if we wait until we can see what we shall ultimately have to do.

Mr. BORAH. That is a difference of opinion between us. Therefore, I can well understand why the Senator wants to go ahead with his program. But I differ with him.

Mr. HALE. The Senator himself has said that he thinks Great Britain would rather have the present comfortable status quo—that is, with Great Britain in command of the seas—and the United States a much weaker nation so far as ships are concerned. If that be the case, why is she willing to enter into the agreement, which the Senator suggests?

Mr. BORAH. If Great Britain could have that condition continue permanently, of course, she would try to do so. I am not anticipating any such program as that. I will undertake to say that Great Britain must yield her dominancy of the sea, Great Britain must come to an understanding as to disarmament, or Great Britain then must build against the United States, which she would not do and she knows perfectly well she can not do it.

Mr. HALE. What is going to make Great Britain do that? Is it not the knowledge that we will otherwise go ahead and increase our Navy?

Mr. BORAH. I do not think that is a controlling proposition at all.

Mr. HALE. Why not?

Mr. BORAH. I have said that I do not think that is a controlling proposition with Great Britain at all. She understands what our program is; she knows perfectly well that we can build all the cruisers that are necessary; but we have made no proposition to Great Britain as to the freedom of the seas; we have not insisted upon any understanding with her; we have avoided the question; we shunted it aside at the disarmament conference; we avoided it at Geneva; we refused to discuss it; and Great Britain has the absolute control of the seas by reason of our acquiescence. Now, when we say that this is the sine qui non to our ceasing to build ships in order to protect our interests it becomes then a proposition which she must consider.

Mr. MOSES. The Senator should not fail to add that we did not propose it at Versailles.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, such arguments are heard every time we suggest doing something to increase our Navy; but the President has asked for this bill and high officials of the Navy have asked for it.

Mr. BORAH. The President has asked that the time limit be cut out.

Mr. HALE. But he stressed the importance of passing the bill. Every time we ask for action like this a pacifist movement comes along to thwart it.

Mr. BORAH. Why does the Senator say a "pacifist movement?" That is a worn-out phrase; it has done all the service in this country that it can possibly do.

Mr. HALE. The Senator knows that pacifists are very much interested in defeating this bill.

Mr. BORAH. The pacifists, so-called, have not the slightest influence, in my judgment, upon a single vote on this bill.

Mr. HALE. I do not think they have much, but they are doing their utmost to assert it.

Mr. BORAH. Whether or not there be pacifists in the United States, there are a lot of people who would go to war without hesitancy at all if war were necessary who, nevertheless, believe that the most solemn duty resing upon public men to-day is to avoid the necessity, if possible, and they would go to war just as quickly as would the Senator.

Mr. HALE. The people to whom the Senator refers who would go to war so quickly little realize that a nation can go to war in a prepared state only after years of preparation.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BRUCE. Does the Senator think that if we should enter into an agreement with Great Britain covering the freedom of the seas Great Britain would build any fewer cruisers? That she would not is what I fear. I do not mean to refer to Great Britain alone, but to any country that has a considerable naval armament.

Mr. BORAH. I do not want to take the position that would make my Nation a pharisee among the nations. We are no holier than the other nations. The other nations will keep their word, in my judgment, just as we will. It may be that there are admiralty men and a few leaders in England or in Japan and elsewhere who could compare with a few leaders and a few admiralty men in the United States, but the great mass of the people in England, the great body of the people in Japan, and the great mass of the people in Germany, just as the great mass of the people of the United States, want peace; they want to escape, if possible, the superhuman crushing burden of taxation, and they are just as liable to keep their word as we are.

Mr. BRUCE. I agree with the Senator absolutely; certainly, so far as Great Britain is concerned. She is as fully likely to do it; but that is not the point I had in mind. I am asking whether any great power could afford to stop building cruisers simply because there had been an agreement in relation to the freedom of the seas?

Mr. BORAH. If there is to be no understanding, if there is to be no agreement, if there is to be no law, if there is to be nothing in the way of adjusting our controversies except through force, I undertake to say that the men who are advocating a bill providing for 15 cruisers are not meeting the situation at all.

Mr. BRUCE. I will state to the Senator from Idaho, if he will allow me, that he misunderstands me. I am in favor of a most strenuous effort being made to arrive at an agreement with England as to the freedom of the seas, but I do not think that because we are seeking to bring about such an agreement we should in the meantime not make such a moderate—for that is what it is—addition to our Navy as 15 cruisers.

Mr. BORAH. I am frank to say that I am much more concerned with the question of having an understanding with Great Britain as to the freedom of the seas than I am with reference to 10 or 15 cruisers. That is a secondary matter with me. I would not want to cut this bill down below 10 cruisers at most, but as to that there is a question of judgment. I have talked with an officer who has as fine a record in the Navy, I think, as anyone, who has been in it for years, and he thinks that 10 cruisers would be ample for replacement and to keep our Navy up to what it is now. There is a difference of view.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator give me the name of the officer?

Mr. BORAH. No; I will not give the Senator the name.

Mr. HALE. I have no desire to bring him under discipline. I am surprised to hear the statement, because I have never heard any statement of that kind coming from a naval officer.

Mr. BORAH. I have heard it.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. ODDIE. I should like to observe in connection with the statements that have been made that in this debate we should keep two important considerations before us in order that the question may be clarified and properly understood. The first is the necessity for a balanced fleet. To-day our fleet, in comparison with other great fleets of the world, is not balanced because of the lack of cruisers. The second consideration is that in case the necessity should arise to protect our commerce, under conditions that have been suggested, the cruiser is the ship with which to protect it.

Mr. BORAH. I understand, Mr. President, that the cruiser has really become the battleship of these days. If I were going to build any ships at all, I would build cruisers. I also understand the necessity of having a balanced fleet, but I have heard a great deal about it, and I have never yet known anybody to agree with anybody else as to what is a "balanced fleet." If, however, we ever ascertain what a "balanced fleet" is, I have no doubt that the enchanting beauty of that kind of fleet would justify us in making any appropriation necessary in order to build it—just to have a balanced fleet!

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, the maneuvers which our Navy, under all kinds of conditions, has conducted during the last few years have proved the importance and the necessity of having a balanced fleet. I can state, after talking to numbers of the best experts in the Navy, that our fleet is not balanced to-day because of the lack of cruisers.

Mr. BORAH. What therefore is the condition, the real situation at the present time, 10 years after the war? It is this: The highway of nations, the common inheritance of all people, knows no law save the law of force. The "great common," as Captain Mahan called the sea, this indispensable thoroughfare of the nations, is governed through lawlessness and might. When the exigency arises, when the interest is sufficiently strong, no nation may use it with safety unless it has power to compel respect from those who would dominate it. The situation is precisely the same as when Coke declared, in speaking for the King of Great Britain:

> Commanding the seas, he may cause his neighbors and all countries to stand upon their guard whensoever he thinks fit.

Legitimate commerce, the peaceful pursuit of trade, must have an end when the exigency of war suggest it. They may be driven from the ocean overnight. The legitimate fruits of industry, the reward of labor, may be outlawed upon the whim of the selfish edict of a single power. The ship which puts to sea to-day, bound upon a legitimate errand to a distant port, may, upon the coming on of or threat of war, be captured and find itself at the mercy of a stronger power. Could a situation be devised more calculated to plunge us again into a naval race, more fruitful of battleships, of cruisers and of submarines, more likely to bring at last war? When nations understand that all rules have been abrogated, all law rejected, must not they all necessarily arm if they expect to trade? Will they not in the face of all this be prepared to defend by force that for which they can receive no protection under the law? Would they regard that as protection which is less equal in strength than the greatest navy that floats the sea? In the light of these conditions, is there the slightest chance for the reduction of armaments? Is there not something to be achieved ahead of any further disarmament?

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, I have been very much interested in the eloquent speech of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] and the remarks which I desire to make are much along the same line as he has spoken in regard to the freedom of the seas. I ask the indulgence of the Senate for a very few minutes so that I may discuss one important aspect of the cruiser bill. The pacifists and internationalists who are exploiting their every resource to defeat or delay this bill are breeding war. Should they be successful in blocking this important legislation, or in bringing about its modification, we may some day pay a fearful price for our failure to maintain a reasonably adequate navy.

We do not want a navy that will strike fear into the hearts of the people of other nations. We do not want to assume the rôle of bully upon the sea, but we should have, and must have, for our own well-being, a navy approaching the strength of other nations of the world.

The source of all our foreign wars has been upon the sea. An examination of history will prove this to be a fact. It was the ruthless sinking of our ships that brought us into the last great conflict. Prior to our entrance into that war we were a neutral country, trading with neutral countries, and yet our ships were seized time and again by the navies of belligerent nations.

Since the inception of this Republic, freedom of the seas and the doctrine that free ships make free goods have been fundamental principles of our national policy. We have sought persistently, but in vain, to write them into international law. In the Great War the seas were less free than ever before, and all the belligerent European nations scoffed at the idea of either free ships or free goods.

That war closed with what had been termed euphonistically the laws of maritime warfare in a condition of chaos. That condition still exists to-day.

All that we can be sure of is that if Europe engages in another war, our sea-borne commerce again will suffer. We do not vision a war in which the United States shall be engaged. We have no quarrel nor basis for a quarrel with any power. But, unless we are strong enough in cruisers to protect our neutral commerce, and to prevent by show of arms the destruction or the seizure of our ships and our goods bound from neutral port to neutral port, inevitably we shall be drawn into a quarrel that can only end in war.

Our maritime commerce grows. It now totals the stupendous sum of over $14,000,000,000 each year. Imagine what would happen to it if another nation, possessing a powerful navy, should become embroiled with a fellow European power! Again would our ships and goods be seized. But if we have the warships to guard and protect that commerce, if we have a navy approaching in strength that of any, no nation will risk drawing us into the war as an adversary by repeating the outrages which we endured between 1914 and 1917. And if we have that parity of strength, for the first time in history it will become possible to bring about those international agreements for the freedom of the seas that we have sought for more than a century. Without this parity, is Great Britain going to surrender that privilege she so long has claimed—the privilege of ordering and controlling according to her desires all neutral sea commerce when she happens to be at war? Hardly.

Give us the cruisers adequately to protect our commerce when we are at peace and other nations are at war, and the possibility of our being compelled to fight decreases; the possibility of the writing of a new and more civilized code of the sea increases, and the possibility of war diminishes.

This Nation and all nations should insist, once and for all, upon the freedom of the seas for all vessels on peaceful missions. We have every right under the laws of God and man to assume that free ships make free goods when there is any question about their being contraband of war.

New York would be wise in dispensing with two-thirds of her police department or her fire department if the Senate would be wise in defeating, delaying, or modifying this cruiser bill. If a war should break out between England and Japan, between England and Italy, between England and Russia, or between any two of the foremost naval powers of Europe, our commerce would be subjected to seizure and interruption on the part of these powers; and as surely as the sun rises in the east we will be forced into any war which may break out between any two of these powers unless we have a navy with sufficient strength to render protection to our maritime commerce.

The Senate has just ratified a treaty which denounces war as a means for settling international disputes. Let us go a step further toward the guaranty of peace by guarding against the occurrence of international disputes.

Where are differences most likely to arise between America and foreign powers? In the rural districts of foreign countries? On the streets of foreign cities? In the shops of foreign business men? In the homes of foreign citizens? Hardly. They are most likely to originate upon the open seas by the interruption of our foreign commerce in time of war between foreign powers. It is the possibility of such differences that this legislation is intended to diminish.

The United States is now the wealthiest Nation in the world. If we are forced to build large navies, we can do so with less burden upon our people than can any other power. But we do not want naval competition. This is a gesture in behalf of peace. Our Navy is far inferior to that of Great Britain, and until it approaches equality we are inviting interruption in our foreign commerce. If we have an adequate navy, the freedom of the seas will assume the rôle of an inviolable and unwritten international law. By defeating this bill we are courting trouble. By passing it we are wooing peace.

Our foreign trade is increasing rapidly. We are increasing and should continue to increase the proportion of American ships carrying American goods. But our commerce can not continue to expand, and our prosperity can not continue its proportionate increase, until we can insure against interruption of that commerce.

The United States entered into the conferences of 1921 with wholesome spirit. We willingly sacrificed more than England and Japan combined. We will not be violating that spirit by building these few cruisers as a guaranty against our being forced into another war.

I do not question the sincerity of England's good will toward America; but a foreign trade of over $14,000,000,000 is too great and too important to remain at the mercy of a foreign power, however friendly that power may be. I would not urge the construction of a single cruiser for the purpose of war at this time, but I do urge the construction of at least 15 cruisers for the purposes of peace.

We all know that peace between nations is to a great extent dependent upon conditions within nations. There is not a man, woman, or child in the United States who would not be directly affected by any serious interruption of our foreign commerce, and if any foreign power should so menace the prosperity and happiness of our people we would have no alternative for war.

We can make even more remote the possibility of another war by building these ships. They will be floating symbols of the principle of freedom of the seas. They will mean that free ships make free goods.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the committee amendment.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its session to-night it recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. McKELLAR. Can not the Senator make it 12?

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Tennessee is a member of the Appropriations Committee. He knows the pressure of the appropriation bills. I want to get through as fast as I can with this bill, and I think the extra hour in the morning will aid us in completing this bill at an early date.

Mr. McKELLAR. There is a great deal of opposition to meeting at 11 o'clock, and we usually lose about an hour before we get started anyway. I hope the Senator will make that 12 o'clock. I am just as earnestly in favor of the Senator's bill as he is himself, and I want to see it pushed through; but, really, I doubt if we can make any time by meeting earlier.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senator will withdraw his objection.

Mr. McKELLAR. The leader on this side is not here. Has the Senator conferred with him about it?

Mr. HALE. I conferred with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and he said he had no objection to a recess until that time.

Mr. McKELLAR. If he has no objection, I have none.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I just want to suggest to the Senator from Tennessee that the session is drawing to a close. It is only a question of time when we are going to have to have night sessions, and I think we had better move up a little in the morning. I do not object to meeting at 11.

Mr. McKELLAR. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. HALE. I agree with the Senator. I will say that if this bill drags along, I shall certainly ask for night sessions also.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the Senator ought to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BROOKHART. I am interested in every phase of this discussion. I have a meeting of the Military Affairs Committee that I want to attend until noon to-morrow, and there are other Senators in the same situation; and nothing will be gained by forcing this matter. This bill will come to a vote quicker by open, full debate than in any other way.

Mr. HALE. That is what I want to see; and I think Senators can arrange their engagements so as to meet at 11.

Mr. BROOKHART. You will not get it by crowding the hours. It will be impossible for me to arrange mine—absolutely impossible; and so, if the Senator insists, I shall have to object.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator wishes, he can object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. HALE. I understand that the Senator from Iowa objects to making it 11 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent agreement requested by the Senator from Maine?

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa objects. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment. Those who favor the amendment will say "aye." [A pause.] Those opposed will say "no."

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, as I understand, the amendment under consideration is the Dallinger amendment?

Mr. HALE. This amendment is the Dallinger amendment as amended by the committee. I will explain it if the Senator desires.

Mr. McKELLAR. O Mr. President, I did not understand that that was the amendment.

Mr. HALE. There has been no vote on it.

Mr. McKELLAR. But the Chair has just started to put the question on the amendment, and there is to be an amendment to that amendment. If the question has been put, I move that it be reconsidered. I ask unanimous consent to that effect.

Mr. HALE. I did not understand that the question had been put.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was not agreed to.

Mr. HALE obtained the floor.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. What is the matter immediately before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine was recognized.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the matter before the Senate now is the Senate amendment to the so-called Dallinger amendment that was put in on the floor in the House of Representatives.

The Dallinger amendment, as adopted by the House, provided:

That the first and each succeeding alternate cruiser upon which work is undertaken, together with the main engines, armor, and armament for such light cruisers, the construction and manufacture of which is authorized by this act, shall be constructed or manufactured in the Government navy yards, naval gun factories, naval ordnance plants, or arsenals of the United States.

The Senate Naval Affairs Committee put in the following amendment:

except such material or parts thereof as the Secretary of the Navy may find procurable by contract or purchase at an appreciable saving in cost to the Government.

The effect of the committee amendment is to stop what would otherwise prevail if the bill went through as it passed the House; that is, the obligation on the part of the Government to construct everything that has to do with these ships in the navy yards, no matter whether they were at the present time constructing them or not. For instance, a chronometer would have to be made in the yard, and all sorts of other appurtenances of ships. It is clearly out of the question to leave the matter as it was in the bill as it passed the House, and the Senate committee has taken care of that by the amendment we have offered.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, has not a similar provision been placed in naval appropriation bills before, and whenever it has been so placed in such a bill is it not true that the Secretary has found always that it was cheaper, according to his view, to procure the materials and parts by contract or purchase?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, for a number of years the annual appropriation bills have contained a labor clause reading as follows:

And that no part of the moneys herein appropriated for the Naval Establishment or herein made available therefor shall be used or expended under contracts hereafter made for the repair, purchase, or acquirement, by or from any private contractor, of any naval vessel, machinery, article or articles that at the time of the proposed repair, purchase, or acquirement can be repaired, manufactured, or produced in each or any of the Government navy yards or arsenals of the United States, when time and facilities permit and when, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy, such repair, purchase, acquirement, or production would not involve an appreciable increase in cost to the Government.

That clause has been in the last four annual appropriation bills. Acting under that, the Secretary, as far as cruisers are concerned, has provided that three of the eight we already have building should be built in the Government yards, and five in private yards.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the so-called Dallinger amendment provides:

That the first and each succeeding alternate cruiser upon which work is undertaken, together with the main engines, armor, and armament for such light cruisers, the construction and manufacture of which is authorized by this act, shall be constructed or manufactured in the Government navy yards, naval gun factories, naval ordnance plants, or arsenals of the United States.

Now, it is proposed to amend that amendment by placing it in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy to go to private yards for certain materials and parts thereof. Why do we build these yards, naval gun factories, naval ordnance plants, or arsenals of the United States, at great cost and expense, unless we are going to use them? Certainly we ought to use them to the extent that is provided in the original proviso.

Mr. HALE. We are going to use them.

Mr. McKELLAR. If we are going to do that, why put it in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, who heretofore has always used that discretion in behalf of the private plants? I do not believe we ought to do it.

Mr. HALE. I do not think he has.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to say to the Senator that while I am in favor of his bill, I am going to fight this amendment to the Dallinger amendment until there is a vote on it. I do not intend to let it pass if I can help it.

Mr. HALE. With the amendment the Senate committee has put in, eight of the cruisers will be built in Government yards, and possibly more.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The Senator is objecting to the proposed amendment to the Dallinger amendment?

Mr. McKELLAR. That is all; I am in favor of the Dallinger amendment.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The chairman can explain why that was put in.

Mr. HALE. It simply provides that certain parts which are to be used, which can be bought cheaper outside, may be bought outside.

Mr. McKELLAR. But it leaves it to the Secretary's discretion, and great complaints have been constantly urged before Congress to the effect that, without regard to the real expense, the Secretary of the Navy has uniformly, under a provision of this kind, held that the article can be gotten cheaper in a private plant, or by contract, than if procured in a Government plant. If we are going to maintain these Government plants, we ought to use them. We certainly ought to use them to the extent of 50 per cent. Here is a provision that gives the Secretary of the Navy an opportunity not to use them, and I do not propose that he shall be given that discretion if I can help it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Will the Senator have the goodness to look at the language of the proposed amendment, "except such material or parts thereof as the Secretary of the Navy may find procurable by contract or purchase at an appreciable saving in cost to the Government." It may be that a Government yard may be unable to furnish the particular part necessary to the construction of a cruiser.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator think that the Navy ought to go into the business of making chronometers, when they do not make them now, just because of this Dallinger amendment?

Mr. McKELLAR. Is that the only article that must be procured outside?

Mr. HALE. I am simply using that as an example.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, yes; the Senator is using that as a reason for this amendment, but the fact is that the amendment takes in all of the parts, and all of the material, if the Secretary should want to use his discretion to buy them outside, and that I am opposed to. I think that if we are going to have these navy yards and arsenals, we ought to use them, and if we are not going to use them, we ought to abolish them, because it costs the Government an enormous amount of money to keep them up.

Mr. HALE. But the Senator does not want to involve the Government in an unnecessary expense, does he?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no doubt in the world that these parts and this material can be produced cheaper in Government plants.

Mr. HALE. Not all of them.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no doubt that all of them can be, and if they can not, we have no business having these Government plants. They are a tremendous expense, a tremendous drain on the Government, and we ought not to keep those plants unless we are going to use them to the extent of at least one-half, as is provided in this bill.

What the amendment does is to provide that one-half of the cruisers shall be constructed in Government plants, and then to give to the Secretary of the Navy the discretion to have practically all the work done outside if he wants to, and I am opposed to that.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, the bill as it passed the House contained what is known as the Dallinger amendment, which provides that half the cruisers shall be built in Government navy yards, and half in private yards. I believe in such a division.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let us make that provision.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me—he would not let me interrupt him.

Mr. McKELLAR. I did not have the floor.

Mr. SWANSON. Let him be a little content while I explain this. A man must be equally generous with all in yielding time.

Mr. McKELLAR. If a man could not be generous to anybody as delightful and lovable as is the Senator from Virginia, he could not be generous to anybody in the world.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, this is drawn in this way because there are a great many things which the private yards do not produce themselves. People have patents on certain things. There are certain bolts, there are certain settings, on which there are patents, and it is utterly impossible to provide all the materials in any navy yard, unless the Government should build new factories and install new machinery, and build everything new. That is why the amendment is drawn in this way.

We intended to have it drawn so that the navy yards could be on an equality with the private yards in competing and doing the work.

As the Senator has said, the amendment is possibly too broadly drawn. I do not remember whether I was present in the committee when this particular amendment was adopted or not, but I have insisted that the Government navy yards should be on an equality, so far as competition was concerned, with the private yards. There are certain materials which the private yards themselves can not manufacture as cheaply as they can buy them, and every navy yard has to buy them. The Government yards desire to have the matter fixed so that the private yards will not have an advantage over them in the matter of certain materials which the Government yards have no factories and no machinery for making at the present time.

I suggest that the amendment be allowed to go over until tomorrow, and in the meantime some language may be framed which will put the Government navy yards on an absolute equality in this respect with the private yards. If we do not do that, the officials will come in and say that the construction of the ships in the Government navy yards would cost 50 per cent more than if constructed in private yards.

I have an idea that this goes a little further than the suggestion that was made in connection with giving the navy yards a fair opportunity to compete with the private yards. I see how under this the navy yards might be made simply assembling plants.

Mr. HALE. The Senator was present when this amendment was adopted in the committee.

Mr. SWANSON. I do not remember being present, but if I was present I may say that any mistake that is made ought to be corrected. I am not willing to have the navy yards made nothing but assembly yards.

Mr. HALE. The amendment reads:

except such material or parts thereof as the Secretary of the Navy may find procurable by contract or purchase at an appreciable saving in cost to the Government.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. What is wrong with that?

Mr. McKELLAR. That gives him the discretion to say that it may all be procured by private contract. In other words, it nullifies the Dallinger amendment. The Senator from Virginia is exactly right; if there is some article, such as a lamp burner, to which I believe the Senator referred a while ago, which the navy yard does not manufacture, I would be willing to have that excepted, because that would be a sensible thing to do. As I understand it, that is what the Senator from Virginia agreed to. But this, instead of carrying items of that sort, virtually puts it in the hands of the Secretary of the Navy to get these materials and parts—all of them—at private yards. Knowing the Senator from Virginia as I do, and being familiar with his knowledge of the Navy, I knew that this was not drawn by his fine Italian hand.

Mr. SWANSON. I gathered from what the Senator from Tennessee said that under this the Government navy yards might be made mere assembling plants, and I am not willing to agree to that.

Mr. HALE. The committee is not willing to have that done.

Mr. SWANSON. When I heard the Senator from Tennessee suggest that this might have that result, my suggestion was to let the amendment go over and see if we could not draw one that would get rid of the trouble that is found in the Dallinger amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope that may be done.

Mr. SWANSON. If what the Senator suggested were true, it would put the navy yards at a great disadvantage. When you try to remedy one provision you may destroy the effect of another by simply making the navy yards assembling plants. There is no use in doing that.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Of course, that was not the intention of the committee. I think the chairman has sufficiently explained the matter. A little careful reading, I say with respect, I think will show that there is no danger whatever unless Senators have no faith at all in the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. McKELLAR. We know what he has done in the past under similar provisions.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Of course we do.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator find any fault with the three cruisers that are being built now in the navy yards?

Mr. McKELLAR. I know what the Secretary of the Navy has done. He has decided against Government navy yards in favor of the private plants in a number of cases.

Mr. HALE. This is a fair proportion.

Mr. McKELLAR. The bill says that half of the cruisers are to be built in Government yards, and that is what ought to be done.

Mr. HALE. This goes a little further.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; it does, and it is a little more evenly divided. Does the Senator want to destroy the Government plants and arsenals?

Mr. HALE. No.

Mr. McKELLAR. He is taking the best means of destroying them.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I would like to destroy some of them, because they are absolutely fictitious and are kept up by Government funds in a most uneconomical way. To that extent they are to the distinct disadvantage of those navy yards that are real navy yards, so that you do not have to build a channel to get a ship into them.

Mr. McKELLAR. There might be a lot in that.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Does anyone want to destroy the private yards?

Mr. McKELLAR. Not that I know of.

Mr. BROOKHART. I would like to call the attention of the Senator from Virginia to this proposition; I am not sure just what he meant by it. The way the Dallinger amendment is worded there will be no competition between the Government and the private yards with reference to the building of the ships at all. It arbitrarily gives certain ships to private yards, and the Government has no chance to say anything about the price whatever. Is not that giving them an advantage that ought not to be granted?

Mr. SWANSON. No. If the Senator will permit me, navy yards can not compete in the way the Senator has in mind. The position I take is that if we are going to build these ships in the Government navy yards, there is no use hampering them in such a way that the ships will cost more than if they were built in private yards. There is certain material which they can not supply for the ships unless we create new manufacturing establishments in the navy yards, which we do not want to do. We intended to modify the Dallinger amendment so as to enable them to purchase all material that could not be constructed in the navy yards. We know the Government yards would be at a great disadvantage if they were compelled to furnish every bit of the material. It would merely mean that the ships would cost 50 per cent more than if they were built in private yards. The only purpose of the committee was to get an amendment which would eliminate that difficulty and prevent the necessity for the creation of new manufacturing establishments at the navy yards to furnish all parts of the ships. Some of those parts we must necessarily buy.

Mr. BROOKHART. I think I did not make myself understood. As to those vessels which are built in the navy yards I assume they will be built as cheaply as possible by the Government. There will be no question about that. But it occurs to me that as to the other seven which are to be built outside there is some question.

Mr. HALE. There is nothing in the bill that provides that they must be built in private yards at all. The bill simply provides:

That the first and each succeeding alternate cruiser upon which work is undertaken, together with the main engines, armor, and armament for such light cruisers, the construction and manufacture of which is authorized by this act, shall be constructed or manufactured in the Government navy yards.

Mr. BROOKHART. That I am not objecting to. But, now, read on and see what it says about the others.

Mr. HALE. It does not say anything about private shipyards at all.

Mr. SWANSON. The rest would be built in private yards or in navy yards.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is the point I did not understand. It seemed to me that the navy yards would have no chance to compete, and I thought there ought to be that opportunity.

Mr. SWANSON. The Government has not got the docks and the building ways in the navy yards to build all of them. It would cost a great deal of money to furnish them. I do not think they could build more than half of them without a vast expenditure of money on building ways.

Mr. HALE. As a matter of fact it could not be done anyway because we have not ways enough on which to build them.

Mr. BROOKHART. I had reached a different conclusion in reference to that language than the Senator from Maine seems to have.

Mr. HALE. The bill speaks for itself.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, may I make an inquiry? I just came into the Chamber as Senators were discussing the so-called Dallinger amendment. That is not under discussion at the moment for the purpose of adoption, as I understand, but the Senator was merely asking questions about it?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; for information more than anything else. I believe it is the question before the Senate for consideration and action, however.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. What amendment, if any, is before the Senate at the present time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRAZIER in the chair). The committee amendment is before the Senate.

Mr. HALE. The committee amendment to the House bill, which includes the Dallinger amendment.

Mr. EDGE. As the Senator knows, there are a great many Senators absent who are interested in that particular amendment.

Mr. HALE. The suggestion has just been made that we put the amendment over until to-morrow. I will withdraw it for the present time, but there is one other matter I would like to take up now.

Mr. EDGE. Then the Senator will let the Dallinger amendment go over until to-morrow?

Mr. HALE. Yes; there will be no action taken on it to-night.

Mr. WATSON. Why not take a recess now?

Mr. HALE. Wait just a moment.

Section 5 of the bill provides as follows:

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to present to the Congress on or before December 10, 1928, preliminary plans, specifications, and estimates of cost for the construction of two salvage vessels for use in ship disasters.

The date December 10, 1928, having gone by, it should obviously be changed. I therefore move to amend by striking out, on page 3, line 5, the numerals "1928" and inserting "1929."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 3, line 5, strike out the numerals "1928" and insert the numerals "1929," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 5. The Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to present to the Congress on or before December 10, 1929, preliminary plans, specifications, and estimates of cost for the construction of two salvage vessels for use in ship disasters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

RECESS

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Before putting the question on the motion, the Chair, under an order heretofore made, refers to the appropriate committees sundry executive nominations received to-day.

The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, January 25, 1929, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, January 24, 1929

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal Father, this moment, set apart and so sacred, may no rude alarm break in upon us, for Thy merciful condescension awakens in us the feeling of devotion. What shall it profit us if we suceed in one direction and fail in another? Make Thyself felt in every issue of our national life and endow us with every quality necessary for the good of the public service. Always enable us to give encouragement to those aspirations that move men's hearts and lend sympathy in those difficulties with which they are confronted. Again a Member has stopped. The shadow of a great loss is about him. May the agitated heart and the wounded spirit find peace in Him who denied it not to the poorest and the loneliest of the children of men. Through life and death Thou art all sufficient. We thank Thee that Thy promises are not tales of empty love nor words of fabled rest. In the name of our Savior. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

JOINT REUNION OF THE NORTH AND SOUTH

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be privileged to insert in the RECORD a little poem with reference to the proposed reunion of the armies of the Blue and the Gray.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by inserting a poem. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Following is the poem referred to:

JOINT REUNION, NORTH AND SOUTH

By Horace C. Carlisle

The pages of history never have told,
In all of the realm of unfortunate wars,
So startling a story as that which relates
To southern secession and war 'twixt the States,
Baptizing in anguish the Stripes and the Stars—
And yet the reunion, divine in the end,
Made each warring faction its enemy's friend.

The North and the South have their differences still—
Each section yet stages, apart and alone,
Its seperate reunion—to cherish anew
The long bloody fight 'twixt the Gray and the Blue—
Though sectional hate is now almost unknown.
The great Civil War might have never been fought
Had both sides but known what experience taught.

These separate reunions of both North and South
Are swiftly approaching expectancy's end—
The sickle of time has kept pruning away
The lessening ranks of the Blue and the Gray,
Till few of each faction are left to attend.
Each, judging the future alone by the past,
Knows every reunion is nearing the last.

If these two reunions, divergent in views,
Approaching so nearly their ultimate ends,
Might bury together their wounds and their scars,
Down deep in the folds of the Stripes and the Stars,
And meet in a last joint reunion like friends—
And then should adjourn "sine die"—the sod,
Baptized in His tears, would shout "Glory to God!"

Then out into history as they both pass—
So sweet from forgiveness's heart through its mouth—
All over the world, far and wide, back and forth,
The Star-Spangled Banner would ring from the North,
While Dixie might sing from the heart of the South—
And then, at the last farewell tap of the drum,
From God's great reunion would come home, sweet home.

STATEMENT OF HON. PEDRO GUEVARA, RESIDENT COMMISSIONER FROM THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

Mr. WILLIAMS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by having printed a statement made by Mr. GUEVARA, Resident Commissioner from the Philippine Islands.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The statement is as follows:

THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, it is with deep regret on my part that I appear before this committee to discuss a question pertaining to the relationship between the United States and the Philippine Islands, as they were defined by the responsible and constitutional leaders of the American people and by the Congress of the United States itself.

Had this existing relation between the United States and the Philippine Islands been properly solved in one way or another by the sovereign power there would have been no occasion to engage in this discussion which is now provoked by the proposed limitation of entry of Philippine sugar and tobacco to the United States and the levying of a duty on coprax, coconut oil, and cordage.

The Filipino people as a whole are opposed to this proposition, though it may seem somewhat inconsistent with their stand in their aspiration for political independence. A thorough discussion of the question, however, will bring home to the members of this committee that the opposition of the Filipino people is fully justified and well founded.

First of all, I wish to emphasize the fact that the Filipino people do not claim any privilege which is not in consonance with the American principles. Furthermore, they are not inclined to claim any right which is not deeply rooted in the principles upon which the relationship between the United States and the Philippine Islands was founded.

The opposition of the Filipino people to the plan of limiting the free entry of Philippine sugar and tobacco to the United States and the levying of duty on coprax, coconut oil, and cordage is founded on the following grounds:

First. It violates the underlying principles of the free-trade relations between the United States and the Philippine Islands.

Second. It violates the fundamental rights of all the people living under the American flag to the pursuit of life, liberty, and happiness.

Third. It will be the beginning of economic slavery in the Philippine Islands and will announce to the world a policy of exploitation of a weaker and less fortunate people.

Fourth. It will lay down a policy on the part of the Government of the United States of setting aside the principle of equal opportunity to all and special privilege to none.

Fifth. It will give birth to a new American policy of extending a greater protection to foreign countries than those which, in the words of President McKinley, were brought by providential designs under the shades and protection of the American flag.

Sixth. The passage of the Timberlake resolution will not have the intended effect of encouraging the development and protection of the beet-sugar industry in the continental United States.

Seventh. It will open the American market to the flood of Cuban sugar to the injury of the beet-sugar industry in continental United States.

Eighth. It will cause an increase in the price of sugar consumed and needed in American homes.

Ninth. It will sanction the un-American principle of considering a country foreign for one purpose and domestic for another.

Tenth. It is against the policy of the Government of the United States to develop the Philippine Islands economically for the mutual benefit of both countries.

The present trade relations between the United States and the Philippine Islands should fall under the principle governing the interstate commerce. It was unhappily termed "free trade," probably because of the uncertain political status of the Philippine Islands under the American flag. To my mind, however, whatever may be the present political status of the Philippine Islands, it is evident and undeniable that that country is now under the American flag and sovereignty. To be under the American flag and sovereignty is, if I am not mistaken, a qualification to acquire those fundamental rights of American citizenship to pursue happiness, life, and prosperity. I will discuss this point later in the course of my remarks.

Now, under the terms of the free-trade relations between the United States and the Philippine Islands it is provided:

"That all articles, the growth or product of or manufactured in the Philippine Islands from materials, the growth or product of or manufactured in the Philippine Islands or of the United States, or of both, or which do not contain foreign materials to the value of more than 20 per cent of their total value, upon which no drawback of customs duties has been allowed therein, coming into the United States from the Philippine Islands shall hereafter be admitted free of duty: Provided, however, That in consideration of the exemptions aforesaid, all articles, the growth, product, or manufacture of the United States, upon which no drawback of customs duties has been allowed therein, shall be admitted to the Philippine Islands from the United States free of duty." (Tariff act, 1913, Sec. IV, ch. 16.)

It is now proposed to amend this specific provision of the tariff act above quoted, as far as it concerns the sugar and tobacco produced in the Philippine Islands and the levying of a duty on coprax, coconut oil, and cordage, but not as to any product, articles, or growth and manufactured in the United States. The resolution would place the Philippine Islands in a very disadvantageous position as to its exportation to the United States, maintaining, however, the present already advantageous position of the United States as to its articles, the growth, product, or manufacture.

I look at this question as one that should command the most careful attention on the part of the members of this committee. It is worthy to note that under the terms of the present trade relations between the United States and the Philippine Islands there is already a discrimination against the latter country. It does not establish, as it should, the absolute reciprocity which is the ruling principle in all free-trade relations. The plan suggested would give greater opportunities and advantages to the United States, which is much larger and wealthier than the Philippine Islands. This point alone should cause all fair-minded Americans to disapprove this unfortunate plan which the committee has now under its consideration.

Of course, I am ready to admit that the Congress of the United States, in the exercise of its constitutional authority and jurisdiction, could enact any law discriminatory to the Philippine Islands, notwithstanding the fact that it is under the American flag. The question, however, is, Should Congress pass such legislation, un-American in its nature and oppressive in its character? Should Congress pass any legislation discriminatory to any people because its Government has enough power and strength to enforce such a law? I refuse to believe that the Government of the United States will ever commit itself to such a policy.

This Government was the first to negotiate the treaty restoring to China complete tariff autonomy and guaranteeing its citizens against discrimination. This fact was particularly emphasized by President Coolidge in his message to Congress on December 4, 1928.

It is pertinent to point out that the Filipinos, even if not enjoying the privilege of American citizenship, are nevertheless for all purposes conationals, for they are under the protection of the same flag that protects American citizens and owe allegiance to the same Government. Why, then, should the Congress of the United States pass legislation discriminating against Filipinos who are conationals of American citizens?

At this point I wish to indulge my time now in briefly reviewing the motives and reasons for the occupation of the Philippine Islands by the United States.

It is common knowledge that the occupation of the Philippine Islands by the United States took place only as an incident of the war against Spain. After the American flag was hoisted in that country it was made necessary to define the reasons and motives for such occupation. And so President McKinley, in his message to Congress in 1899, said:

"We shall continue, as we have begun, to open the schools and the churches, to set the courts in operation, to foster the industry and trade and agriculture, and in every way in our power to make this people whom Providence has brought within our jurisdiction feel that it is their liberty not our power, their welfare and not our gain we are seeking to enhance."

Upon another occasion President McKinley said:

"We accepted the Philippines from high duty in the interest of their inhabitants and for humanity and civilization. Our sacrifices were with these high motives. We want to improve the condition of the inhabitants, securing them peace, liberty, and the pursuit of their highest good."

There is no more need to interpret these official utterances of President McKinley in the days when the Philippine Islands were first occupied by the United States, for they are very clear.

The plan proposed is in nowise in accordance with the reasons and motives which prompted the accupation of the Philippine Islands by the United States. It certainly will not foster industry, trade, and agriculture in the Philippine Islands as announced by President McKinley in his message to Congress in 1899. Nor will it make good the "sacrifices" asserted by the President for the high motive of improving the conditions of the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands and to secure them the pursuit of their highest good.

The fulfillment of a duty always presupposes sacrifices, and the plan proposed is a departure from the ideals and principles upon which the occupation of the Philippine Islands by the United States finds justification. It was for this reason that the free-trade relations between the United States and the Philippine Islands was established—to facilitate the pursuit of the "highest good" of the inhabitants therein. Should these free-trade relations be modified in the manner proposed, that "highest good" of the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands, which is the corner stone of the American sovereignty in those islands, will no longer be the ideal of this Nation. On the contrary, the adoption of the said plan will thereafter mean that the "highest good" of a few inhabitants of the United States and Cuba was the reason and motive for the American sovereignty in the Philippines. I have to admit, however, that it is also the duty of this Government to assure and ascertain the "highest good" of its citizens above all. But to my mind it is a question of honor and duty for the American people to cut the tie now holding the Philippine Islands under the American flag if their economic interests are really in conflict.

If the American people believe it injurious in their interest to adjust their policy with the reasons and motives given for holding the Philippine Islands under their sovereignty, there is no other alternative but to free the Filipinos from all political connection with the United States, unless there is a decided plan or purpose to hold them in bondage and oppression.

Ex-President Taft, on October 16, 1907, said:

"The policy looks to the improvement of the people (the Filipinos) both industrially and in self-government capacity. As this policy of extending control continues, it must logically reduce and finally end the sovereignty of the United States in the islands, unless it shall seem wise to the American and the Filipino peoples, on account of mutually beneficial trade relations and possible advantage to the islands in their foreign relations, that the bond shall not be completely severed."

If our present political relationship is no longer mutually beneficial on account of the competition that the industrial and agricultural products of the Philippine Islands may offer or actually offer to American commodities, then, in honesty and fairness to both peoples, the sovereignty of the United States in the islands should be ended, thus permitting the Filipino people to work out their own salvation and destiny. It is unthinkable even to imagine that the American people will be inclined to tie the hands of the Filipinos in order to deprive them of their needed strength and freedom to fight out their existence in these days of intensive and hard struggle for life.

The worst aspect of the matter now under discussion is that the policy proposed in the plan is sought only to be applied to the Philippine Islands, and not to her other outlaying possessions, and this fact alone will show to the members of this committee how resentful the Filipino people ought to be. In passing, I wish to quote what Governor Stimson, of the Philippine Islands, one of the most distinguished citizens and statesmen of this country, said in discussing the propriety of the Timberlake resolution. Addressing the American Chamber of Commerce of the Philippine Islands, on August 15, 1928, he said:

"No words can adequately express the depths of my feeling on that subject, because the attempt to restrict freedom of trade between the islands and the United States represents about the worst possible backward step that could be taken in American policy. It would mean going back to those old doctrines of colonial relations of 300 years ago, which held that the colonies of a country existed solely for the benefit of the mother country and could be exploited at will by that country. It would mean going back to a doctrine which caused the withering up throughout the centuries of the flourishing colonies of Portugal and Spain and would have done it for Great Britain if it had not been for the American Revolution."

Governor Stimson continued to say:

"Just think what it would do to that attempt on the part of America to cultivate oriental trade if our rivals could turn around and point to an attempt at unfairness and injustice to our own people under the American flag in these islands!"

The United States, from 1913 on, has wisely applied to the Philippine Islands the policy of quasi-tariff assimilation. Such a course was not possible before 1913, for, in accordance with Article IV of the treaty of Paris, it was agreed upon that for a term of 10 years from the date of the exchange of the ratification of the said treaty the United States is to admit Spanish ships and merchandise to the ports of the Philippine Islands on the same terms as ships and merchandise of the United States. Therefore the application to the Philippines of the policy of tariff assimilation would be injurious to the United States, for the Philippine Islands might become a spot from which Spanish merchandise could be sent to the United States duty free. After the expiration of 10 years agreed upon in the treaty of Paris, the United States immediately applied to the Philippine Islands the policy of quasi-tariff assimilation, thus establishing the free trade between the two countries.

The United States, in order to modify its tariff policy as applied to the Philippines, must concur in three important reasons, to wit: (a) International relations, (b) geographical influence, and (c) interest of consumers.

As far as I am aware, none of these reasons is now in existence to justify the modification of the tariff policy of the United States toward the Philippine Islands. It is but fair to ascertain how, when the United States in 1913 saw fit to apply to the Philippine Islands its present tariff policy, its framers thoroughly considered these three reasons the most important of all, being the international relations and the interests of the consumers, which seems to be the foundation of the tariff policy proposed to this committee.

As to my second point, that the plan violates the fundamental rights of all the people living under the American flag to the pursuit of life, liberty, and happiness.

In the Declaration of Independence of the thirteen Colonies it was declared that—"we hold as self-evident truth; that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by the Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness."

It is evident from this declaration that the Filipinos will be denied the right to pursue their happiness if the proposed plan is passed by the Congress of the United States. If the United States closes the doors of its market to the Philippine products and at the same time deprives them of the instrumentalities essential to the upbuilding of their markets abroad, it will be tantamount to hindering their economic progress, which is vital to their happiness, prosperity, and life.

The list of grievances of the thirteen Colonies against the British Empire recites among other things the following:

"For imposing taxes on us without our consent."

Under the slogan of "Taxation without representation" the American people fought the greatest and bloodiest revolution the world had ever witnessed, and when victory was attained they formulated and adopted the Constitution for the United States, which is the document from which all the nations take inspiration.

In that Constitution was written that "no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any State" which is essential for the promotion of happiness, life, and liberty of the inhabitants therein. It may be suggested, as it was suggested by Mr. TIMBERLAKE, of Colorado, that the Philippine Islands has not yet acquired the status of a State. In reply to this argument I shall say that the framers of the Constitution, when it was formulated and adopted, never thought that the Union was to acquire outlying possessions by conquest or by any other title, pursuing the colonial designs of Great Britain, against whom they emancipated themselves through the force of arms. It is but logical to think that the framers of the Constitution have not had in their minds to bring under the American flag people to whom the right to pursue happiness, life, and liberty is to be denied. And so the Supreme Court of the United States, in the cases of De Lima v. Bidwell (182 U. S. 1) and Fourteen Diamond Rings v. United States (183 U. S. 176), said:

"With the ratification of the treaty of peace between the United States and Spain, April 11, 1899, the islands of Porto Rico ceased to be 'a foreign country' within the meaning of the tariff law."

The same doctrine was followed and upheld in the case of Fourteen Diamond Rings against United States, which was a direct discussion on the tariff status of the Philippine Islands.

The contentions in those two cases, as admitted to the court by the parties thereof, were:

"1. Porto Rico (or the Philippine Islands) was not in June or September, 1899, 'a foreign country' within the meaning of that term as used in the tariff act of 1897.

"2. Even if—in denial of the foregoing contention—the tariff act of 1897 had to be construed as in fact purporting to authorize the collection of duties on goods brought from Porto Rico into New York in June or September, 1899, then, in that aspect of it and to that extent, the act in question must be held unconstitutional and ineffectual to justify the exaction complained of in this case."

The fundamental constitutional points were raised in the discussion of those two cases, to wit: (a) Congress can not "lay and collect" any "duties" save such as are "uniform throughout the United States"; (b) "duties" collectible "on goods brought from Porto Rico into New York in June or September, 1899," would have been duties not "uniform throughout the United States," Porto Rico having been ever since the ratification of the treaty with Spain a part of "the United States."

When these two cases were argued before the Supreme Court of the United States very interesting and enlightening arguments were presented by both sides, and if I could have more time than that allotted me I would produce them before this committee. For my purpose it would be sufficient for me to quote here the high lights of the decision of the court. Justice Brown, who delivered the opinion of the court, said:

"The theory that a country remains foreign with respect to the tariff laws until Congress has acted by embracing it within the customs union, presupposes that a country may be domestic for one purpose and foreign for another."

After the discussion by the court of several incidental facts of the case, it said:

"We are unable to acquiesce in this assumption that a Territory may be at the same time both foreign and domestic."

Therefore the court decided that Porto Rico was not a foreign country within the meaning of the tariff laws, but a Territory of the United States; that the duties were illegally exacted, and that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover them back.

I am aware, Mr. Speaker, of the arguments advanced that the Philippine Islands have not so far acquired the status of a State of the Union, and for this reason they can not claim the rights of any of those States guaranteed by the Constitution as to the uniformity of taxes and that "no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any States."

In addition to the arguments I have already set forth, I wish to examine now the constitutional meaning of the words "the United States." When the Constitution refers to "the United States" it does not convey the idea that "the United States" is limited to the geographical boundaries of the States of the Union.

This very point was thoroughly discussed in the case of De Lima against Bidwell. The counsel for the plaintiff said in this respect the following:

"All territory lawfully acquired and taken under sovereign jurisdiction is a part of the United States. The Constitution is a charter or grant of powers conferred upon the Federal Government by the people of the United States. The Federal Government has no existence outside of this Constitution. Hence it is a confusion of terms to speak of territory to which the United States has acquired title as not being within our 'constitutional boundaries' or incorporated into the United States. It is a misapprehension of the nature of our institutions and of the function of the organic law of our national existence, known as the 'Constitution,' to speak of any part of the Nation being beyond its boundaries or to speak of its 'existence' over portions or over all of the national territory. There is no boundary to the Constitution other than the whole sphere of the activity of the Federal Government. Outside of that sphere, beyond that boundary, the Federal Government can only act by usurpation—a government of force, not of law—and officers assuming to act for the United States outside of the prescriptions of the Constitution are, however well-intentioned, outside of the law."

From what I have stated it does not necessarily follow that all the provisions of the Constitution of the United States are applied to its outlying possessions, like Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands. It is evident, however, that when Congress legislates for the outlying possessions its power and authority ought to be in harmony with the Constitution. For instance, Congress can not pass any law permitting in the Philippine Islands the practice of polygamy or the establishment of slavery. Yet these specific provisions of the Constitution are not applied to the Philippine Islands. The nonapplication of the Constitution to the Philippine Islands does not mean that Congress could pass legislation for the outlying possessions outside of the provisions of that Constitution.

The part of the Constitution of the United States which provides that "the trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury," and woman suffrage is not applicable to the Philippine Islands. Congress, however, can not pass any legislation for the Philippine Islands prohibiting its local legislature to pass a law granting its inhabitants the trial by jury or granting suffrage to the women therein.

The theory that the Constitution does not follow the flag is not absolute. The principles embodied in the Constitution and symbolized by the flag go with it wherever it may be hoisted. But whether the Constitution does or does not follow the flag, it is self-evident truth that it remains in the United States as the fountain from which Congress should take inspiration in the exercise of its legislative authority.

No, Mr. Speaker, I hate to think that there is any overt or covert aim in the plan to establish economic slavery in the Philippines. I would rather prefer to believe that if this were the effect of the passage of the proposed plan it would have to be without the conscientious approval of its proponents. And yet it would be the effect, if passed. This point can be briefly demonstrated. The resolution limits to 500,000 tons the sugar that the Philippine Islands could export to the United States. It is also proposed to levy a duty on coconut oil, coprax, and cordage, and to put a limitation to Philippine tobacco. Above the limitation the full tariff wall will be applied. The United States will continue holding its right to export to the Philippine Islands all her products, growth, and manufacture duty free. This fact will compel the Filipinos to buy, by law of necessity, nothing but American products and merchandise for the reason that similar products and merchandise coming from foreign countries are in nowise able to establish in the Philippine Islands a competitive market. They will continue paying the customs duty they are required to pay now, and this will give an absolute monopoly of the Philippine market to American products and merchandise.

The American products and merchandise are now, in fact, without competition in the Philippine market, and if they so desire could dictate the price and hence absorb all the energy of the purchasing capacity of the people. What then? Now that the government of the Philippine Islands, through the help of American capital or Filipino capital, and now that the first step has been already taken in that direction by the able leadership of Governor Stimson, the wages will be at their disposal, for the people of the Philippine Islands, having been deprived of the benefit of the American market, the only one they could have under the circumstances for their major industries, will be plunged into poverty, reducing them to mere wage hunters. This picture of the situation to be created by the plan, if adopted, is baffling. It should startle any humanitarian government. Besides, this proposed limitation and levying of duty on coconut oil and copra will have the effect of giving more protection to foreign countries than the Philippine Islands, which is under the American flag. It is a well-known fact that Cuban sugar enjoys the privilege of preferential duty in the United States. The Philippine sugar, if the proposed limitation is adopted, will pay the full duty imposed on foreign sugar entering the United States above the 500,000-ton limit. This policy will operate to render more protection to Cuban sugar than that produced in the Philippine Islands. It will be a strange policy to be adopted by the United States, and it will upset all the previous benefits received by the Filipinos from this Nation.

It is alleged that the proposed limitation of importation of Philippine sugar to the United States is intended to encourage the development of its beet-sugar industry. This can be properly demonstrated to be fallacious. The beet-sugar industry in the continental United States can not exist without the importation of seasonal Mexican labor and seeds from Germany. Once the beet-sugar industry has been properly developed it has to employ American labor with the wage rate now enforced throughout the United States.

The cost of production of the beet sugar in the continental United States will be such as to cause the rise of the price of this commodity used and needed in American homes. According to statistics, the cost of beet-sugar production in this country with the employment of seasonal Mexican labor is 3 cents per pound. (Report of the Federal Trade Commission on the beet-sugar industry in the United States May 24, 1917.)

The hearings from February 21 to April 8, before the House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, on the bills regulating Mexican immigration, the hearings on the tariff before the corresponding committees of the Senate and the House, and the well-documented discussions before the United States Tariff Commission a few years ago conclusively established the fact that Mexican labor is indispensable in the beet-sugar industry in America. A man with his family working an acre of land is paid around $24 for the season, and according to experts, if a sugar-beet planter is asked to pay $100 per acre instead of $24, the industry can only exist at the expense of the consumer, who will be compelled to pay an unconscionable high price.

It has been reported by the child-welfare organizations that the sugar-beet industry is the heaviest employer of child labor. It is but fair to hope that a child labor law will be adopted by those States where the sugar-beet industry is in full development and the enlightened leaders of the industry can be depended on reasonably to observe both the ethics and the humanity of the case.

If the amount paid to a man and his family for producing 1 acre of beet sugar is $24, which makes the cost of production 3 cents per pound, then the conclusion is that paying $100 per acre it will cost at least 12 cents to produce a pound of this commodity. Adding to this the cost of production per pound of sugar, the cost of transportation, storage, taxes, administration, depreciation, and other expenses for its marketing, the result will be a tremendous and startling high price of sugar for the American consumer. Its effect would be that the Cuban sugar will flood the American market, for that country is able to produce sugar so much more cheaply than it can be produced in any other part of the world. Cuba in this case—to compete successfully—would not need the benefit of any tariff preference in the United States.

According to statistics the cost of production of sugar in Cuba is from 1.75 to 2 cents per pound. The transportation from Cuba to New York is estimated to be 15 cents per hundred pounds, or about three-twentieths of a cent per pound.

The cost of production of Philippine sugar per pound, delivered at New York, is from 3 to 3½ cents. A slight comparison of the cost of production per pound of the Cuban sugar to that of the Philippine sugar, both delivered at New York, will show that the Philippine sugar needs more protection than that of Cuba. I will not deal any further with this statistical matter, for General McIntyre has dealt or will deal with them with abundant data and figures.

Suffice for me to say that any restriction to be imposed on Philippine sugar and tobacco importation into the United States and any duty to be levied on coprax and coconut oil will be absolutely contrary to the announced policy of the Government of the United States to develop the Philippine Islands economically for the mutual benefit of both countries. The essence of the whole question now before this committee is one that affects the fundamentals of the existing relationship between the United States and the Philippine Islands. The United States would fail to fulfill its trusteeship over the Philippine Islands by discouraging the economic development of that country. The Philippine Islands and the inhabitants therein would be unhappy and discontented if held by the United States under her flag and sovereignty and were prevented by congressional action to enjoy the privilege of free trade with the mother country. Such a proposition is a challenge to American fairness and justice.

In passing it is worthy to note that it seems that the Philippine Islands is to be converted to a spot where even American citizens have to suffer from her anomalous political situation. The American citizens in the Philippine Islands were, and are, placed by the Congress of the United States in a disadvantageous and the worst position in comparison with other foreigners. They are subjected to double taxation by their own home Government.

In justice to them, I wish to call to the attention of this committee that President Coolidge in his message to Congress on December 4, 1928, emphatically pointed out the grim necessity of relieving those American citizens from double taxation, for which they are justly asking.

The Philippine Islands, under the present circumstances and conditions, and under the legislations enacted by Congress of the United States, is a better place in which to live for a Britisher, Japanese, French, German, or a Chinese than for an American citizen.

If the Philippine Islands should become independent, I am positive that they will see to it that American citizens occupy a place of parity, if not better, than any other foreigners in those islands.

I wish to take advantage of this opportunity to entreat this committee to devise some means of relieving those American citizens now residing in the Philippine Islands from double taxation, thus placing them at the same footing with their foreign competitors. This is but just and fair. Let it be known that those American citizens who have invested money in the Philippine Islands may be properly regarded as the forerunners of this Nation in the Far East. They have made sacrifices in leaving their homeland and those dear to them that they may unfurl in that part of the world the banner of prestige and glory of this great Nation. For this reason alone, if not for any other, they deserve most careful consideration on the part of the United States Congress.

FIRST DEFICIENCY BILL, 1929

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, the deficiency appropriation bill has just been reported to the House with Senate amendments. No request has been made to send it to conference, but it may be at any time during the day.

Now, I know that a great many Members of the House are very much interested in the amendment of Senator HARRIS in the deficiency appropriation bill which provides for an adequate appropriation for prohibition enforcement. I think there ought to be some notice given to the membership of the House as to when this matter may be called up, in order that the Members may be present, and in order that they may have the parliamentary situation fixed so that the House may be assured of a vote on that amendment and a debate on it.

I would like to know if there is anyone on the floor who is authorized to speak and say when it is expected to call up this appropriation bill, either for concurrence in the Senate amendments or to send it to conference?

Mr. TILSON. If the gentleman is directing his remarks to me, I will say that I have talked with the member of the Committee on Appropriations who is in charge of the bill, and asked him to let me know a day in advance of the time when he intends to bring it up.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then the House will be able to have some notice as to when it will be called up, so that we may be assured of some notice when it is to be called up?

Mr. TILSON. I do not think there is any intention of springing a surprise on the House. It was my purpose to notify the House a day in advance in order that the Members of the House may be here. There is no reason for imputing to anyone the purpose of springing a surprise on anybody.

Mr. HASTINGS. I thought the House was entitled to have notice given when it was to be brought up.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Many gentlemen are interested in the question of when the deficiency bill will be sent to conference. Undoubtedly we can consult the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], in charge of it, and get from him a statement as to when he intends to bring it up.

Mr. TILSON. I have already asked the gentleman from Indiana to let me know.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. The gentleman from Indiana, in fairness to the Members, could give notice as to when he intends to call it up. Some Members, I may say, desire to go away at the end of the week, but they do not want to go away if that bill is to be called up this week. In the interest of accommodation of various Members on both sides of the aisle, let me urge the gentleman from Connecticut to urge the gentleman from Indiana to give notice when he intends to call it up.

Mr. TILSON. I do not think that I should encourage Members to leave the city, but I asked the gentleman from Indiana to let me know in order that I might notify the Members of the House as to when it is intended to call it up.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Could not the gentleman from Indiana say when he expects to call it up?

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. CRAMTON. I think it is shown in the RECORD that this bill has only come back from the Senate within the last five minutes. It happens that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD], who will be the House conferee in charge of the bill, is not now on the floor. I am sure no gentleman here needs to have any worry about the gentleman from Indiana giving every courtesy and consideration that may be desired. If this question is brought up when the gentleman from Indiana is here, I am sure there will be no hesitation on his part to so inform the House.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Will the gentleman from Michigan undertake to get in touch with him to-day, so that the RECORD of to-day may show when he intends to call that up?

Mr. TILSON. It may be that the gentleman from Indiana has not yet determined when he will bring it up, but I have asked the gentleman from Indiana to let me know at least a day in advance when he intends to call it up.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question? The press this morning reports that the House administration has been asked to kill this prohibition amendment which was passed by the Senate. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think it fair to the membership of the House, in view of the fact that this question is one concerning which all of the people of the United States are interested one way or the other, that we be given a chance to debate the matter with the idea of giving our conferees definite instructions before they go to conference? That matter ought to be debated thoroughly before the matter goes to conference.

Mr. TILSON. The House is master of the situation.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, but the gentleman is in control of the whole situation, and the gentleman knows a motion could be made to send this bill to conference without any debate at all.

Mr. TILSON. There would have to be a majority of the membership of the House present in order to carry that motion.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Of course, this debate has been proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. EDWARDS. Is it now in order to submit a motion to instruct the conferees with respect to this matter?

The SPEAKER. No; not until the bill is called up.

MEMORIAL EXERCISES FOR HON. MARTIN B. MADDEN

Mr. SPROUL of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SPROUL of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, ladies and gentlemen of the House, some three weeks ago my colleague from Illinois [Mr. BRITTEN] asked and received unanimous consent to have Sunday, February 10, set aside as a day on which to hold memorial services for our departed Member, the Hon. MARTIN B. MADDEN. Since that time a resolution has been passed by the House appointing a committee to look after those memorial services. I have consulted the family of Mr. MADDEN and they want his services held in conjunction with the services held for other Members who have passed away. Therefore I ask unanimous consent that the order to make Sunday, February 10, a memorial day for the Hon. MARTIN B. MADDEN be vacated.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the order under which Sunday, February 10, was made a memorial day for the late MARTIN B. MADDEN be vacated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

RESIGNATION

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following communication:

JANUARY 23, 1929.

Hon. NICHOLAS LONGWORTH,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I hereby tender my resignation as a member of the Committee on Rules.

Very sincerely yours,

C. W. RAMSEYER.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the resignation will be accepted.

There was no objection.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS

The SPEAKER. To-day business which was in order yesterday is in order, and the Clerk will call the committees.

The Clerk called the committees, and when the Committee on the Public Lands was called—

ASSESSMENT OF BENEFITS AGAINST PUBLIC LANDS AND LANDS HERETOFORE OWNED BY THE UNITED STATES

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Public Lands I call up H. R. 10657, to authorize the assessment of levee, road, drainage, and other improvement-district benefits against public lands and lands heretofore owned by the United States. This bill is on the House Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Utah calls up a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The parliamentary situation in regard to this bill is that it has been read twice, and if no amendments are proposed the question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, there are some amendments to be offered and some changes made. When we brought up the bill on the last Calendar Wednesday there was considerable discussion, and a number of changes are to be recommended. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DRIVER] for the purpose of having an explanation made concerning the bill.

Mr. DRIVER. Mr. Speaker, when this bill was under consideration on last Wednesday, a fear was expressed on the part of some of the Members that the permission carried by this bill to levy the assessment provided for was possibly too broad and would permit the accumulation of assessments on these lands, former public lands, before the title ripened in the occupant. It being my intention to fully protect against any such contingency I expressed then to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON], who raised this question of doubt, my desire to eliminate all question about it. Therefore further conferences were held with Judge Finney, of the land department, and he has prepared a suggestion of amendments to take the place of sections 1, 2, and 3 of the bill which, in his opinion, will limit these assessments to the time when the title ripens in the occupant. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I offer the following as an amendment to sections 1, 2, and 3.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DRIVER to sections 1, 2, and 3 of the bill: Strike out all of sections 1, 2, and 3, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of the Government of the United States to the levy of special assessments, based upon benefits estimated to be derived from local levee and drainage districts within the boundaries of the St. Francis levee district in Arkansas, within the State of Arkansas, is hereby expressed and given. The laws of the State of Arkansas, levying said special assessments and providing for the enforcement of such levy and the establishment of a lien and of all remedies pertaining thereto are expressly made applicable to the lands described in this act: Provided, That no levy, assessment, or collection of any special assessment shall attach or be applicable to any lands of the United States, nor permit the collection of any special assessment for such tax from the United States Government, nor from any entryman or person as to any such lands until the date when the entryman or purchaser shall become entitled to a patent from the United States for such land. Such levy, special assessment, or tax shall not operate against the Government of the United States, and shall only operate and take effect and be in force when and if the equitable title to any particular tract of land involved shall have passed from the United States to such entryman or purchaser, and such entryman or purchaser shall have become entitled to patent therefor.

"SEC. 2. That all the acts, levies, assessments, and proceedings in substantial accordance with the laws of Arkansas, and all levies and assessments of benefits against lands, the equitable title to which had passed as provided in section 1 of this act, are hereby cured and confirmed, and the same shall not be set aside, vacated, or annulled by any court for want of jurisdiction or any irregularity in the proceedings, based upon the want of authority now conferred by this act.

"SEC. 3. That this act shall be available to the St. Francis levee district of Arkansas, and to any drainage district within the boundaries of the St. Francis levee district heretofore or hereafter created, as expressing the consent of the Government to the special assessments fixed substantially in accordance with the laws of Arkansas and this act."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question about the bill?

Mr. DRIVER. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I note that the title of the bill refers—I read:

to public lands and lands heretofore owned by the United States.

This language of the title would include any or all such lands wherever located.

Mr. DRIVER. There is an express exception, I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit further? The body of the bill, however, relates specifically and exclusively to such lands within the State of Arkansas. Ought not the title to be amended to read "heretofore owned by the United States within the boundaries of the State of Arkansas," so that the title will also be specific and relate exclusively to lands within that State, as does the bill?

Mr. DRIVER. Yes. Under the suggestion made by Judge Finney I notice that is true, so I will ask that the title be amended so as to provide for that.

Mr. SNELL. I suppose the gentleman is going to explain the practical effect of this amendment?

Mr. DRIVER. I will be very pleased to. I made the explanation on Wednesday of last week, I will say to the gentleman from New York; but I will be glad to repeat it at this time.

Mr. SNELL. If the explanation has been made, I do not know that I want the gentleman to repeat it.

Mr. DRIVER. I will be very pleased to make it again. The purpose here is to provide for the assessment of drainage and levy benefits on the heretofore publicly owned lands of the eastern part of Arkansas. The land is in two counties.

These lands were lowlands, the drainage basins for the higher lands of that section, at one time claimed under the laws of the State of Arkansas as riparian lands; and under the operation of that law the title of the shore owners extended to the thread of the stream.

Now, through certain reclamation work that was placed in that area, these lands were partially uncovered and the attention of the Government was called to the fact that they were at one time similar to the higher areas about them. They were created by that very remarkable earth disturbance of 1811, called the New Madrid earthquake, and when they were originally surveyed under the direction of the United States Government, the surveyors delimited these areas, meandered them, and marked them on the plat and surveys as lakes. In fact, they were land in place and through all these areas were elevations covered with the same character of timber that you find on the adjacent higher lands.

The Government then asserted title, successfully, to these lands.

Now, in the meantime, while the supposed riparian owners were in control, drainage districts and the levee district were organized and through the influence of these works the lands were uncovered and made valuable.

The Supreme Court of the United States a couple of years ago in a case pending at the instance of one who held a tract of this land, decided that if these lands were the property of the United States at the time of the organization of these reclamation works or districts, the lands would be forever exempted from their levees.

So we find ourselves in an attitude where these lands have become a part of the security for the issues of bonds that went into the construction of the works that made these particular lands valuable, because without them these basins could never have been cultivated.

No question had been raised by the people who were in possession of the property and paying their taxes until this particular man objected to collection of the tax.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have 10 minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DRIVER. So now we are trying to bring these lands within the provisions of our drainage laws that reclaimed them.

Mr. SNELL. Who has the title to these lands at the present time?

Mr. DRIVER. The occupants under homestead hold titles issued by the Government.

When these titles ripened we undertook to extend the law by adding to our State law, but the decision was such that it absolutely precluded us from getting that benefit and the result is these other lands must bear a burden that should properly be lodged against these lands, and we thought was legally lodged against them.

Mr. SNELL. That is the effect of the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. DRIVER. Yes. I will also say to the gentleman from New York that a few days ago another complication entered into the matter. Some of these parties actually went into the courts and asked that these districts be extended, and to the extent of those who have so petitioned, the Supreme Court of the United States just this past week decided they were subject to the doctrine of estoppel and therefore we have now those people in an attitude where they not only pay the amount they thought they were assuming but they must get under a proportion of the burden of those who stand in a like attitude.

Mr. SNELL. And the men who are on these lands now received a regular title under the homestead act to the lands from the Federal Government?

Mr. DRIVER. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. And the gentleman is simply asking that they pay their share of the drainage-district bonds?

Mr. DRIVER. Yes. I will say to the gentleman from New York that some question was raised the other day as to the original bill. It was expressed here in the way of a fear that possibly the bill was a little carelessly prepared and would permit the assessment to go back to the date of the organization of these districts and accumulate on these lands. The purpose of the amendment is to avoid that possibility and provide that an assessment be made only when the title is ripened in the occupant.

Mr. SNELL. It seems to me that it is a fair proposition.

Mr. DRIVER. It is more than fair.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman will yield, I observe that the question which I raised the other day with reference to this bill, and which has been properly stated by the gentleman from Arkansas, seemed, in the judgment of the Interior Department, to be corrected by the amendments which the gentleman from Arkansas has presented, and while the Interior Department had some question about the bill in its original form, they are in accord with the bill as presented and amended, by reason of the fact, as I understand it and as the department understands it, in the amendments now presented, instead of there being an opportunity for the accumulation of charges before the title ripens there can be no levy before the time comes when the title is in the homesteader.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DRIVER. I yield.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. How does the amendment reach the objection mentioned in the letter of the Secretary of the Interior of April 12, 1928, to Mr. Sinnott, then chairman of the Committee on Public Lands? The letter says:

> It is not believed that the Government of the United States should enact any law affecting or attempting to affect the title to any land that has passed from its jurisdiction.

These lands have passed from the jurisdiction of the United States and they have been acquired by these people under the state of the law then in existence. Now, here comes the United States, after relinquishing the title to the land and permitting it to pass under this law, it comes now and subjects the land to this burden. Has the objection of the Secretary of the Interior in that respect been cured?

Mr. DRIVER. No, sir; and it can not be by any amendment that this Congress can make. These people who have received the benefit of this work produced there should not escape the responsibilities that they should assume in common with the other people in the reclamation work.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I appreciate the gentleman's frankness.

Mr. DRIVER. I am frank. I want to say to the gentleman that until this question was raised not a single one of the occupants of the land failed to pay promptly his assessment in common with his neighbor. But when this one man saw fit to resist and raise this legal question, then they stopped their payments.

In addition to that, here comes a decision of the supreme court of our State that the lands not exempted must not only pay the original assessment but assume a part of the assessment that the exempted class failed to pay. It is unfair to these men that such condition should go without relief on the part of Congress if they can be relieved.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I think the gentleman's statement is answered adequately and admirably by the Secretary of the Interior, when he says further:

> If an unlawful tax has been levied against such lands under assumed authority of the State of Arkansas, the Government should not now, after having parted with title, attempt to ratify such illegal tax. In addition to the moral question involved there is grave doubt whether assent given by the Government, especially after the land has ceased to be Federal property, would validate a tax void for the reason that at the time the benefit accrued the title was in the United States.

I confess that I have not given the matter the thought that the gentleman from Arkansas has, but on general principles I would say that I thoroughly agree with the views of the Secretary of the Interior that the Government of the United States, having relinquished title to the lands under certain conditions and under the law as it then existed, ought not afterwards by its own legislation attempt to change the status of the people who acquired title.

Mr. DRIVER. I think the gentleman has overlooked an important feature. Under the decision in Lee against The Osceola Improvement District——

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman will yield, I think it would interest the gentleman from Illinois to know that at the time the Secretary of the Interior dispatched that letter to Mr. Sinnott, at the time the letter was drafted, the department entertained a different theory as to the effect of the bill from what was intended by the gentleman from Arkansas; and that the purpose of the gentleman from Arkansas having been definitely put before the department, and having redrafted the first three sections and more clearly limited their scope, the department has changed its view of the situation.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, I shall not try to interpose my judgment against that of the gentlemen who have framed and are so anxious to have passed this legislation, but the general principle that is involved here I think should be preserved.

Mr. DRIVER. It is a very unusual case.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, I think the report of the Secretary of the Interior was drafted with the thought that these were cumulating assessments and he objected to the bill on that account.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Oh, no, no. The language which I read does not refer to cumulating or noncumulating assessments. It refers clearly to the principle of the Government of the United States taking action in regard to questions affecting the status of the owners of lands after the Government has relinquished its title to those lands.

Mr. COLTON. And yet that was the basic objection of the department at that time.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has again expired.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman an additional 10 minutes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DRIVER. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. Does the gentleman think that Congress has the power, after the Government has parted with the land, to turn around and add a burden to the very property that it has parted with? In other words, can a man sell land in fee simple and afterwards convert it into a life estate?

Mr. DRIVER. These burdens were already on the land, and the question has been raised as to the validity of that charge, much of which has been paid. All we ask is the consent of the Government that we may find the opportunity to bring these lands within the category of all lands which are charged with the improvement.

Mr. CRAMTON. I call attention to the fact that what the gentleman seeks to do now is not to confer an authority to tax but to relieve a lack of authority based upon a previous attitude of the Government.

Mr. DRIVER. Exactly.

Mr. CRAMTON. And so at the end of section 2 it is provided that the acts, and so forth, are confirmed and shall not be set aside, and so forth—for any want of jurisdiction or any irregularity in the proceedings—

Then—

based upon lack of authority now conferred by the act.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, if there is no further discussion, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage.

Mr. CRAMTON. There will be an amendment to section 4.

Mr. COLTON. Then I withhold my motion for the moment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DRIVER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, to be added to the end of section 4.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DRIVER: Page 3, line 21, at the end of section 4, strike out the period, insert a comma, and add the following: "In the areas in Mississippi and Poinsett Counties described in the act of January 17, 1920."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DRIVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the title be amended to conform to the text of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. COLTON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. DRIVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent, as a part of my remarks, to extend therein a letter from the Department of the Interior addressed to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr CRAMTON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to include in his remarks the letter referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 19, 1929.

Hon. LOUIS C. CRAMTON,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. CRAMTON: I have tried to rewrite H. R. 10657, introduced by Mr. DRIVER, to express what I understand from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD was his intent in drawing and introducing the measure.

The bill as originally drawn would apparently permit the levy of special assessments on public lands of the United States, or upon lands embraced in original homestead entries, upon which the entrymen had not so complied with the laws as to entitle them to a final certificate as a basis for patent. This might result in a heavy accumulation of unpaid assessments against vacant public lands or against lands the title to which had not been earned, which would have to be assumed by subsequent entrymen. Apparently, however, Mr. DRIVER was willing to have it apply only to lands to which the equitable title had passed from the United States, i. e., lands where entrymen had earned title by residence and cultivation and submission of final proof, and thereby secured an equitable title, which needed only the issuance of patent to convey to them the legal title.

With this thought in mind I have redrafted sections 1, 2, and 3 of the bill. As to section 4 I am not quite clear as to the scope or intent of the section. You will note in Secretary Work's report of April 12, 1928, he states that the only act recognizing the right of any district to tax unentered or entered public lands, for which patents have not issued, relates to specific areas in Mississippi and Poinsett Counties, and is restricted to local drainage districts (act of January 17, 1920, 41 Stat. 392). Personally, I do not like to see that provision of law extended to other unentered public lands, nor to see the provisions of section 4 extended to other unentered or unpatented public lands. Possibly it might be consistent to limit the application of section 4 to the lands described in the said act of January 17, 1920, which could be done by inserting in line 7, page 3, of H. R. 10657, after the words "that in all cases," "in the areas in Mississippi and Poinsett Counties, described in the act of January 17, 1920."

Very truly yours,

E. C. FINNEY,
First Assistant Secretary.

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A further message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had ordered that the House of Representatives be respectfully requested to return to the Senate the following bills, to wit:

LASSEN VOLCANIC NATIONAL PARK, CALIF.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the committee I call up the bill (H. R. 11406) to consolidate or acquire alienated lands in Lassen Volcanic National Park in the State of California by exchange.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Utah calls up the bill H. R. 11406. The parliamentary situation is that this bill was considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole when it was last under consideration. The entire bill has been read. Therefore amendments may be proposed only to the last section of the bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Utah yield to me for a moment?

The SPEAKER. Are there amendments to be proposed?

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, I understand that there are no amendments to be proposed. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I raised some question about the bill when it was under consideration last week, because of an attempt now being made to acquire by purchase or condemnation private lands in the parks. There is some question as to the necessity for this legislation, but after more thought upon the subject, and consultation with the Park Service, it seems to me it is desirable to pass this bill, because we are not sure what may happen to the other matter. This can not hurt anything, if it is not needed.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COLTON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXCHANGE CERTAIN PUBLIC LANDS IN THE STATE OF UTAH

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the committee I call up House Joint Resolution 356. There was a mistake either in the printing or by the clerk of the committee in the bill and a star print has been made. I ask that the star print of the resolution be considered.

The SPEAKER. That will be the one considered. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 356) to authorize the exchange of certain public lands in the State of Utah, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. This resolution is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Utah? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That when the public interests will be benefited thereby the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized, in his discretion, to accept on behalf of the United States title to any lands, surveyed or unsurveyed, within townships 8, 9, and 10 north, ranges 2, 3, 4, and 5 west, Salt Lake meridian, Utah, which in the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture are chiefly valuable for the purposes contemplated under the act approved April 23, 1928 (45 Stat. L. 448), and in exchange therefor may patent not to exceed an equal value of surveyed or unsurveyed public lands in the State of Utah nonmineral in character: Provided, That before any such exchange is effected notice of the contemplated exchange reciting the lands involved shall be published once each week for four successive weeks in some newspaper of general circulation in the county or counties in which may be situated the lands to be accepted and in some like newspaper published in any county in which may be situated any lands to be given in such exchange.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: On page 1, after the enacting clause, strike out all the language from line 3 down to and including line 10, page 1, and all the language on page 2, beginning line 1 down to and including line 11, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That when the public interests will be benefited thereby the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized, in his discretion, to accept on behalf of the United States title to any lands, surveyed or unsurveyed, within township 7 north, ranges 2 and 3 west, and townships 8, 9, and 10 north, ranges 2, 3, 4, and 5 west, Salt Lake meridian, Utah, which in the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture are chiefly valuable for the purposes contemplated under the act approved April 23, 1928 (45 Stat. L. 448), and in exchange therefor may patent not to exceed an equal value of surveyed unappropriated lands owned by the United States within the said townships nonmineral in character: Provided, That before any such exchange is effected notice of the contemplated exchange reciting the lands involved shall be published once each week for four successive weeks in some newspaper of general circulation in the county or counties in which may be situated the lands to be accepted and in some like newspaper published in the county in which may be situated any lands to be given in such exchange."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COLTON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, this bill is introduced for the purpose of simply changing one word in a bill which was passed last year that was occasioned by a clerical error, and I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that it be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Utah asks unanimous consent that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with and that it be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken and the committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COLTON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXCHANGE OF CERTAIN LANDS IN MONTANA

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 15724.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15724) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to exchange certain lands within the State of Montana, and for other purposes.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Utah?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to accept on behalf of the United States title to any lands now owned and held by the State of Montana within the exterior boundaries of the district described in the act of Congress approved March 29, 1928 (Public, No. 210, 70th Cong.), and in exchange therefor may patent to said State of Montana not to exceed an equal area of unreserved public land within the State of Montana surveyed and nonmineral in character: Provided, That before any such exchange is effected, notice of the contemplated exchange shall be published once each week for four successive weeks in some newspaper of general circulation in the county or counties in which may be situated the lands to be given in such exchange. Lands conveyed to the United States under this act shall, upon acceptance of title, become subject to the provisions of said act of March 29, 1928.

With committee amendments as follows:

Page 1, line 8, strike out "(Public, No. 210, 70th Cong.)" and insert "Forty-fifth Statutes at Large, page 380."

On page 2, line 1, strike out the word "equal" and after the word "area" insert the words "of equal value."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, this is quite a wide bill, covering considerable territory. I think the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands ought to explain it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Utah.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been introduced by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT], and I yield to him to make the desired explanation.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, this bill is the result of the difficulty encountered in putting into effect a law enacted by the Seventieth Congress, in the first session. I refer to the enactment of H. R. 425, which became Public Act No. 210, and which authorized the Secretary of the Interior to enter into a cooperative agreement with the State of Montana and private owners of land within an area of about 100,000 acres between Mizpah and Pumpkin Creeks in southern Montana for the purpose of leasing the area for grazing purposes. It includes railroad lands and lands in other private ownership, and belonging to the State of Montana and to the Federal Government. A permit covering 10 years is intended to be issued by the Secretary of the Interior, following an agreement made with those other owners.

It is a particularly important thing that it be worked out, because it points to some conclusions as to the administration of public grazing lands. It has worked out that about 10 sections of State lands can not be included in any practical way because of a State law which requires that the rental of State lands leased to stockmen and others must bring a return which will be too large to enable them to measure these sections with the public and other lands and bring about that kind of a joint lease. The solution reached in conference with the stockmen involved, and with the Montana State land board, and agreed to by the Secretary of the Interior, and by the committee after consideration, is that the State lands within the area, comprising about 10 sections, should be exchanged for Government lands of the same value elsewhere in the State, and thus make the lands in public ownership in this grazing area entirely Federal, so that the Secretary will have to deal only with private owners, and not with the State.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVITT. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. It is limited to this area?

Mr. LEAVITT. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. It does not give a general right to exchange any land up there?

Mr. LEAVITT. No.

Mr. SNELL. But it is all confined within one area?

Mr. LEAVITT. Yes. The bill as it is drawn states that the Secretary of the Interior is authorized in his discretion to accept on behalf of the United States title to any land held by the State of Montana within the boundaries of the district described in the act of March 29, 1928.

Mr. SNELL. There are only 10 sections in any way affected by this bill?

Mr. LEAVITT. Yes; and it is limited to this area, which is set aside for the purpose of grazing lands.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVITT. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. This land within the park is to be exchanged for other land of equal value?

Mr. LEAVITT. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Who is to determine the value of that land?

Mr. LEAVITT. That, of course, is done, as a matter of practice that has been in effect in making such exchanges, through agreement between the Secretary of the Interior and the State land board. There must be a meeting of minds before the exchange is consummated.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The State land board, then, would be a party in determining the value?

Mr. LEAVITT. Yes, indeed.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVITT. Yes.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. As I take it, the area that will be exchanged may or may not be equal in size to the present area and it is the value of the land rather than relative areas?

Mr. LEAVITT. Yes. The bill as it was introduced had to do with area and that was approved by the Secretary of the Interior in his report, but it was the judgment of the committee that the policy which has been generally followed, of making these areas of equal value, should be substituted, and that is the form in which the bill comes before the House, and it is an entirely acceptable form.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. There is one other thing that occurs to me.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Montana has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have two additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The land within this area is owned by the State.

Mr. LEAVITT. That is, 10 sections out of a little over 108,000 acres.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But that is not the important point in this matter. The important thing is, When the exchange is made how is the value of the new land which is to be received to be determined? The land now in the area is owned by the State and the State board is to consider the value of the new land which the State is to receive.

Mr. LEAVITT. Not the State board acting alone.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The State board represents the State which owns the property, and the State board is to determine the value of the land which is to be received?

Mr. LEAVITT. No; not acting alone. There must be a meeting of minds between the State and the Federal Government.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. And the Federal Government is to be represented by a man 2,000 miles away, who does not know anything about the land. There have been Secretaries of the Interior who sometimes were not careful about such transactions.

Mr. LEAVITT. That latter is the reason, I will state, for the amendment which was written in by the committee, that there have been at some times considerably in the past scandals when the exchanges were made on the basis of area, and that rather worthless land was received in exchange for lands which later proved to be very valuable from the standpoint of minerals, timber, and so on.

Now, in order to avoid the possibility of anything of that kind the committee provided that the exchange should not be on the basis of area but on the basis of value, and, of course, either party, either the State of Montana or the Federal Government, can stop that exchange by failing to agree to the matter of the areas being of equal value. The interests of the Federal Government in attempting to work out the problem of handling the grazing areas under this form of leases on the one side and of Montana in thus increasing the value of the area for the purposes contemplated by the development of her stock industry and in ultimately making taxable other lands that are not now as productive as they should be make it certain that there will be a reasonable agreement on the question of value.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Of course, I always have confidence in what the gentleman from Montana says, but what occurred to me in making the suggestion I did make was this: That in dealing with Government property——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Montana has again expired.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for five additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. As I started to say, in dealing with Government property every sort of safeguard ought to be thrown around an exchange of this kind, because there will be a strong temptation to get everything to which the State might be reasonably entitled on an exchange like this and something more. This Government property in Montana belongs, at least in theory if it does not in fact, to my constituency and to that of every other Member of the House, and they are interested in transactions like this.

Mr. LEAVITT. Indeed so.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Therefore we do not want any more Government area outside of this property given up than is reasonably fair, and we want the people who determine the value to be thoroughly disinterested, so I wondered whether the State board under those circumstances was the proper one to make the valuation.

Mr. LEAVITT. Of course, there are two sides to that question. The other side is that the State of Montana now owns these 10 sections, and it is entitled, if it makes an exchange, to receive lands worth as much as these 10 sections. So we have two parties, the Federal Government and the State, both interested in seeing that this exchange is a fair one. It is done openly, and there is a provision in this bill as follows:

Provided, That before any such exchange is effected notice of the contemplated exchange shall be published once each week for four successive weeks in some newspaper of general circulation in the county or counties in which may be situated the lands to be given in such exchange.

Thus complete publicity for a period of one month is necessary, with ample opportunity for parties on either side to insure that the interests of all concerned are taken care of.

Mr. WINTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVITT. I yield.

Mr. WINTER. May I suggest further that the Secretary of the Interior and his office have complete and detailed knowledge of the character of both of these classes of areas or lands.

Mr. LEAVITT. That is true.

Mr. WINTER. In other words, the Secretary is not at any disadvantage with respect to complete knowledge in an exchange.

Mr. LEAVITT. That is true in this particular case especially because of the fact that in the enactment of the previous law a detailed study of the area was made as to the value of all of the land within the prescribed limits.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COLTON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LANDS OWNED BY RELIGIOUS ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 16352) providing that no lands owned by any religious organization within any national park can be purchased by condemnation or otherwise by the Government, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the right of the Government to purchase through condemnation shall not apply to lands within any national park now owned by any religious organization and used exclusively for religious purposes.

With the following committee amendment:

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill providing that no lands owned by any religious organization within any national park can be purchased by condemnation by the Government, and for other purposes."

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, as one of the gentlemen of the House who is interested in this bill has just stepped out of the Chamber, I ask unanimous consent that the further consideration of the bill be deferred, and I shall call up another bill.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the bill is withdrawn.

There was no objection.

CONVEYANCES OF LANDS BY CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILWAY

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 14457) validating certain conveyances heretofore made by Central Pacific Railway, a corporation, and its lessee, Southern Pacific Co., a corporation, involving certain portions of right of way in and in the vicinity of the city of Lodi and near the station of Acampo, all in the county of San Joaquin, State of California, acquired by Central Pacific Railway Co. under the act of Congress approved July 1, 1862 (vol. 12, U. S. Stat. L. p. 489), as amended by the act of Congress approved July 2, 1864 (vol. 13, U. S. Stat. L. p. 356), and ask unanimous consent that this bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Utah asks unanimous consent that this bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill affecting principally the State of California, and the gentleman from California [Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT] will make an explanation of the bill.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, this bill was introduced by my colleague from California [Mr. CURRY] for the purpose of clearing up a cloud on the title of certain lots in the vicinity of the city of Lodi, and certain agricultural lands along the right of way of the Central Pacific Railway.

Under the act of July 1, 1862, the Central Pacific Railway was granted a right of way 400 feet in width from Ogden, Utah, to San Francisco, Calif. In many places along the route of the said right of way the railway company only utilized and claimed 50 feet on each side of the track, or a strip of right of way 100 feet in width.

After the railway was constructed there were various titles given to lands overlapping the 400-foot right of way. Homesteads were granted, cities were laid out, and city lots sold that conflicted with the railway's right of way granted by Congress.

In order to clear the title to these lands this bill proposes to validate the quitclaim deeds that have been given by the railway company to the various landholders.

There is not any controversy on the bill so far as the railway company or the landholders or the State of California is concerned. It is purely a matter to clear up the title whereby the owners of these lots can secure loans or have extensions made of loans that are now on the lands, and to give a clear title to many farmers and landholders whose lands happen to overlap the 400-foot right of way.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. COLTON (during the reading of the bill). Mr. Speaker, the bill is largely a description of the lands affected by the bill, and I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Utah asks unanimous consent to dispense with the further reading of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the conveyances hereinafter particularly described and heretofore executed by Central Pacific Railway Co., a corporation, and its lessee, Southern Pacific Co., a corporation, involving certain lands or interests therein, in and in the vicinity of the city of Lodi, and near the station of Acampo, all in the county of San Joaquin, State of California, and forming a part of the right of way of said Central Pacific Railway Co., granted by the Government of the United States of America by an act of Congress approved July 1, 1862, entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes" (vol. 12, U. S. Stat. L. 489), and by said act as amended by act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,' approved July 1, 1862" (vol. 13, U. S. Stat. L. 356), are hereby legalized, validated, and confirmed with the same force and effect as if the land involved therein had been held at the time of such conveyances by the corporations making the same under absolute fee simple title.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 7, after line 4, insert a colon and the following: "And provided further, That there shall be reserved to the United States all oil, coal, or other minerals in the land, and the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COLTON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The title was amended.

ISSUANCE OF PATENTS FOR LANDS CONTAINING COPPER, LEAD, ZINC, SILVER, ETC.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 15919) to authorize the issuance of patents for lands containing copper, lead, zinc, or silver and their associated minerals, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Utah calls up the bill H. R. 15919. This bill is on the Union Calendar, and the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. LUCE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk reported the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15919) to authorize the issuance of patent for lands containing copper, lead, zinc, or silver and their associated minerals, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, locations made under the lode mining laws of the United States upon unreserved public lands claimed to contain, at depth, copper, lead, zinc, or silver and their associated minerals, the actual existence of which can be demonstrated only through deep shafts or other deep underground workings, may be passed to patent upon evidence satisfactory to him of the mineral character of the land, without the requirement that applicants show an actual discovery of mineral upon or within the limits of their claim or claims: Provided, That not to exceed 640 acres of land may be located, held, applied for by, or patented to any one individual or corporation under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to make any rules and regulations necessary to carry this act into effect.

With the following committee amendments:

In line 2 of the title, after the word "zinc," insert the word "gold,".

In line 6, after the word "zinc," insert the word "gold,".

On page 2, in line 3, after the word "that," strike out everything up to and including the word "act," in line 6, and substitute the following: "all the requirements, conditions, and limitations of the lode mining laws shall apply to locations, applications for, and patents made or issued under this act, except the requirement of an actual discovery of mineral upon or within the limits of the claim or claims: And provided further, That locations made, patents applied for, or issued under this act shall be in the form and manner required by applicable mining laws, and the total aggregate acreage of land which may be so located, held, applied for, or patented to any one individual or corporation under the provisions of this act shall not exceed 640 acres."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to authorize the issuance of patent for lands containing copper, lead, zinc, gold, or silver and their associated minerals, and for other purposes."

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. DOUGLAS] such time as he may need to explain the bill.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, under existing mining laws, a mining claim of 20 acres can not be located, and the patent for the claim can not be issued, until actual discovery of mineral in place has been made. Under the law a person in locating a claim must establish a discovery and expend on the location $50, and thereafter must expend, to hold the claim by virtue of the location, an annual amount of $100. To obtain a patent for that claim he must expend $500 in improvements and must establish the actual discovery of valuable rock or mineral in place. The term "in place" is used to distinguish mineral as an integral part of solid rock from that floating on the surface.

There are certain well-established and well-known mining areas in which there is no surface evidence of mineral deposits—areas in which deposits are known to exist, in which deposits are now being worked, but in which there is no surface evidence of deposits. Under existing law and regulations the department has ruled that there is not sufficient authority vested in the Secretary of the Interior to grant a patent for a claim located in such areas, because of the fact that it is impossible to make an actual discovery except through sinking a deep shaft at an expense of a good many thousand dollars—running frequently into hundreds of thousands of dollars—and without expending considerable money, possibly, in diamond drilling, which in certain areas is useless for the purpose of actual discovery of commercial deposits.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. I will.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Even though a shaft might not be sunk by diamond drill work, it might be evident from geological conditions that a valuable deposit did exist under the land if it was of a mineral character.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. That is a fact; and recently instruments have been developed which although not conclusive yet, nevertheless, may establish a strong reasonability of the existence of a deposit. These instruments are used in cases where there is no actual surface indication of mineralization.

Under existing law claims in such areas can not be patented. There is no limitation imposed upon the area which can be located or the number of claims for which patents may be issued, provided the other requirements of the law are fulfilled.

For the purpose of rectifying the conditions which now exist, which prevent mining prospectors who have held claims for years from obtaining patents, and which prevent any mining company from obtaining patent, this bill was introduced. It grants the Secretary of the Interior the authority to issue a patent for a mining claim when satisfactory evidence has been introduced—that is satisfactory to him and to the department—that the claim is actually mineral in its character. It authorizes him to issue a patent for such a claim without evidence of actual discovery in place. It imposes a limitation of 640 acres on the acreage which can be so patented.

It is provided that all other requirements of the lode mining law must be complied with. That is the explanation of the bill.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Yes.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. When the gentleman stated it relieves evidence of actual discovery does not he mean in the bill itself there is something better than evidence of the discovery, and that is the actual existence of the mineral?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Under the bill it would not be required that there be established the existence of a commercial deposit.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. No; I don't mean that.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. It simply means that in well-known mineralized areas in which ore bodies have been worked profitably, and probably now are being worked profitably, mining claims can be patented without compliance with that portion of the present law, which requires the discovery of mineral in place.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Yes.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. What is the test for the exercise of the discretion which is vested in the Secretary of the Interior under the terms of this proposal.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. The test under the terms of this proposal is simply that he must be convinced of the mineral character of the land. In his letter on the subject he refers to existing mineralized areas. There are many such areas. There is one, for example, in Bisbee, Ariz., in which probably two or three of the many great ore deposits appeared on the surface either by way of actual appearance of ore or appearance of some evidence of ore, though not ore itself. The other many and valuable deposits have no evidence of outcropping on the surface in any way whatever, and yet it is recognized here in the department, and recognized everywhere for that matter, that a certain large area in that district is distinctly mineral in character. Yet, under existing law no patents can issue.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Under existing law there is a real test, is there not?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. There is a real test of the discovery of minerals in place.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. But under this proposal there is no real test in the exercise of the discretion by the Secretary.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. For the reason that there can be no test, unless one is required to spend $250,000 or $300,000.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. My question goes to the further question as to whether there is not some test that can be applied. The gentleman thinks there is no test?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. I doubt very much whether there is a test that can be made applicable to such cases which will not involve an expenditure of many thousands of dollars, as compared with the expenditure of $500 under existing law.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. This does not include oil?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. No; this does not include oil.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. ARENTZ].

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, for the benefit of the RECORD, I want to make a few remarks regarding this bill. The need for it has been apparent for some years, if the advice of the Secretary of the Interior is to be taken into consideration. The location of a claim is done in the following manner at the present time: You must make a discovery of mineral in place, and you locate a claim 600 feet wide by 1,500 feet long. The claim may be less than 300 feet, but it can not be more than 300 feet on each side of the point of discovery. Any claim less than 300 feet wide is called a fraction of a claim. A claim comprises 20 acres. If a number or group of claims are located along the lode, or along the line of the outcropping of the ore, a man or a company or a partnership desires something more than this. They want some protection ground on both the upper and the lower side of their claims. They want some protection on each end, so that if in the pursuit of their ore underground they encounter ore which falls out of their side or end line, they would be protected from encroachment by somebody else, where some one will claim an apex and file suit for all ore extracted. So it is necessary to have ground outside of the group that you think actually contains mineral. Secondly, when you have performed a hundred dollars' worth of work on each claim, and you have performed that annual work for five years, or have made $500 worth of improvements on each claim, you make application for patent. It is customary to not only include the 2 or 4 or 10 claims that you may have along the strike, but in making application for patent you also include this protection ground on the upper and lower sides and on each end. When it comes to the General Land Office they say, "We can not give you a patent for any land unless it contains a known discovery."

The General Land Office will send out experts, members of the Geological Survey, and also from the General Land Office, mineral division, and they examine the land and may find that only two claims in the group contain known deposits of ore; ore in place; and they will give a patent for only those two claims and exclude the others. The man applying for the patent or the firm or partnership is willing to pay $5 an acre for each acre of ground, and the lawyers' fees and the other fees, which amount to as much more. He is perfectly willing to pay $200 a claim, but the Land Office under their present ruling can not give a patent to this protection ground on each end and each side, so that the man may be safeguarded in the development of his property, whether he spends $10,000 or $10,000,000.

In addition to this actual discovery, there are known to exist what we call disseminated ore bodies, ore bodies which are not in the form of lodes but which are spread over a large area and are impregnated with known minerals, principally copper, so that we may have an outcropping of copper-bearing porphyry on two claims and on an area underground, under the wash, of hundreds if not thousands of acres. But there is no provision in the General Land Office at this time permitting a patent to such ground. In the past patents have been given to such ground under rulings made by the Secretary of the Interior, but within the past 10 years, and possibly in view of possible suits that may be brought by different claimants, the Secretary of the Interior has been very careful and has rendered but few patents to land that has not actually contained discovery of mineral in place.

For fear this bill would be misinterpreted by some future Secretary of the Interior or by some future Commissioner of the General Land Office, I wanted it strictly understood that the provisions of the present mining law were not being changed, and also that a claim shall still consist of 20 acres, shall still consist of an area 600 feet wide by 1,500 feet long, and that a man must do his assessment work of a hundred dollars a year on each claim, and that he must do $500 worth of work on each claim in order to get a patent, and must locate claim after claim, depending on the number of claims that he wants.

Under the provisions of the present law without this new legislation a number of men can locate on any number of claims they want and string it out anywhere from 5 to 20 miles and locate all in that area. They can locate 640 acres or 1,280 acres. This bill specifically states that 640 acres can be patented to any one man or firm or corporation or locator, the word "locator" is the correct word, without a discovery being made. Then the provisions of this law will authorize that this area or this exterior land of nonmineral character may be located and patented to a claimant without actual discovery of ore in place—a lode—and also permit the locator to obtain the land, mineral in character but minerals located hundreds of feet beneath the surface. It must be proven to the General Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior that that mineral actually exists. Now, consequently, he must dig in order to find whether it is mineral or not.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARENTZ. I will.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. How, under this bill, can the claimant or locator do the assessment work if he does not find any mineral in place on a known lode or lead?

Mr. ARENTZ. The gentleman from Montana is striking at the keynote of this thing. The gentleman has gone to the crux of the situation and comes to a thing I have been questioning for some time. That point has naturally come to my mind, and possibly has come to that of the gentleman, and in time the proponents of mining legislation will say, "What is the use of us digging a hole and spending $100 on that hole when it is only gravel? What is the use of going into a territory we know does not contain mineral except two or three hundred feet deep and have to dig and spend $100 on assessment work?"

Let us do something else and put this money in roads or put the $100 to something else. Now, I am opposed to that sort of thing. What I want to do is to have the money that is demanded for assessment work actually put on the ground. I think under this bill possibly the thing will be done. Set up a drilling outfit and start a hole 6 or 8 inches in diameter and send it down to a point where the mineral is expected; and if we do not find it at that point put another here and another there, and in time we will find the mineral if it exists. I would not be in favor of doing away with the $100 worth of work, because I have frequently stated on the floor of this House and in committee that you can only make a mine by the magic point of the pick and the sweat of a man's brow. I do not want to change all this now at the expense of the prospector and small operator. I do not want to harm the old prospector in his effort to make a livelihood; he it is who has kept alive these ghost cities of the West, and through his effort over a long term of years the attention of capital is being drawn to these old camps. If assessment work is done away with, you eliminate the prospector from the picture.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nevada has expired.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask for five minutes more.

Mr. COLTON. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Then I understand it is the gentleman's theory that before a patent can be issued assessment work equal to the assessment work required under the present law must be done?

Mr. ARENTZ. I had the honor to present this amendment, and I think it safeguards the situation; and if it does not, I know that the gentleman from Arizona is strictly in accord with the idea of making this thing conform to the present mining laws; and I know he is sincere about that; and if the wording of this amendment does not do that thing, he wants your help, and I hope he will get it. The amendment provides:

> All the requirements, conditions, and limitations of the lode mining laws shall apply to locations, applications for, and patents made or issued under this act, except the requirement of an actual discovery of mineral upon or within the limits of the claim or claims: And provided further, That locations made, patents applied for, or issued under this act shall be in the form and manner required by applicable mining laws, and the total aggregate acreage of land which may be so located, held, applied for, or patented to any one individual or corporation under the provisions of this act shall not exceed 320 acres.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. In other words, if a locator could prove to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior that there is ore within a given tract of land on which he has expended the amount of money now required by law, which is $500, he can get a patent?

Mr. ARENTZ. Yes. Under the present law if he applies for a patent he has got to lie in order to get a patent to land nonmineral in appearance; and further than that, in many sections of the West, where all the easy locations discoverable have been made, you may find an area of porphyry thoroughly leached but containing certain secondary minerals, indicating to the practical eye that there is in all likelihood secondary enrichment at depth which has produced low grade but commercial ore over a considerable area that there may be mineral there. He says: "If this ore is mineral in character, as proven by drill holes, then the area surrounding, which may be a thousand acres in extent, may be mineral also."

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARENTZ. Yes.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Does the gentleman advocate the doctrine of geological inference?

Mr. ARENTZ. If the gentleman will refer to the hearings on the Utah school lands bill in regard to the mineral character of these lands, as determined by the General Land Office, he will find that I have been absolutely in favor of not too broad an interpretation of mineral character of land through geological inference.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Mining engineers and others have led me to believe that geological indications are not always a sure basis of judgment.

Mr. ARENTZ. Only to a limited extent. I think we should use the utmost care in applying the principle of geological inference. You can get two or three men together and one man will say that a coal deposit, for instance, extends a certain distance under the surface area, where other men may be convinced that it may taper out or be nonexistent. We should be very careful in bringing into the case the doctrine of geological inference.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nevada has again expired.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Chairman, may I have five minutes more?

Mr. COLTON. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. ARENTZ. As I understand this bill, it compels you to do exactly as is done now under the present law, under which you may apply for 60 claims for patent if you wish. But in this case it limits an applicant for patent to 32 claims. Under the old law you could make 60 or 100 or more. This gives you the right to apply for patent for 32 claims. Under the old law you must make proof of discovery on each claim of actual ore in place. Under this proposed law you do not need to have this evidence, but you must prove your contention to the satisfaction of the examiner.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Could you do that without showing any mineral in place in a 640-acre tract?

Mr. ARENTZ. This is the exact meaning of the law. As I told you, my amendment was offered to the bill, and there seemed to be no objection to it in the committee. I think the amendment safeguards against any wrong interpretation that may be put on the bill by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. The gentleman has had a good deal of experience under the operation of the old law. Are the old-time prospectors and miners who went out in the past and located great mines in sympathy with the provisions of this bill? Is the gentleman in sympathy with them?

Mr. ARENTZ. I am in sympathy with the old-time prospectors and miners, and I will not object to the old-time prospectors and miners holding on to the claims they have and obtain as many more as they are willing to hold. I do not want to see them curtailed in any respect in regard to their operations. No old prospector is in the habit of prospecting until he has reasonable promise of ore in sight. I would be opposed to the bill if it were not for this amendment.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Is the old-time miner for this bill?

Mr. ARENTZ. My friend, the old-time prospector and miner is interested in bringing money into the community, and I feel that this bill, safeguarded as it is by my amendment, should be enacted, compelling the big man—I think you are talking about the prospector in his relation to the big man—so that the big man will come into every mineral section of any State where there is a reasonable chance of his developing a paying mine, but no matter how large an area the operator locates the claims must be not to exceed 20 acres in extent; $100 must be expended at each claim every year until application is made.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. I appreciate that and I applaud the motives of the gentleman, but are the old-time miners in favor of this bill?

Mr. ARENTZ. I want you to ask that question of the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. DOUGLAS]. I have safeguarded their interest through the adoption of my amendment.

Mr. YON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ARENTZ. Yes.

Mr. YON. Is the gentleman for the bill or against it?

Mr. ARENTZ. In its present form I am in favor of the bill. I am in favor of it with the amendment I have offered to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nevada has again expired.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. DOUGLAS] in order that he may answer the question propounded by the gentleman from Utah.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I can answer that question very shortly; yes.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will not the result of this bill be that a good many 640-acre tracts will be patented upon which there will be no mineral discovery? What then becomes of the title to that land?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. In the well-known mineral areas there are not as many as 640 acres frequently open to patent.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Then, the result might be that we might patent 640 acres, and in the end there would be no mineral discovery.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Under existing law you can patent a claim on which you have discovered mineral in place, but still find no commercial deposit; in fact, the great, great bulk of patents so issued are issued for claims on which no commercial deposit has been discovered.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Does that transfer to the one who files a claim the title in fee, regardless of whether a discovery is made or not?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. After a patent has been issued, yes; and the same condition exists to-day. I can go out on any number of places and make a discovery of mineral in place, do my $500 worth of work on that claim and obtain a patent for it, yet I may never discover a commercial deposit there.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Can a man sell and transfer that land the same as any other tract of land?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. He can sell and transfer it, yes; but, of course, it would be valueless unless he had discovered some deposit.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Yes.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. I think, perhaps, I am in accord with that, but I am interested.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. It is an interesting bill.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. As a matter of fact, does this not make it possible for an individual who goes out and makes a lode location on mineral in place to then monopolize the immediate neighborhood? Does it not do that?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. No; it does not.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Why?

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Because the mere existence of mineral in place on one claim can not be taken as satisfactory evidence that all the surrounding claims are likewise mineral in character.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. I think that is very true, as we have found to our bitter experience.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. And I have found it to my very bitter experience to be true.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, locations made under the lode mining laws of the United States upon unreserved public lands claimed to contain, at depth, copper, lead, zinc, or silver and their associated minerals, the actual existence of which can be demonstrated only through deep shafts or other deep underground workings, may be passed to patent upon evidence satisfactory to him of the mineral character of the land, without the requirement that applicants show an actual discovery of mineral upon or within the limits of their claim or claims: Provided, That not to exceed 640 acres of land may be located, held, applied for by, or patented to any one individual or corporation under the provisions of this act.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 6, after the word "zinc," insert the word "gold."

Page 2, line 4, after the word "That," strike out the remainder of the line and all of lines 5, 6, and 7 and insert: "all the requirements, conditions, and limitations of the lode mining laws shall apply to locations, applications for, and patents made or issued under this act, except the requirement of an actual discovery of mineral upon or within the limits of the claim or claims: And provided further, That locations made, patents applied for, or issued under this act shall be in the form and manner required by applicable mining laws, and the total aggregate acreage of land which may be so located, held, applied for, or patented to any one individual or corporation under the provisions of this act shall not exceed 640 acres."

Mr. YON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Florida offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. YON: On page 2, line 17, after the word "exceed," strike out "640 acres" and insert in lieu thereof "320 acres."

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, that amendment is acceptable to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the committee amendments as amended.

The committee amendments as amended were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to make any rules and regulations necessary to carry this act into effect.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. SNELL, Speaker pro tempore, having assumed the chair, Mr. LUCE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 15919) to authorize the issuance of patents for lands containing copper, lead, zinc, or silver and their associated minerals, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is now on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COLTON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The title was amended.

EXCHANGE OF GOVERNMENT LAND IN BOX ELDER COUNTY, UTAH

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 15328) to authorize the exchange of 18 sections of Government land for an equal number of sections of State land located in Box Elder County, Utah, for experiments in sheep growing, and for other purposes.

This bill is on the Union Calendar, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Utah asks unanimous consent that this bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to exchange 18 sections of Government land located in Box Elder County, Utah, for an equal number of sections of Utah State land, the exchange being made for the purpose of experimental sheep growing, the experiments to be conducted by persons designated by the director of the Utah Agricultural Experiment Station, the work to be carried on in cooperation with the Utah Agricultural Experiment Station.

With the following committee amendments:

On page 1, line 4, strike out "Government land" and insert in lieu thereof "surveyed, vacant, unreserved, and nonmineral public lands"; and in line 7, strike out the words "sections" and "land" and insert in lieu thereof the words "lands of the same character"; and amend the title.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, there is evidently an error. The word "value" should be substituted there. The committee amendment also included or should have included the striking out of the word "number" in line 6 and inserting the word "value," so that it would read "for an equal value," and I offer an amendment to that effect.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Utah offers an amendment to the committee amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COLTON to the committee amendment:

On page 1, in line 6, strike out the word "number" and insert in lieu thereof the word "value."

The amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COLTON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to authorize the exchange of 18 sections of Government land for an equal value of State land located in Box Elder County, Utah, for experiments in sheep growing, and for other purposes."

BOISE NATIONAL FOREST, IDAHO

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 1577) to add certain lands to the Boise National Forest, Idaho.

This bill is on the Union Calendar and I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Utah asks unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman state the character of the bill?

Mr. SMITH. It proposes to place in the national forest about 12 townships of land that are near the mountain tops, and which are now outside of the national forest, in order that the stream flow may be protected. Under existing conditions it is pastured without any control, and the stock tramps out the underbrush, permitting the snow to melt much more quickly than if properly protected as are lands in the national forests.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. May I ask the gentleman what State this land is in?

Mr. SMITH. In Idaho.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Utah?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLTON (during the reading of the bill). Mr. Speaker, the rest of the bill is just a description of the land, and I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with, with the understanding that the bill will be printed in the RECORD in its entirety.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any lands within the following-described areas found by the Secretary of Agriculture to be chiefly valuable for the production of timber or the protection of stream flows may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, be included within and made a part of the Boise National Forest by proclamation of the President, subject to all valid existing claims, and the said lands shall hereafter be subject to all laws affecting the national forests:

The west half of section 2; all of sections 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10; the west half of section 11; all of sections 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, and 34, in township 4 south, range 2 west, of the Boise meridian, State of Idaho. All of township 4 south, range 3 west, of the Boise meridian, State of Idaho. All of what will be when surveyed of sections 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, and 30, in township 4 south, range 4 west, Boise meridian, State of Idaho. All of sections 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, and 36, township 5 south, range 4 west, Boise meridian, State of Idaho. All of sections 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, and 36, township 5 south, range 3 west, Boise meridian, State of Idaho. All of sections 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, and 34, township 5 south, range 2 west, Boise meridian, State of Idaho. All of sections 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, and 35, in township 6 south, range 2 west, Boise meridian, State of Idaho. All of township 6 south, range 3 west, Boise meridian, State of Idaho. All of township 6 south, range 4 west, Boise meridian, State of Idaho.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the committee amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, strike out all of lines 3 to 10, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That subject to any valid existing claim or entry all lands of the United States within the areas hereinafter described be, and the same are hereby, added to and made part of the Boise National Forest, to be hereafter administered under the laws and regulations relating to the national forests; and the provisions of the act approved March 20, 1922 (42 Stat. 465), as amended, are hereby extended and made applicable to all other lands within said described areas."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COLTON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

NATIONAL FORESTS IN MONTANA

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (S. 1511) for the exchange of lands adjacent to national forests in Montana.

This bill is on the Union Calendar, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Utah asks unanimous consent that this bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, have the Democratic colleagues of the gentleman been conferred with with respect to these bills?

Mr. COLTON. I did not catch the gentleman's question.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Have the members of the committee on this side been notified what bills would be brought up?

Mr. COLTON. I think so, and the ranking member of the committee on the Democratic side is here.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. I am speaking of the bills as a whole and not this particular bill.

Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum. I think we ought to have the Members here.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman reserve his point for a moment?

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Yes; I will reserve it.

Mr. COLTON. I just want to explain that these bills have been reported out by the unanimous vote of the committee and the ranking member of the committee on the Democratic side is here.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. And it is my desire that the bill come up.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Florida makes the point of order that there is not a quorum present. Evidently there is not a quorum present.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The doors were closed, the Sergeant-at-Arms was directed to notify absent Members, the Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MORIN], the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN], and the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HUGHES] are at an important hearing by the Subcommittee on Military Affairs, and ask to be excused.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise my remarks on the District appropriation bill and to include therein an editorial in the Evening Star of yesterday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks on the District appropriation bill, and include therein an editorial from the Evening Star. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Utah calls up the bill H. R. 1511, and asks unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of the act of March 20, 1922 (42 Stat. L. 465), entitled "An act to consolidate national-forest lands," are hereby extended to include any suitable lands in the State of Montana situated within 6 miles of a national-forest boundary. Lands conveyed to the United States under this act shall, upon acceptance of title, become parts of the national forest nearest to which they are situated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COLTON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request for unanimous consent to revise my remarks on the District appropriation bill, eliminating the editorial in the Star.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to revise his remarks on the District appropriation bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, for two days the House has had under consideration the District of Columbia appropriation bill. It had the "usual consideration"; that is, there were from 20 to 30 Members out of a legislative body of 435 Members who took enough interest in the subject to honor the proceedings with their presence.

No more significant or pregnant commentary than that can be made on the folly of committing the government of the District to the National Congress—and I do not use the language in a deprecatory sense.

The conclusion is obvious that a huge and unwieldy body, constituted as Congress is, has not the temper nor the inclination to devote the care and attention to municipal local matters that the subject peremptorily requires. The membership of the House is elected primarily for the handling of national affairs and, of course, largely confines its activities within those limits.

Excepting the members on the District legislative committee and the five members on the subcommittee who handle the appropriations for the District there are few in the House who feel disposed to take any interest in District government, and that, in my opinion, shows very conclusively that some plan of government must be worked out to accord to the people of the District a voice in their own affairs.

The Members of the House who take a live interest in District matters may talk until they are black in the face. No matter how logical their reasoning, their arguments are futile when the matter is put to a vote, for the bulk of the membership go through the cavortings of the old childhood game of "follow the leader." The issue is settled by force and not by reason.

I have some vital objections to the present bill, which I dwelt upon in my speech of the 22d instant.

I showed the folly of the invariable annual lump-sum method of settling the obligations of the Federal Government to the taxpayers of the District by an argument that is unanswerable. The Washington Star in a leading editorial yesterday accepts my reasoning, as do many of the Members who have given the subject careful study. The trouble is that there are not enough of them to take the pains to study the question.

I also dwelt on the neglect of Congress to provide adequate sewers to furnish sanitation facilities to 3,178 families who are compelled to use open privies and who are compelled to use well water, probably polluted.

I dwelt upon the insufficiency of the sewerage facilities to protect the beautiful Rock Creek Park from pollution.

I dwelt upon the fact that in this Capital of the Nation there are 221 part-time classes necessitated by the failure of Congress to provide school accommodations.

I dwelt upon the defective paving and the insufficient lighting of the Capital streets.

My colleague from Pennsylvania [Mr. CASEY] dwelt upon the failure of the Budget Bureau to assent to the request of the Commissioners of the District that the plan we inaugurated in last year's bill be fulfilled by appropriating in this year's bill the balance of the money justly due the employees of the District to bring their pay up to the basic pay of other employees in the Federal service of the same grade.

Being opposed to the bill before us on these grounds, the question arises whether, in moving to recommit the bill, I ought to embrace all of them or confine the motion to one amendment.

I have decided on the latter course, and in order that the House may have some inkling of its import I want to make this brief argument:

THE MOTION TO RECOMMIT—WHAT IS IT ALL ABOUT?

Last year, in considering this appropriation, we found it would take $340,000 to provide step-ups in the pay of District employees to bring their basic pay up to the level of that accorded to similar employees in over 30 departments of the Federal Government doing the same grade of work.

This sum was not due them as a mere gratuity but was due them as a matter of law. The law required it; yet the bill of last year as submitted to us only provided for $37,555. Our committee, after conference with our late friend and colleague, Mr. Madden, then chairman of the Appropriations Committee, raised this particular item to $175,000, with the distinct understanding that the balance, or $165,000, would be included in this year's bill.

This understanding has not been lived up to, and the excuse is offered that the Welch bill has in the meantime raised all the salaries and has therefore made a further fulfillment of our obligations unnecessary.

This excuse will not bear analysis. The Welch bill took the basic pay of all of the employees—those that had been fixed in accordance with the law, as well as the basic pay of those unfortunates whose pay had not been adjusted in accordance with the requirements of the law—and gave all a simultaneous parallel raise.

The result is that those orginally discriminated against are still discriminated against—they got a little more pay through the Welch Act, but so did those employees whose higher salaries were in conformity with the law. Thus the Welch Act only accentuated the discrimination instead of removing it as was intended.

The disparity in the two classes of employees was not eliminated. What we want to do and what we ought to do is, first of all, to put the salaries of the discriminated employees on the same legal level with that of the favored classes of employees so that the Welch Act may operate with fairness. It will take $165,000 to do this—in other words, comply with the law—and that will be my motion to recommit.

LANDS OWNED BY RELIGIOUS ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 16352) providing that no lands owned by any religious organization within any national park can be purchased by condemnation or otherwise by the Government, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the right of the Government to purchase through condemnation shall not apply to lands within any national park now owned by any religious organization and used exclusively for religious purposes.

With the following committee amendment:

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill providing that no lands owned by any religious organization within any national park can be purchased by condemnation by the Government, and for other purposes."

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT].

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, this is the bill in regard to which I gave notice a week ago to-day, when the Interior Department appropriation bill was under consideration. At that time, you will recollect, the question was up as to condemning, if necessary, the private lands within the national parks. I gave notice at that time of my intention to introduce a bill which would exempt lands now owned by religious organizations and used exclusively for religious purposes from the right of the Government to condemn. It would not do away with the right of the Government to acquire these lands by agreement or by purchase of any part that might be agreed to by the Government and by the religious organizations, but it would make it impossible for the Government to step in and by condemnation proceedings take away from the religious organization land which it now owns and uses exclusively for religious purposes.

The situation was brought about by this fact, and it is the only situation that I have checked up with the park administration that would come within the intent of the bill: In the Glacier National Park there is an area of 75 acres that belongs to the Methodist Church organization of Montana and is used by that organization as a summer institute for young people.

It was acquired by that organization through the fact that the original homesteaders, an old Montana couple who had gone onto that land long before it became a national park, who homesteaded it, and lived there the life of pioneers, desired to do something fine for the young people of the State of Montana. They made it possible for this church organization to acquire that area, to be used by that organization for the benefit of the young people of Montana. The provision in the Interior Department bill with regard to the situation existing where private owners have lands of this kind in national parks, and where it is intended to give back to them a lifetime lease to enable them to continue to use those lands for summer-home purposes could not be made to apply in this case, because it belongs to an organization. Therefore I have written a bill in form that would allow that church organization to continue to use that area entirely for religious purposes, so long as it uses it for that purpose, and that purpose only, and it would not exempt this land just as soon as it passed into any other ownership or just as soon as it is used for purposes other than religious.

I have had this matter up with different officials of the Park Service in order to secure a report from the Department of the Interior, and I find that there is no objection in the Department to the principle of the bill. I shall not for a moment hide the fact that there are some connected with the Park Service who would like to have the bill much more restrictive than it is at the present time. An amendment is going to be offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] to reduce the area and to put around it further restrictions. But let us not lose sight of this fact, that this is an area belonging to an organization which was in private ownership before the park was established, and that it is not in the hands of a private party, so that giving back a lease extending through their lifetime would not be possible to meet the situation.

This Congress, when we created the Big Smoky National Park and the Shenandoah National Park in the Southern States, made exemptions of lands belonging to religious organizations and used for religious purposes, lands belonging to educational institutions and used for educational purposes, and cemeteries, and we did not impose any restriction cutting down those areas in any arbitrary way by any action of Congress. We are confronted with a clear-cut proposition of exempting this one area of land from the condemnation proceedings, and allowing that church which now owns it, coming almost as an inheritance from a couple desiring to leave a memorial to the young people of Montana, to continue to use it for religious purposes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVITT. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I have it in mind to offer an amendment at the conclusion of the gentleman's bill to this effect:

So long as such lands shall continue to be used exclusively for religious purposes.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I have prepared an amendment, after discussing this matter with the Park Service, which, on line 5, would strike out the word "and" and insert the word "while," which would mean the same thing, and also to strike out the word "purchased," in line 3, and insert the word "acquired," so that the bill would read:

That the right of the Government to acquire through condemnation shall not apply to lands within any national park while owned by any religious organization and used exclusively for religious purposes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. That would be the same thing.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVITT. Yes.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. What is a religious purpose? Is using it as a summer camp, using it for religious purposes?

Mr. LEAVITT. It is used for a summer camp, a summer institute. During a comparatively short period, for about five years, it has been used in the summer. Meanwhile they are building this into what they hope to make a fine institute, where educational classes and religious work is to be done, and the young people of the Nation may be brought there for an outing under a religious influence.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVITT. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Would the gentleman object to a regulation in the bill requiring the submission of plans for additional improvements on these ground to the park commissioner?

Mr. LEAVITT. In that connection I have not offered any particular objection to an amendment in that form, because I do not think any possible question would arise with regard to that, but I have the statement from the Director of the Park Service in which consideration was given to that kind of a proposal, and it was determined through discussion with the law officer and the Director of the National Parks that that sort of thing would not really add anything to the current law. They were perfectly willing, in view of the character of this organization, to take their chances on an agreement which could be reached and with the statement being made that they had approved this bill with the understanding that there would be that sort of a conference in all such matters.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. But you are enacting a law, and setting a precedent, and would it not be well to put a clause in to that effect, so that this organization may not erect a building that would be out of harmony with the rest of the park? I hope the gentleman will put such an amendment in the bill.

Mr. LEAVITT. The amendment that is being proposed by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] does contain that sort of a provision, as I understand it.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVITT. Yes.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. If the Government should feel that it needed any of this land, or, say, an easement on the land, like putting a road across it or to bridge over a canyon, would the gentleman's bill prevent that sort of action by the Government?

Mr. LEAVITT. The location of the road is settled and there are no canyons on the land. There is no possibility of that question arising.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. But it would preclude the Government condemning or taking any easement to or on the land?

Mr. LEAVITT. It possibly would. So I would have no objection to having that point cleared up.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVITT. I will.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I understand this merely relates to that particular instance in the State of Montana?

Mr. LEAVITT. That is the only case I know of.

Mr. BANKHEAD. But does the gentleman's bill by language make it a general act and applicable to all forest parks?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COLTON. I yield the gentleman five minutes additional.

Mr. LEAVITT. I will say the bill was drawn in general language before I knew this was the only area. The Park Service says this is the only area.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman can answer the question categorically. Does the gentleman's bill in language make it a general act applicable to all national parks?

Mr. LEAVITT. Yes; it does; and I see no reason why it should not if a similar situation exists elsewhere.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Suppose an institution owns a large acreage in a national park, say a thousand acres or 5,000 acres, acquired ostensibly for religious purposes, and builds some institution upon it accommodating only a few people. Would not that prevent the Government, under the terms of the gentleman's bill, from coming in on this land, although the institution itself only requires a small part of the acreage for its particular purposes?

Mr. LEAVITT. It would not, for the simple reason that the bill is written only to apply to the land now occupied by a religious institution, and only applies while they are used for religious purposes, and does not extend into the future.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is all I desired to ask the gentleman.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to take up the time of the House with a further statement, unless there are questions.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I desire to propose an amendment; and I ask the chairman of the committee if he is willing for me to propose the amendment and then discuss it later?

Mr. COLTON. Yes; for the purpose of having the amendment reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Arkansas offers an amendment for the information of the House, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. WINGO: Page 1, line 6, after the word "purposes," strike out the period and insert a comma and add the following language: "or now owned by any fraternal organization and used exclusively for fraternal purposes."

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I will explain to you why I have introduced that amendment. My colleague the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. REED], who represents the Hot Springs district, is ill at home. This is a general bill. Inside the Hot Springs reservation, which was turned into a national park, my recollection is that there is a Hebrew hospital, maintained by some Hebrew organization—I forget which particular one. You have got an Elks' building, a lodge hall. The Masons, I think, have a site. Whether or not they have erected a hospital or other building I do not for the moment recall. But you see the necessity for this amendment if you are going to exempt church property. There would be certainly more necessity for this kind of a provision for Hot Springs National Park than there would be for this land that is inside this national park in Montana, or wherever it is. Because in the Hot Springs National Park these properties are right there in the heart of things; and under the law which you passed the other day the Secretary of the Interior could condemn them. I do not think you want to do that. I think in most cases we donated the land for these fraternal buildings; and that is the reason why I offered the amendment.

Will the gentleman from Utah permit that amendment to be offered now? I presume the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] would rather have that disposed of first. He has a substitute which he proposes to offer.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman's amendment will probably be voted on before my substitute. It would be well to have it pending.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WINGO: Page 1, line 6, after the word "purpose," strike out the period and insert a comma and add the following language: "or now owned by any fraternal organization and used exclusively for fraternal purposes."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT] for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Utah yields to the gentleman from Montana for the purpose of offering an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. DOWELL rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Iowa rise?

Mr. DOWELL. I rise to suggest a point of order. If the gentleman from Utah [Mr. COLTON] desires to occupy the floor and yield the floor to the gentleman from Montana for the purpose of permitting him to offer an amendment, the gentleman from Montana offering the amendment will have the floor. I merely call the attention of the Chair to the fact that when the gentleman yields the floor for the purpose of allowing the gentleman from Montana to offer an amendment, he actually yields the floor.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent at this time that the gentleman from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT] may offer his amendment in order that the whole proposition may be before the House, and in the meantime I retain the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It seems to the Chair that all that the gentleman has to do is to yield to him for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. COLTON. I yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. DOWELL. I want to keep the RECORD straight. If this is going to be the ruling of the Chair——

Mr. LEAVITT. All that I am interested in is in having the completed bill perfected. My amendment changes only two words.

Mr. DOWELL. The only question I am interested in at all is the question of order; whether or not one having control of the time may yield for the purpose of another offering an amendment and then proceed again in command of the time. My contention is that this is not in order and that the gentleman who yields the floor for an amendment to be offered yields the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that is correct. The Member to whom he yields for the purpose of offering an amendment has the floor for one hour on that amendment if he wanted to take it.

Mr. DOWELL. That would be true if he takes the floor on the amendment.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, may I submit a unanimous-consent request to take care of it? The gentleman yielded to me. I ask unanimous consent that the control of the time and the control of the situation shall not be affected by his having yielded to me for my amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's amendment has been disposed of.

Mr. WINGO. I ask, in order to clear the parliamentary situation, that the control be not changed by reason of that action.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As the Chair understands it, the gentleman from Utah [Mr. COLTON] yielded to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT] for the purpose of offering an amendment. The Chair will rule that when the Member in charge of the bill yields to another Member for the purpose of offering an amendment, he also yields the floor. The Member who offers the amendment is then entitled to an hour to debate his amendment. The Chair will say that this ruling follows the decisions that are found in Hinds' Precedents, Volume V, sections 5029, 5030, and 5031.

Mr. DOWELL. That is what I contend.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, in view of that ruling of the Chair—and I think it is correct—I offer the amendment which has been sent to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Utah offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COLTON: Page 1, line 3, after the word "to," strike out the word "purchase" and insert "acquire"; and on page 1, line 5, after the word "organization," strike out "and" and insert "while."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker and ladies and gentleman of the House, this bill, while it is intended to reach one particular situation in one national park, is broad enough in its language to affect every national park.

Now, it is a fact that neither the committee nor anyone here knows what the conditions are, definitely, in all the parks. No one knows how far-reaching this bill may be. We do have some information as to the particular situation in Glacier National Park, but there has been no study and no examination with reference to the parks as a whole.

My theory of a national park is that it is an area of land that is set apart perpetually to be used in common by all the people, and anyone or any organization that owns a part of that area and who is given the exclusive right to the use of that area to that extent is encroaching upon the national park and defeating the fundamental purposes of that park.

There may be reasons why sometimes consent might well be granted. We have seen fit to permit religious organizations to have a place where a church could be built and religious services held.

But to say to any one religious organization, "You can have not only enough land for a church but you can have 70 or 80 acres of land," means that every religious organization is entitled to that same privilege. To say that we are going to grant that privilege for religious purposes—as the House just demonstrated when it accepted the Wingo amendment—means that every fraternal organization as well ought to have the same privilege, and by the time you have taken care of the different kinds of church organizations and fraternal organizations, perhaps the next organizations we should take care of would be political organizations, and others. In other words, it is rather questionable whether a national park is to be an area set aside for the common use of all the people, or whether it is to be a place maintained by the Federal Government for the benefit of some individual landowners and organizations owning lands within the park.

By reason of the fact that this bill is only intended to reach an emergency in the Glacier National Park, if we are going to pass the bill at all it ought to be limited to the Glacier National Park, and we should take care of other parks as any emergency may arise.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Certainly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In answer to my interrogation of the gentleman from Montana a moment ago with reference to the scope of this bill, he stated very distinctly that the language of this bill only applied to property now in the possession of religious organizations, and if that is true I do not see how the argument just made by the gentleman with reference to an extension of this right could be a valid argument.

Mr. CRAMTON. There are two angles to that. In the first place, no one knows—that is, the information has not been made available—how much land is owned by religious organizations in other parks. In the second place, when you have passed a law saying that the Methodists of Montana shall have the right perpetually to set aside nearly 80 acres of land in Glacier Park, if the Baptists of Montana should come here, or the Catholics, the Jews, the Quakers, or anybody else, and say they would like to have an area in this national park—because there is a lot of privately owned land in Glacier Park—or wanted the privilege of buying 80 acres alongside of the Methodists, I do not see how Congress could reasonably refuse to extend the privilege to the Baptists, to the Catholics, or the Jews which we are now proposing to extend to the Methodists.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I yield.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If we pass this bill, would it not be an invitation for such organizations to acquire lands in these national parks, which are largely enhanced in value by reason of the money the Government spends on the parks?

Mr. CRAMTON. Oh, yes. We maintain the roads in the parks and all these other things.

Mr. LEAVITT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. LEAVITT. Has anything of that kind taken place while the doors have been wide open, with no restriction whatever, and privately owned lands available in the national parks? Does the gentleman know of any other religious organization that is in the situation that it is intended to reach in this bill?

Mr. CRAMTON. No; and the gentleman from Montana is not sure as to what the situation is in other parks. But I know this: That when I asked the Park Service as to how much acreage was involved in this particular case it took some research for them to determine that fact.

Mr. LEAVITT. Is not this true or a reasonable conclusion, that if there were any considerable areas in other parks belonging to religious organizations, such as the gentleman has referred to, the Park Service would know something about it themselves?

Mr. CRAMTON. Oh, no. I do not say they do not know whether religious organizations hold lands, but the area of them and the nature of their use has not been checked up.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to be permitted to proceed in my own way and make a connected statement, after which I will be very glad to yield.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. I would like to ask the gentleman if there is any restriction placed on this organization if they should decide 5 years or 10 years from now to sell this land to a private individual?

Mr. CRAMTON. Under the amendment which has been adopted, in my judgment, the lands would be subject to condemnation if they should sell to others.

Mr. BEGG. After it is sold; but in the interim, suppose it were discovered that there were rich mineral deposits on this acreage?

Mr. LEAVITT. Let me say to the gentleman from Ohio that the mineral laws as such do not apply to the national parks.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I can not yield further, because I would like to make a connected statement. As I have said, if we are going to pass this bill we should pass it in such form as to take care of this one park and then take care of other situations as they develop. Now, let us see about the situation in this one park. A certain organization, I understand the Methodists, own a tract of land that is 73.94 acres in extent. They hold there annually, I am told by the Director of the National Park Service, for about 10 days some kind of a meeting, either an institute or something of the kind. Now, by reason of this temporary use for about 10 days each year it is proposed that they shall perpetually have the exclusive use of nearly 80 acres.

The bill says that the right to condemn land—and you understand there is no proposition pending to arbitrarily evict these people, and you ought to understand that the National Park Service has never shown any disposition to be arbitrary or harsh in its treatment of the public, and so there is no pending eviction against these people—but this bill provides that perpetually, hereafter, the general right of the Government to condemn property for public use shall not apply to lands now owned by any religious organization while, as the bill now provides, used exclusively for religious purposes.

Now, with 73.94 acres you have to give the term "religious purposes" a pretty liberal meaning in order to justify in anyone's mind that their occupancy of that amount of land is "exclusively for religious purposes."

It happens that the area they hold is located in a very attractive section of Glacier Park. As I understand, it is immediately upon Lake McDonald and extends up to the Transmountain Highway now under construction, and in their use of it they hold this annual meeting and they have been erecting shacks upon their land, scattered more or less about it, unattractive, disappointing-looking structures, some conspicuous from the highway, constituting an undesirable picture in one of the most attractive sections of Glacier National Park. I do not understand that all of this array of disagreeable shacks is necessary for their use of it for religious purposes. On the other hand, if they did not own an acre of land up there, there would be no difficulty about their going there annually and holding the kind of camp they want.

Why, everybody is urged and encouraged to go to these national parks and set up their own little camp and avail themselves of the privileges there afforded. They are encouraged to do this, and, certainly, any worthy organization that wants to go into a national park and set up a camp will have no difficulty. They will not have to own the land and will have no difficulty about it; but they will have to conform to the regulations of the National Park Service so as to be sure that their use of the land does not interfere with the pleasure of others in using the park.

I have tried to get an agreement with the gentleman from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT] to reduce this area, inasmuch as they are in the park, to an area that might reasonably be thought to have some relation to the religious use rather than to a whole aggregation of summer homes. I thought that 5 acres would certainly cover as large an area as they could want to use for religious purposes. But for them to set up their own little park for their own individual, denominational use in the midst of a national park, hardly seems to me the right policy for us to follow.

Mr. LINTHICUM. If the gentleman will permit, I would like to ask what is the total area of the Glacier National Park?

Mr. CRAMTON. Oh, it is a very large area. I do not know—it is probably as large—well, it is a very large area and, of course, 73 acres as compared with the total area of the park is nothing. It does happen, however, it is rather conspicuously located.

Mr. DALLINGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. Yes.

Mr. DALLINGER. Why should there be any land in a national park, no matter by whom owned, that can not be taken by the Government if necessary?

Mr. CRAMTON. There ought not to be an acre of land in any national park that is not entirely under the control of the Government and devoted to the common use of everyone.

Mr. DALLINGER. Then why should the bill be passed at all, for 5 acres, or 20 acres, or 70 acres?

Mr. CRAMTON. In my judgment, the bill really ought not to pass at all [applause]; but I have tried to get an agreement. I am never sure just what the House will do with a bill, and I have tried to work out a way to minimize the harm that this would do.

It is true that when the gentleman from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT] consulted with the Park Service and presented this bill, the Park Service did not disapprove of the bill. This in itself is a demonstration of the attitude of the Park Service. They have no thought of running these people out of the park, or anything of that kind. But they would like the authority to regulate the kind of structures that will be put on this land.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman an additional five minutes.

Mr. CRAMTON. But the land now belongs to this organization. Of course, the only way we can acquire it is by purchase or through condemnation proceedings. The Park Service held they could not put in the bill just a straight-out requirement that plans for development of structures should be approved by the Park Service, but when I suggested to them that this exemption from condemnation be only extended to that land after they filed a statement stating its use would be for religious purposes, and that if exempted from condemnation the character of the structures would be subject to approval of the Park Service, they concluded that could be done; and so, at my request, they drafted a substitute which I have in mind to offer.

Understand this substitute represents my views rather than the views of the Park Service, although I am sure they would be quite in sympathy with this sort of a bill.

I have in mind to offer this as a substitute. Personally, I think the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] is quite correct that we would be better off if we did not pass any bill. But I realize that it has become a matter of some discussion in Montana and there has been an effort in some quarters to make more or less a political issue of it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I yield.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman refers to "the gentleman from Wisconsin." The gentleman who made the interruption and the statement was the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DALLINGER]. But the gentleman from Wisconsin, now speaking, heartily indorses the position of the gentleman from Massachusetts. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRAMTON. I am glad to hear that and glad that I made the mistake. [Laughter.]

Without desiring to be obstructive to what the gentleman from Montana is trying to do, I drafted this provision to minimize the situation.

That the right of the Government to acquire through condemnation shall not apply to any lands up to 5 acres within the Glacier National Park now owned by any religious organization while used exclusively for religious purposes: Provided, That before such lands shall be exempt from condemnation under the aforesaid provision said organizations shall file with the Secretary of the Interior a statement in writing certifying that particular land not exceeding 5 acres is needed and used, and shall continue to be used exclusively for religious purposes and agreeing to secure prior approval of the said Secretary of the Interior of all structures of any kind whatsoever hereafter proposed to be placed thereon as far as their location, design, and sanitation are concerned, and should such use of the land be discontinued or the said agreement withdrawn or violated then the provisions of this act shall no longer apply.

I think I have said, Mr. Speaker, all that I care to say unless there are some further questions.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I will.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. The gentleman proposes to give certain rights to those who are there now. By what reason can you deny similar right to those who come afterwards?

Mr. CRAMTON. I think it is a dangerous precedent.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. You have no right to set a time limit.

Mr. CRAMTON. I think it is a dangerous precedent; I think because those from Montana who are near by and got in early and got a piece of land, later the Boy Scouts of Michigan or the Girl Scouts, when they want to have some place where they can go will say, "Well, you let them in," and there would be a good deal of justice in their plea.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT].

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I realize that a bill of this kind is in danger through discussion of abstract principles rather than of the actual situation. If we were to consider a new national park and determine whether privileges of this kind should be given it would undoubtedly not be justified. But we have a situation here that is going to be met in one way or another. We have an area of land in this national park that has been acquired when the acquiring of that land was entirely proper, entirely legitimate, and with the added situation that it was given to this organization in the desire of a pioneer family in that State to do something for the young people. The situation has existed for a number of years, and without any of these things that are being feared having taken place.

On the contrary, I have a statement here dated January 23, yesterday, signed by Mr. Albright, Director of the National Park Service, in which he says this:

In connection with request received in the department from Hon. DON B. COLTON, chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands of the House of Representatives, for a report on H. R. 16352, "A bill providing that no lands owned by any religious organization within any national park can be purchased by condemnation or otherwise by the Government, and for other purposes," which was referred to this service for preparation of reply, careful consideration has been given to the advisability of recommending the addition of the following proviso to the bill:

"Provided, That structures of any kind within 300 feet of any highway built by the Federal Government shall be subject to the approval of the National Park Service as far as their location, design, and sanitation are concerned."

As far as is known in the service, the right of the Federal Government to restrict buildings and other construction projects on privately owned land within the national parks has never been definitely determined, either judicially or otherwise, and therefore the question as to whether such right exists is not entirely free from doubt. Notwithstanding the aforesaid status of this question, it is not believed that any legislative language to this effect could legally give the Federal Government any authority in this connection should it be found that the same does not already exist. In other words, it is believed here in the service that if the Federal Government has authority to restrict the use of privately owned lands within the national parks so as not to interfere with the scenic views in the parks, that such rights may be exercised by the park administration, whether or not the proposed legislative language is included in the bill and enacted into law.

I will state at this point that the senior Senator from Montana stated to the House subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations when these matters were before it this year that in his judgment that power now exists on the part of the Federal Government, even to zoning or controlling the character of structures on private lands within the national parks, speaking particularly of the Glacier National Park, and having in view the fact that jurisdiction had been ceded by the State to the Federal Government. Then the letter goes on, and I call particular attention to this:

On the other hand, we do not anticipate any difficulties with religious organizations on the land within the national parks in this respect, as we have always found such organizations highly cooperative in the administration of these areas, and it is believed that if word is given out by you and other Members of Congress to these organizations to the effect that the National Park Service agreed to or approved this proposed legislation only on condition that these organizations would extend fullest cooperation in the use of their land in conformity with national park ideals, that this would have all the effect that would be desired.

HORACE M. ALBRIGHT, Director.

Here is the statement from the head of the Park Service, after having dealt for years with this situation, and the situation is not as it has been presented with regard to a large number of unsightly edifices on this land. It is possible there might be a difference of opinion as to the character of some of them, but they have erected there a rustic temple, costing about $6,000, and they have attempted, as the statement has been made to me by the superintendent of that park, to keep those places clean and in proper condition.

I can see very plainly that this situation is likely to be confused with the general situation having to do with the use of lands for strictly private purposes. There are in the national parks areas belonging to individuals, and it is proposed by the action taken by the House the other day that those lands be subject to condemnation, and that the owners be given a lifetime lease as long as they live, for the use of those lands for summer-home purposes and purposes not without the purpose of the national parks themselves. That is the proposition. The House has acted upon it. How are you going to apply that to a religious organization that owns the land just as completely as do those private owners own their land. You can not say to them, "As long as you live you can have this." You must put it in other language to give them the same treatment. This is no special treatment, this is an effort to give this church organization the same treatment that is being proposed with regard to private owners in respect to their summer homes. As long as this is used exclusively for religious purposes, as long as it is owned by this organization and so used, it will not be subject to condemnation. Just the moment that it passes to other ownership or is put to other uses, it then becomes subject to condemnation and purchase by the Government, just as would be the case when the private owner of a summer home dies. It then becomes subject to acquirement by the Government.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVITT. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman has not quite appreciated the situation. The bill to which the gentleman refers does not exempt private lands from condemnation at all until the present owners die. It provides for condemnation, but it does authorize the Park Service, when they are acquiring those lands through negotiation, not through condemnation, to give back a life lease, and that is taken into consideration in the price they pay for the lands. But we do not exempt them. The department has authority to proceed, if they desire, to condemnation.

Mr. LEAVITT. The gentleman misunderstood me. I did not say they could not condemn the land. They can buy the land under the present law if the bill is finally passed as it went through the House, and as the House conferees were instructed, and then the Government can give back this lifetime lease; but that sort of provision will not meet the situation of an organization like this, that is just as legitimately in there as any private owner. What I am trying to do is to give them the same privilege, not something different, but the same privilege we are proposing to give to private owners of land used for other purposes. I am providing that as long as they remain a religious organization and use the land exclusively for religious purposes they can retain title to it. The only difference is that with these other people they do not retain the title, but they get a permit. This would automatically do away with any uses of that area or any part of it not exclusively religious, and in a few years will work out its own solution, in my judgment, in the fact that this church organization would not be able to use some portions of this land as it may now plan as a producer of revenue, but would find it more advisable to sell to the Government. Further, the moment it was disposed of otherwise it would become subject to purchase by the Government through condemnation or otherwise. It is not giving them any special privilege, but is giving them, as near as we can do it, the same kind of privilege we propose to individuals.

The writing in of the restrictions proposed by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] I can see no objection to. The opinion of the Park Service is that they do not really need them for the protection of the area, and I do not believe the owners of that land would object to having it in there. I do not believe they would object to being required to enter into an agreement as to the form of construction and sanitation.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. What did the gentleman say about the use of the land for revenue-producing purposes?

Mr. LEAVITT. They might have in mind the use of some of it for those purposes, and if they did it would not be different from the use of some other lands in the parks where the owners lease for summer homes. In my interpretation of the bill it is that they would have to use the land for religious purposes exclusively in order not to have it subject to condemnation.

So far as the area is concerned, I see no reason for reducing the area or limiting it. I do not think 5 acres would be enough. If the gentleman from Michigan would make it 10 acres, I do not believe that I would object under the circumstances. I have talked with my colleague [Mr. EVANS], in whose district this area is, although many of the people are in my district, and he says he thinks it would be good judgment on our part to accept an amendment at 10 acres. What we are trying to do is not to create a special privilege but to give these people the same kind of privilege that we are proposing to give to everyone else.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, may I ask how much time remains?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 14 minutes remaining.

Mr. COLTON. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG].

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I am not sure I even want five minutes but I want to direct the attention of the House to what I think the bill does, and not being an attorney maybe I am entirely in error. The people holding this land to-day have the same right to it that every man owning land under a deed has and no greater right as I understand it, and that being the case the Government, under certain conditions, can take the property by due process of law under the right of eminent domain. I want to raise the question if by special legislation you deny the Federal Government the right to take any or all of this property under the right of eminent domain, have not you given a vested right which we can not take away.

I will raise that question—and not being a constitutional lawyer or any kind of a lawyer, I can not argue, I raise another question. They are building small homes there. Who is building, private individuals or the church organization? If the church organization is building them they perhaps and are undoubtedly charging a reasonable rental. Now, if they can get away with building cottages and operating a summer resort for 10 days or 2 weeks, or whatever it is, I submit to you if they discover oil on it they can sink an oil well and have a derrick every 100 yards without violating the provisions of this law. They can do more than that, they can open up any kind of a mine if they have a vested right to the land by special legislation. I do not believe this Congress wants that done in any of our national parks. I do not believe Congress wants to deny these people the right of having a summer conclave or of any kind they want, but it strikes me as a layman you are running dangerously near legal difficulties, and if in the future we should want it for any purpose, and I can conceive it might be an absolute necessity almost to condemn the right of way for a railroad or a highway through this property with this legislation. I raise that question and direct it to the attorneys of the House. Could you go through?

Mr. EVANS of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEGG. I yield, but will the gentleman be brief?

Mr. EVANS of California. Does the gentleman believe this Congress could waive the right of eminent domain, which is a constitutional right?

Mr. BEGG. I simply can not discuss that, but I have my own opinion; but it is not legal and it is probably a waste of time to give it to the House. Personally I do not think we can.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEGG. I will.

Mr. STEVENSON. Certainly, if Congress can waive a right, it can repeal the waiver.

Mr. BEGG. Of course, you can repeal this law——

Mr. STEVENSON. Of course, we would not be in a position where we could not rescind the waiver.

Mr. BEGG. And Congress can undo anything without question under certain procedure, but you can not take away a vested right without compensating the person owning same. Hence the danger of this legislation.

Mr. LEAVITT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEGG. I will.

Mr. LEAVITT. It would give added protection to this organization in the use of this land for simply religious purposes without further action of Congress, and they should not arbitrarily be deprived of this area.

Mr. BEGG. They can not arbitrarily be deprived of it now.

Mr. LEAVITT. Yes; they can.

Mr. BEGG. No; not without due process of law and condemnation and compensation. Now, if we pass this bill, as I say, I think we are creating a vested right, but at the same time we are not depriving them of the right to sell this whole proposition to a private individual.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Oh, yes.

Mr. BEGG. No; you are not. You are not putting any kind of curb on it.

Mr. LEAVITT. They could sell it just as they can now, the same as other private owner. But when they sold it, it would immediately come out from under the protection of the Government.

Mr. BEGG. Yes; I grant all that. There is no reason why this church organization, if they wanted to do it, can not under the guise of a church organization go and establish a college.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, can I have half a minute more?

Mr. COLTON. I yield to the gentleman half a minute.

Mr. BEGG. And if they were to establish that college, all they would need to do to bring it under the protection of this bill would be to say it is a religious college, and thereby you would have granted them privileges over other institutions in the United States. I think it should be drafted in clearer language or else not passed.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Does not the gentleman think it ought to be recommitted?

Mr. BEGG. Yes. I think it ought to be rewritten.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment as a substitute to the bill.

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, let me say, before the gentleman offers his motion, that I think the fears of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] are groundless. The passage of this bill will not enlarge the rights already owned by the church. It will not change the right one way or the other. It simply provides that so long as the land is used exclusively for church purposes the right of eminent domain shall not be exercised against this property.

Mr. BEGG. It enlarges their right by the gentleman's own admission.

Mr. COLTON. It is a question whether the right of eminent domain can now be exercised in national parks. This simply provides that if it is invoked—and we shall probably authorize its exercise in another act now pending before Congress—it shall not lie against this particular land. I can think of no other way to put this church on an equality with private individuals who will probably secure lifetime leases if their land is condemned.

Mr. CRAIL. If this bill becomes a law, who is to decide, or how is it to be decided, whether the use to which the land is being put is a religious use?

Mr. COLTON. If there was any question or dispute about it I suppose it would be judicially determined. I do not anticipate that action of that kind would be required. Now I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAMTON. I have no desire to debate beyond one minute, but I would like to offer a substitute.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Utah yield to the the gentleman from Michigan for the purpose of offering an amendment?

Mr. COLTON. I yield to him one minute for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. The parliamentary situation is that otherwise the gentleman from Michigan could occupy an hour.

Mr. CRAMTON. I have no desire to do that. I accepted the suggestion of 10 acres instead of 5. It cuts down the acreage from 74 to 10. It limits the application of the law to the Glacier National Park instead of all national parks, and it gives the Park Service the authority to regulate the character of the use of the land.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CRAMTON: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert: "That the right of the Government to acquire through condemnation shall not apply to any land up to 10 acres within the Glacier National Park now owned by any religious organization while used for religious purposes: Provided, That before such lands shall be exempt from condemnation under the aforesaid provision said organizations shall file with the Secretary of the Interior a statement in writing certifying that particular land, not exceeding 10 acres, is needed and used and shall be used exclusively for religious purposes, and agreeing to secure prior approval of the said Secretary of the Interior of all structures of any kind whatsoever hereafter proposed to be placed thereon as far as their location, design, and sanitation are concerned, and should such use of the land be discontinued or the said agreement be withdrawn or violated, then the provisions of this act shall no longer apply."

Mr. COLTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. LEAVITT].

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I wish merely to say this: I am sure that the language proposed by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] puts around it every restriction that the Government could expect; more than has been asked for by the Park Service itself. I am willing to accept it as meeting the situation.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to occupy five minutes. But I am opposed to the amended proposition of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] that this area shall be 10 acres instead of 5. That change from 10 to 5 does not, in my judgment, at all tend to reconcile this bill with the great principle upon which this Government is based—the absolute separation, under all circumstances, of church and state. We should not exempt property from condemnation proceedings upon religious grounds.

The gentleman from California [Mr. CRAIL] propounded a very pertinent question. He wanted to know who is to define the expression "religious purposes." I know some people who say that the Methodists in their religious tenets do not practice religion. [Laughter.]

These people may be very benighted, and I think some of them are. Nevertheless this is a Government of Catholics, Protestants, infidels, and Jews. All of these classes pay taxes, and we have no right to exempt from condemnation for public use the property of any one of them because of its particular religious faith. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LEAVITT) there were—ayes 39, noes 37.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LEAVITT) there were—ayes 30, noes 55.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 71, nays 202, not voting 155, as follows:

STOCK-RAISING HOMESTEADS

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 3949) to amend section 10 of an act entitled "An act to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes," approved December 29, 1916 (Public, No. 290, 64th Cong.), a public lands bill, that has been reported.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I understand this bill is from the Senate, but that a similar bill has been reported out by the Public Lands Committee; is that correct?

Mr. ARENTZ. This has been fully considered by the Public Lands Committee and reported favorably.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the report was not filed in sufficient time to make it in order to-day except by unanimous consent.

Mr. COLTON. That is correct.

Mr. SCHAFER. Reserving the right to object, was the vote of the Public Lands Committee unanimous?

Mr. COLTON. It was.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. ARENTZ]?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following be added as an additional proviso to section 10 of an act entitled "An act to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes," approved December 29, 1916 (Public, No. 290, 64th Cong.):

"Provided further, That the withdrawal from entry of lands necessary to insure access by the public to watering places reserved hereunder shall not apply to deposits of coal and other minerals in the lands so withdrawn, and that the provisions of section 9 of this act are hereby made applicable to said deposits in lands embraced in such withdrawals heretofore or hereafter made, but any mineral location or entry made hereunder shall be in accordance with such rules, regulations, and restrictions as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior."

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COLTON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. CHAPMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for leave of absence for my colleague the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON], on account of the illiness of his wife.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, granted.

There was no objection.

ARTICLE BY CLAYTON F. MOORE

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the tariff question.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Idaho?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD I submit the following article which appeared in the January issue of the Tariff Review. The author, Mr. Clayton F. Moore, is a recognized authority on the tariff, and in view of his long occupancy of the position of clerk to the Ways and Means Committee, House of Representatives, has had a wide experience in the framing of tariff legislation which is probably not exceeded by any other person.

His romantic story of how a tariff law is framed is filled with the most interesting and valuable information which should be preserved in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, especially as this subject is now uppermost in the minds of the people and will occupy the attention of the next Congress for some time.

HOW THE TARIFF LAW IS MADE

By Clayton F. Moore, clerk to the Committee on Ways and Means, House of Representatives

Tariff making is one of the most intricate and fascinating functions of the legislative arm of the Government. The tariff is the stabilizer of the Nation's business. Without tariff differentials high enough to guarantee the United States market to the United States producer, economic independence can not prevail, nor can the average person enjoy the comforts and luxuries of full-time employment at adequate wages. Upon the prosperity of the country depends the extent to which taxes may be collected to carry out the all-important functions of government. Thus, tariff making is at the very root of the machinery of government. Prosperity, resulting from a sound tariff policy, furnishes not only necessary funds for the conduct of government but a contented people, well employed, well able to meet governmental tax requirements, and opposed to radicalism, which is always the outgrowth of discontent.

There are two types of economists in the United States—the theoretical and the practical. The theoretical economist, living in the musty documents of history, evolves from deductions the ideal he expounds. The practical economist separates the nonessentials from the ideal and applies the theory, in the light of his knowledge of the actual facts regarding our farms, factories, and workshops, to the everyday practices of the average citizen. The one is the economy of a dreamer; the other of the man on the street; and it is with this practical phase of our modern economics this article will deal.

"How does Congress make a tariff bill?" "What shall I do and how shall I tell my story to the Congress?" These and similar questions come across my desk daily, and I shall endeavor to tell, in this article, how these things are done.

When our far-seeing forefathers wrote the Constitution they adopted the theory that taxes should be with the consent of the governed. In other words, they declared as a basic principle that the people themselves shall tax themselves, and therefore provided that all bills raising revenue should originate in the House of Representatives, since Members of the House, being elected every two years, are the direct representatives of the people. The Senate, originally designed as the representative of the State governments, whose Members are elected for terms up to six years, was given the right to amend but not to originate.

The House of Representatives, however, is a large body of men, each with a multitude of duties to perform, and it is mentally and physically impossible for each Member to know everything about every subject coming before Congress. Congress, therefore, created committees, each committee to specialize in the work assigned to it and report back to the House of Representatives its best judgment as to what should be done.

The Ways and Means Committee is the oldest of these standing committees. It was created in 1789 for the purpose of "ascertaining the ways and providing the means" by which the revenue could be raised so that the Government could function. The first tariff bill was under consideration and pending in Congress before George Washington was inaugurated President. Even in those days the protective-tariff question was a leading issue, for we find in the Annals of Congress for April 11, 1789, that Congressman Smith, of Maryland, presented a petition from the "tradesmen, manufacturers, and others, of the town of Baltimore," asking Congress to impose "on all foreign articles which can be made in America such duties as will give a just and decided preference" to American manufacturers and workers.

From the very first a tariff bill differs from other bills in the way it is introduced in Congress. The ordinary bill is introduced by a Member and referred to a committee, which reports it back to the Congress with certain recommendations. A tariff bill, on the other hand, is a bill of national policy, involving thousands of articles of commerce with which no one man can be familiar. It is, therefore, prepared by all of the members of the Committee on Ways and Means and introduced by the chairman. Under the rules of the House, it is privileged legislation and has the right of way over all other bills in that branch of Congress.

Modern tariff making is as different from the tariff making of the colonial times as day is from night. Prior to 1922 the machinery for gathering the information necessary to tariff revision was inadequate and widely spread out among the various Government agencies. Facts assembled by one agency often conflicted with the same facts gathered by another. Little cooperation was given these agencies by the busy manufacturers or the toiling farmer. Trade associations were not properly organized and paid little attention to fact gathering. There was no central Government agency through which the facts could clear. Statements that came from the manufacturers and importers themselves were based upon individual, rather than group, experience. Often the facts presented were so conflicting that the question of a fair rate of duty was largely a matter of compromise or guesswork.

To-day a new order prevails, and by a coordinated system of fact gathering through various Governmental bureaus and the Tariff Commission—agencies in which the public, after years of education, has confidence—Congress will have before it the most complete data that was ever assembled for the making of any tariff law.

The Committee on Ways and Means is composed of 25 members—15 Republicans and 10 Democrats. At this writing there is a vacancy in the Republican ranks due to the death of Hon. Charles L. Faust, of Missouri, a few weeks ago. These men are the practical economists of Congress.

The actual work of preparing the bill will be in the hands of the 15 Republican members of the Committee on Ways and Means. Of these, 6 participated as members of the committee in drafting the tariff act of 1922; 5 of the others were Members of Congress at that time and aided the passage of that act through the House, while the remaining 3 members, 1 of whom is the son of the coauthor of a famous tariff law, are receiving their first baptism in the fire of tariff making.

Contrary to the belief that has been held in some quarters, these men have made a continuous study of the tariff question since coming to Congress, and most of them were thoroughly schooled in the fundamentals before then. Many of them spend their spare time in mills and workshops and on the farms, becoming familiar with the practical machinery of industry and agriculture. Most of them have visited the customhouses of our great ports and have familiarized themselves with the actual operation of a tariff law. They were picked for the committee because of their ability to examine the facts in a national light, rather than from the standpoint of their individual districts.

The platform of the Republican Party pledged an examination and, where necessary, a revision of the tariff act of 1922. These 15 partisans will attempt to carry out that pledge with the least possible delay. Since the policy of tariff making has been placed in their hands by Congress, they must define the policy and keep the faith. They will weigh the facts impartially and arrive at a solution which will meet the wishes of the great majority.

The first step, therefore, was to decide upon general hearings. The known conditions in industry, mining, and farming, and the platform pledge warranted that step. Accordingly, the committee notified the public at large that hearings would be held, beginning on a certain date, and that those interested in articles now subject to duty or upon the free list could come to Washington on specified dates and present their problem to the committee. These hearings are public and no one who has information to present is barred from submitting his case orally or in the form of a brief.

For five hours and more daily these members will sit, along with their 10 Democratic colleagues, and listen to what the public at large has to say about tariff revision. In a tentative form a record of these proceedings will be printed daily, and those who can not attend but who may have an interest may ascertain what is being said by a simple request for a copy of those hearings.

Upon what is developed during the course of the hearings will depend largely whether an extra session of Congress is to be called, and if the precedents of the past govern and certain facts develop, as it is now believed they will, there is no question, in the writer's mind at least, about an extra session.

"How may I obtain a hearing?" asks the uninitiated. "Should I write my Congressman, hire a lawyer, or what?" The way to obtain a hearing is to ask for it. A 2-cent postage stamp or the personal effort required to walk into room 321, House Office Building, Washington, D. C., and ask for it is all that is necessary.

You do not have to hire anybody or seek any political influence to obtain a hearing, provided the request is made at the time the schedule of the tariff act in which your item appears is under consideration. Do not bother your Congressman. He is a busy man, and he can not master the details of every factory or farm in his district. When you have had your hearing or presented your case by filing a brief, then tell your Congressman what you have done and leave the matter in his hands. His service for you begins when the hearings are over.

When the hearings have been concluded, subcommittees of the majority members of the Committee on Ways and Means will begin the intricate work of preparing the legislation. This is the second step. Shortly after Congress adjourns on March 4 these 15 Members will sit down around the conference table and dissect the facts that have been presented. This will be done in executive session. Personal comfort and convenience will be thrown aside, and these men will labor long and patiently over the mass of statistics and other important data that has been presented.

In addition to its own staff, the committee will call in experts from the Tariff Commission to straighten out discrepancies as to the volume of imports, costs of production, transportation and distribution difficulties, and such other factors as enter into the problem presented by the testimony. Upon the result of this examination they will determine the rates of duty to be applied.

In the past the allegation has frequently been made that the large contributors to political campaigns have had the greatest influence in tariff making. It has been alleged that the representatives of these groups, or of great combinations of industry, make their own rates. Such statements are far from the truth. The attitude of the present Members of Congress is "I'm from Missouri; show me." That, in a nutshell, is the answer. The modern tariff bill is based upon facts. If great industries fail to furnish the facts or endeavor to cover up the truth, they have no chance with the Ways and Means Committee. They can not enter the tariff bill by a back door. In fact, great corporations which are seeking tariff changes must be prepared to expect the closest scrutiny of their industries, and their requests must be based absolutely upon facts which may be substantiated by the various investigating organizations of the United States Government.

The subcommittees may, and occasionally do, call into executive session the representatives of contending factions, in an effort to compromise differences or obtain the truth. Such individuals, however, are infrequently called, and then only at the invitation of the subcommittee and not on their own request.

The small corporation and the individual farmer are on an equal footing with the greatest industries and their problems will receive the same careful consideration. In other words, financial standing is wiped out, and each class stands before the committee on an absolutely equal footing.

"What will happen if I am satisfied with the existing law, fail to make a statement to the committee, and some one else proposes a change? Is my case closed?" The answer is "No." If you will assemble the facts and forward them to the committee before the bill is drafted, they will receive due consideration. Certain facts are often developed after the hearing. No one is barred from presenting them in the form of a communication to the committee.

We often hear this expression, "I'm too busy to look into this matter now. I'll wait for the later hearings before the subcommittee." This is a mistaken idea evidently emanating from bad advice given by a Washington lobbyist. There will be no later hearings and no hearings before these subcommittees. Tariff revision comes once in several years. Unless there are gross discrepancies in the law which requires immediate attention, the policy has always been not to disturb the business of the country by piecemeal legislation.

Whenever the platform of a great political party makes a promise on the tariff question it is generally the first promise to be kept, if that party is victorious in the election. That is a matter of history. And when both political platforms made definite promises last June and July it was notice to the country to be prepared. The committee notice that was given to the country at large on December 5 was, therefore, a foregone conclusion, and that notice was given one month in advance of the hearings. If the Congress is to act promptly, there must be a limit upon the hearings; otherwise the hearings would never be closed and the time wasted would result in great financial loss and much inconvenience both to the individual and to Congress.

When the subcommittees have concluded their labors they will report back to the full majority membership of the Ways and Means Committee. Line by line and paragraph by paragraph the work of these subcommittees will be examined, amended, or approved. This done, the chairman will be authorized to introduce a bill. When introduced it will be referred back to the committee. A meeting of all the members of the committee will then be held and, by a strictly party vote, the bill will be ordered reported to the House.

When the bill is introduced the rates become public. It is at this time that the dissatisfaction arises among the interested parties. "I am not taken care of in the bill," wires a manufacturer. "What shall I do?" The answer is, "Take it up with your own Congressman."

It was, as has already been pointed out, unnecessary to bother your Congressman in the matter of a hearing before the Ways and Means Committee, but should you now be dissatisfied you have a legitimate right to request your Congressman to defend your position on the floor of the House of Representatives. If your position is fair and what you ask is just, it is possible that your Congressman can straighten the matter out by an amendment to the bill at the proper time, but if the committee had considered your case and discarded your request because the facts presented did not warrant it, it is unlikely that your Congressman can succeed in having the amendment adopted.

The rules of procedure of the House of Representatives provide a simple method for handling legislation of this or any other character. A revenue bill, having the right of way, may be called up by the chairman of the committee at any time after it is favorably reported. Usually when this is done there is a period of general debate, when all phases of the bill are discussed. If the debate becomes acrimonious, prolonged, and dilatory the House leaders generally bring in a rule to limit it. At the conclusion of this general debate the bill is read under the 5-minute rule for amendment. At this time amendments are offered and their sponsors are permitted five minutes in which to state their reasons for the amendment. Replies are made in the same manner. This is what is called the consideration of the bill in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

After such consideration is concluded the Committee of the Whole House rises and reports the bill back to the House, with or without amendments. The House then approves the amendments en bloc, or votes on them separately, and if a motion to recommit the bill to the committee with certain instructions—which is usually made by the minority party—fails, then the bill is voted on and passed.

"But," a dissatisfied applicant for tariff consideration may say, "my rate is still out of the bill. What can I do about it?" The answer is, "Go to the Senate." After the bill passes the House it is received in the Senate as a message from the House and referred to the Committee on Finance. The Committee on Finance will then hold hearings on the House bill. Those who are dissatisfied with certain phases of the bill may then appear. After those hearings have been concluded, the Finance Committee will go into executive session and consider the evidence that has been presented.

In the event that the evidence justifies the contention made, the committee will amend the paragraph. When the Finance Committee has completed its consideration of the bill it is then reported to the Senate.

Some interested person may now discover that the tariff bill affects him and that there is nothing in the bill which will give him relief; he still has a chance. He can go to his Senator, who, if the facts justify, may offer an amendment on the Senate floor. If the amendment is accepted, it becomes a part of the bill, which in due course passes the Senate.

This brings us to the final stage of the legislation. What happens next?

When the bill passes the Senate certain rates are different from those that were in the House bill. New rates and new language appear. What is to be done about it? The House and the Senate each appoint conferees, who, sitting together, constitute a committee of conference. That conference committee consists of the five ranking members, three Republican and two Democratic, of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House and a like number of members of the Committee on Finance of the Senate. Those 10 men will iron out the differences between the two Houses of Congress. They can not rewrite the bill, nor change any rate or language which both Houses approved. They are limited to the differences between the two bodies, and in settling those differences they may adopt one of three positions. They may agree to accept the House rate in the bill, in which case the Senate would yield its amendment. They may agree to accept the Senate rate, in which case the House would yield; and, lastly, they may compromise by fixing a rate between the two.

Once these labors are completed and the differences ironed out, each group of conferees presents a report to their House and defends the understanding of the whole conference committee. That branch of Congress which accepted the conference acts upon the legislation first. When this is done the other branch of Congress acts; and if the meeting of the minds of both Houses is complete, the bill then goes to the President for signature; and when signed by the President the tariff bill becomes the tariff law.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, as the author of two of the bills referred to, I may say that I have no objection to the bills being returned to the Senate.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, as I understand, these are bills that were messaged over to-day?

The SPEAKER. They are bills that came over this morning. The question is on complying with the request of the Senate.

The request was complied with.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to—

Mr. LANHAM, for the balance of the week, on account of illness.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee, for one week, on account of personal business.

Mr. LOZIER, indefinitely, on account of death in family.

CAPT. GEORGE FRIED

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for permission to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Vermont?

There was no objection.

Mr. GIBSON. The leading news item of the day portraying an outstanding achievement of American men of the seas fills every heart with pride.

Few of us appreciate the perils of the deep when waves are lashed into fury by winds and storms. We can not visualize the full meaning of a call of distress across hundreds of miles of almost impassable storm-tossed waters. Then stout hearts, clear heads, and calm judgments are necessary for effective action.

It is a matter of deepest gratification that these have been found in rare coordination in an American officer and American seamen of the United States Lines sailing under the flag of our country. [Applause.]

All hail to Capt. George Fried, of the America, a great navigator, a brave man, an outstanding hero of the seas and of his country, and above all a fine gentleman! All hail to his brave crew, to whose lot comes glory only through peril! [Applause.]

The congratulations of the people of the Nation are due the officers and men, who performed wonders of seamanship in the hazardous rescue of the crew of the S. S. Florida.

At the proper time appropriate action should be taken by the Congress expressive of the appreciation that is in the hearts of our people for the performance of an act of great heroism. [Applause.]

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the House of the following titles, which were thereupon signed by the Speaker:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 15, 1929.

Whereas His Excellency Calvin Coolidge, President of the United States, in a recent utterance urged the advisability of the establishment of a summer White House to be used by the President and his family during the summer months; and

Whereas the President further suggested that such summer residence should not be erected at too great a distance from Washington; and

Whereas the Blue Ridge Mountain section of this Commonwealth, by reason of its elevation, climatic condition, the beauty and grandeur of its scenery, and its accessibility to the city of Washington, would furnish an ideal, healthful, and advantageous site for the location of such summer residence: Therefore be it

Resolved (if the senate concur), That the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania extend to the Federal Government an invitation to consider the Blue Ridge Mountain section of Pennsylvania in any action taken to select a site for a summer White House; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be furnished by the secretary of the Commonwealth to the Chief Clerk of the Senate and the Chief Clerk of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States.

The foregoing resolution was adopted in the house of representatives January 15, 1929, and concurred in by the senate January 15, 1929.

C.

ADMINISTRATION OF EMERGENCY OFFICERS' RETIREMENT ACT

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of Senate Resolution 301, calling for certain information from the Veterans' Bureau. I have submitted the resolution to the Senator from Kansas [Mr.

CURTIS] and the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], and they have no objection to it. I am sure it will not take any time at all.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Tennessee if it will lead to any debate?

Mr. McKELLAR. It will not.

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 301), submitted by Mr. McKELLAR on the 19th instant was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Second. The names of all officers to whom the benefits of that act have been awarded by the bureau since the passage of the act.

Third. The names of all officers who were drawing disability pay because of disabilities of more than 30 per cent at the date of the passage of the Tyson-Fitzgerald Act who have been denied the benefits of that act.

Fourth. The names of all emergency officers drawing pay at the time of the passage of the act because of disabilities of more than 30 per cent whose disability pay has been reduced since the date of the passage of said act.

Fifth. Whether or not examinations were held in each case where application for retirement has been filed to determine again the percentage of disability.

TRIBUTE TO CAPTAIN FRIED AND OTHERS OF STEAMSHIP "AMERICA"

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am sure the country was thrilled at the bravery of Captain Fried and the other officers and crew of the steamship America two days ago. I send to the desk a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read the resolution.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 305), as follows:

Whereas two days ago the steamship America stood by the sinking ship Florida, took off 32 men in the face of a terrific gale, and established a maritime record for physical bravery and endurance; and

Whereas the country has been thrilled by this latest story of bravery at sea and has another occasion to hail an achievement of George Fried, captain of the steamship America: Be it

Resolved, That the Commerce Committee be requested to inform the Senate what appropriate action should be taken by the Congress to commemorate the noble deeds of Captain Fried, Chief Officer Henry Manning, and all other officers and men of the steamship America who rescued the crew and passengers of the sinking Florida.

Mr. COPELAND. This is a request to the Commerce Committee to notify the Senate what appropriate action shall be taken. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. I believe the resolution should go to the Commerce Committee, and then let that committee report it.

Mr. COPELAND. Very well.

Mr. SMOOT. The committee can report it very quickly. Let it be referred to the committee at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the resolution will be referred to the Committe on Commerce.

DEATH OF FORMER SENATOR OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I know that Senators will be profoundly shocked and grieved to learn of the sudden death of a former Member of this body and a former leader of the Democratic side, Hon. Oscar W. Underwood, of Alabama, who passed away this morning at 11 o'clock.

Mr. President, because of his long and distinguished service in Congress and his able leadership in this body, I suggest to the majority leader [Mr. CURTIS] that it would be a very fine and fitting thing for the Senate to adjourn out of respect to his memory.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I think it would be most fitting for the Senate to adjourn as a mark of respect to the memory of former Senator Underwood, whose death we all deplore.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I submit the resolutions which I send to the desk and ask for their adoption.

The resolutions (S. Res. 306) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Senate Resolution 306

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, January 25, 1929

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God and our Merciful Father, we would turn aside for a moment to reflect upon personal responsibility, and even upon the vanity of human greatness. As we stand before our country may the sense of obligation call forth the activity of our highest and finest powers of thought and expression. Do Thou richly endow us with a refined and chastened feeling toward all men. Bless us with a helpful and a profound influence that shall be exerted in shaping the minds and in determining the characters of those with whom we associate. Give us an overflowing passion for the good and for the enrichment of the Republic. Above everything else, our Father, may we never rest content to leave uncared for the things of the life to come. Through Christ our Saviour. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, before beginning business this morning I wish to make a unanimous-consent request as to the business of to-day. This is the fourth Friday of the month, one of the regular days on which omnibus pension bills are in order. I am informed that there are a number of these bills, but that they will not take anything like the entire day. I therefore ask unanimous consent to consider during the remainder of the day bills on the Private Calendar unobjected to, and to consider them in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that bills on the Private Calendar unobjected to may be in order to-day, to be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

AUTHOR OF POEM ON JOINT REUNION OF NORTH AND SOUTH

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege. Among newspaper men and writers generally no charge is ever considered so hideous as the charge of plagiarism. This morning I have been kindly greeted by several Members of the House and complimented on the authorship of a most beautiful poem, which the House was kind enough to permit me to insert in the RECORD yesterday morning.

The lines are beautiful, the sentiment is noble, and I should like ever so much, Mr. Speaker, if I might claim the authorship of those lines. But they were not mine; I did not intend to deceive; I did not intend to commit the hideous crime of plagiarism.

The name of the author of the lines was plainly printed, but through some accident in the Printing Office the slug bearing the name of the author appears to have been eliminated, and it is quite natural, as it now appears, that I should have been credited with the lines. I desire to make this statement in justice to the gentleman who wrote the poem. I have met him only briefly. He lives here in Washington, and his name is Mr. Carlisle. I do not know his initials. I want my fellows in the House, and particularly my own newspaper fellows, to know that I could not rest under the implied charge of plagiarism, and I ask that the RECORD be so changed that it may show the name of the author of the beautiful poem with reference to the proposed reunion of the survivors of the armies of the Blue and the Gray. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Certainly.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The gentleman, the author of the poem, is an Alabamian.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. I am glad to hear that, because the soul of poetry once lay near Alabama, and Mr. Carlisle has brought some of it to Washington. [Applause.]

LEGISLATION ON APPROPRIATION BILLS

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I desire to use three minutes in calling attention to something in the making of appropriation bills which I hope will not be too often repeated. When the Budget plan was put into effect the then membership of the House was a little afraid that under the Budget system, together with a large Appropriations Committee, a great deal of power would be given to some Members, and others deprived of certain rights. The House that passed the Budget measure was solemnly assured that legislation would not be attached to appropriation bills.

For a considerable time that order of things was observed. Then, as occasion created the necessity, little items of legislation were put on the appropriation bills and smoothed along to final passage. The practice has been increasing, until now, when the House membership has been pretty well lulled to sleep, appropriation bills are being sent through the House in race-horse speed. Unless some parliamentary watchdog is particularly on the lookout, and unless the minority Member who reserves all points of order against items in the bill is fearlessly on the job new legislation such as we see on this particular District bill will be passed through the House, and Members who have not been in their seats and watchful of a bill supposedly carrying only appropriations for the District we will find ourselves confronted with legislation such as in this bill for the District of Columbia affecting school-teachers, and which should have been in a legislative bill coming from some other committee. There can be but one motion to recommit, and that motion will be made, I understand, with regard to another subject. We of the rank and file are thus estopped. If the practice grows, then those not on the Appropriations Committee are still further set back. I hope it will stop. [Applause.]

THE LATE OSCAR W. UNDERWOOD

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker and my colleagues of the House, the sad intelligence has just reached me of the death this morning at his residence in Virginia of one of the very greatest men of his generation, a former Member of this House, a former Senator of the United States, Hon. Oscar W. Underwood. I make this announcement with the profoundest regret. I shall not attempt at this time to enter into any elaborate statement of the late Senator's public services. At a later day I am sure consent will be granted to some one in the House to place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a proper statement along that line.

To most of us here Senator Underwood was personally known. With him a very large number of us served in the House of Representatives—a place in which for a time he became to a certain extent its most distinguished figure. His career here covered a long period. He was for 20 years a Member of this House and for 12 years a Member of the Senate. He became the chairman of the great Committee on Ways and Means, and as such, under the practice of that time, the leader of his party on the floor. Subsequently he became the chosen titular leader of his party in the Senate.

The strength of Senator Underwood lay in many things—his great intellectual capacity, his profound knowledge of the fundamentals of government, and then, in one of the very greatest, if not the greatest, factor, the superb moral and mental courage which enabled him always to stand by the convictions he entertained. He contributed as much as any man of his generation to government, to the public weal, to the maintenance of the integrity, the purity, and the glory of our great institutions of government. I know that all join in the expression of deep regret at the death of this preeminent statesman and publicist.

POST-OFFICE BUILDINGS

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, before we take up the business of the House, I wish to say that I was one of those who, when the public building bill was before the House, believed that during a Republican administration some of our Democratic districts might be overlooked in their necessity for post-office buildings. For several years the cities of Sweetwater and Coleman, in my district, have had public-buildings sites given the Government by the people of those cities, given with the expectation that buildings would be erected upon them. In Sweetwater this past year the postal receipts were of $30,000 profit, over and above all expenditures connected with the office, such as would warrant the construction of a building as an economy for the Government. I had been opposing the bill, and when it was under consideration I had assurance from my good friend the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ELLIOTT], the chairman of the committee, and my friend FRITZ LANHAM, of Texas, on the minority side, that the Post Office Department and the Treasury Department would give these two cities buildings; and with that assurance, and with the promise from those two departments, I supported the bill. With the usual delay on account of red tape in governmental affairs, no step has been taken as yet to erect those buildings.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Do I understand the gentleman to say publicly that he supported that bill because it was definitely agreed that he should have those buildings?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes, I did; and that is what we all do. Everyone of us votes here because we expect some good to come to our constituents and to the people of the Nation by reason of our vote.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman said that he was going to have two post offices in two specific places.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. That is a better promise than they made to any Republican.

Mr. BLANTON. I got that promise on the floor from Mr. ELLIOTT and from Mr. LANHAM.

Mr. SNELL. Then the gentleman ought to vote for the bill, because he got more than any Republican did.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I think you are stretching this proposition just a little too far.

Mr. BLANTON. Did not the gentleman give me that assurance?

Mr. ELLIOTT. I did not. I told the gentleman on the floor of this House over here that he had some propositions that would probably be taken care of under the terms of the bill, but I did not make any proposition to the gentleman from Texas, nor to any gentleman from any other place in this universe, that any building would be built in his district.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to know that the gentleman is frank enough now to take a position that is not borne out by the RECORD. I am going to put in the RECORD in connection with my speech a copy of the colloquy that occurred between the gentleman and myself on the floor at the time the building bill was under consideration, and between me and my friend, Mr. LANHAM.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the gentleman from Texas, I say this: I never had any authority from this House or any other place to make a promise on the floor or anywhere else to any Member of Congress, and I did not do it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I want to use my minute myself. The gentleman came to me before the building bill came up and said, "BLANTON, your position is not well taken; you Democrats are going to be cared for and provision has been made for your two offices," and upon that assurance from the gentleman and from the assurance from the two departments and the assurance of my colleague from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] I gave my support to that bill, because I had been opposing it theretofore, not believing that we were going to get the buildings.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman should realize that as Texas is now a Republican State, there is no further reason for political discrimination. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. No; and I am not surprised at all that proponents should take this stand now that they have their bill. We were foolish to vote for it, we Democrats and Republicans.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATION BILL

The SPEAKER. When the House adjourned on Wednesday the situation in regard to the District of Columbia appropriation bill was that the previous question had been ordered on the bill and all amendments to final passage. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, I raise the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. On this call 322 Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment; if not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; was read the third time.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from New York opposed to the bill?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I am opposed to the bill, and I desire to offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GRIFFIN moves to recommit the bill H. R. 16422 to the Committee on Appropriations with instructions to report the same back forthwith with the following amendment: On page 3, after line 22, insert the following paragraph: "For increases in salaries of employees, except commissioners, in accordance with the efficiency rating to be allocated by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to the several branches of the government of the District of Columbia, $165,000."

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object to the gentleman from New York speaking because he was not present on the floor when this matter was passed in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. If he wishes to discuss it now, I ask unanimous consent that there shall be coupled with his request the right on my part to reply.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The whole matter is in control of the gentleman from Nebraska. He has the right to move the previous question.

Mr. SIMMONS. The previous question has already been ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that I may have five minutes, and that the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS] may also address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes, and that the gentleman from Nebraska may also proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker and colleagues, last year when the District of Columbia appropriation bill was up for consideration we found that the District employees had not been given the step-ups required by law. We found that the wages of the clerks and the mechanics and the different employees of the District were under those of every other governmental activity in the District of Columbia. We inquired as to the amount that was necessary to give these men and women the salaries to which they were entitled, and we found that it was $340,000. Then we conferred with our late esteemed chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, Mr. Madden, and agreed with him that we would divide that amount practically in half and carry in the bill of last year $175,000. That was done. One hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars was allocated to the employees of the District.

Now note the injustice here. Objection is made in this year's bill to carry out that agreement by giving the other $165,000 to make the step-ups; and the excuse given is that the Welch bill has given a raise of salary for the employees of the District and the various branches of the Federal Government. That is so, but it does not relieve the inequality. It does not remove the discrimination that existed between District employees and Federal employees.

This fact was brought to my attention this morning by the auditor of the District, who tells me that the $175,000 allowed last year had been allocated to certain employees. About half of the employees got the benefit of it. The $165,000 embraced in my amendment will accord that step-up to the other employees. The District employees that got the $175,000 allocated to them also got the benefit of the Welch bill. They got the benefit of that. Now it is up to us to be just and fair, and to give the other employees the benefit of this step-up that is provided by law.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In other words, this amendment is absolutely needed to carry out the mandate of Congress when it passed the Welch bill?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Absolutely; without equivocation. That is conceded everywhere. The only excuse, the only apology given, is that the Welch bill has given certain raises. But the Welch bill is like trying to build a third story on a house that is without a second story. For instance, take two buildings built together, one a 1-story house and the other a 2-story house. You say you must add an additional story. You add an additional story to one of the houses and leave the other house without an additional story, and it makes one the equivalent of a 3-story house and leaves the other still a 1-story house.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. CASEY. Is it not a fact that it is absolutely necessary to vote to recommit this bill with instructions to include in it the $165,000 necessary to put these poorly paid District employees on an equality with the other employees? Otherwise there will be a discrimination to the amount of $165,000 against these employees?

Mr. GRIFFIN. That is the idea exactly.

Mr. CELLER. Your amendment does not increase or widen the scope of the Welch bill?

Mr. GRIFFIN. No. It does not touch the Welch bill at all. It simply provides that these men and women shall receive the step-up accorded to them by law.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS] is recognized.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, last year when the District of Columbia appropriation bill came before the House Committee on Appropriations from the Bureau of the Budget it contained $37,000 for salary increases for the District employees, numbering slightly over 3,000. After conference with Chairman Madden and with the Budget Bureau and with District officials, the committee included in the bill last year a sufficient sum, so that last year Congress gave the District employees in the District bill $175,000 plus in salary increases, coupled with the statement that it was the intention to carry this year $170,000 more in this bill, with the express purpose then stated that we wanted the District employees to be brought up to the average of the salaries of the Federal employees in Washington, stipulating also that that salary increase last year should be given to the lower-salaried grades on efficiency ratings. The Welch Act at that time was not contemplated. The Welch Act later was passed. It carried $553,000 increases to District employees, and that increase, Mr. JOHNSON, has been made, and this amendment has nothing to do with the Welch Act.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I object to being addressed by the speaker by name.

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well; the gentleman from Washington. Every dollar that the Welch Act calls for with respect to the District employees is carried in this bill as it came from the committee. After the Welch Act was passed——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SIMMONS. I can not. After the Welch Act was passed then this question arose: Is the Welch Act in lieu of the step-ups provided by Congress last year? I advised the District officials that, in my opinion, the step-ups we gave last year were in addition to any advantages which the Welch Act conferred upon the District employees, so that last year the three thousand two hundred and some odd employees of the District government received salary increases of $733,000, and that $733,000 is continued in this bill, and this amount includes the Welch Act payments and the step-ups provided for last year.

Now, the only question is this: Have we by those two acts brought the District employees to the average of the Federal salaries? Every bit of evidence before this committee and before the Congress is that we have.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. I can not yield just now. You will find in the hearings, on page 53, comparative tables showing the salaries paid to District employees and employees of the Federal Government, and there you will find that the lower-grade District employees are well on an average with the employees in the Federal service. You will find on page 57 of the hearings a tabulated statement, grade by grade and salary by salary, as to employees in the Federal departments and branches of the Government, and there is a comparison with the employees in the District government.

Mr. GRIFFIN. But the fact is that the $175,000 provided last year was allocated to half of the employees.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes. Last year every employee in the District service received one increase in pay. Last year better than 50 per cent of the District employees received two step-ups in pay and many of them three step-ups. Now, if you should include this $165,000 in this bill, you will put the salaries of the District employees on an average above the salaries paid in the Federal service, and that is all that is involved in it.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Was the money appropriated last year—and I am not speaking of the money appropriated under the Welch Act—allocated among all the District employees or a portion of them?

Mr. SIMMONS. There is a table in the hearings showing how it was allocated, and it went, by the direction of the committee, to those who received the lower-grade salaries on efficiency ratings.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. But it was not allocated among all the employees?

Mr. SIMMONS. It went to the lower-salaried employees on efficiency ratings.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Is there an inequality on account of the amount of the appropriation made last year?

Mr. SIMMONS. No, sir.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. If it only went to a part of the employees, why is there not?

Mr. SIMMONS. Because it went to the employees in the lower-salary grades on efficiency ratings.

Mr. GREEN. Is there anything in this appropriation which will have to do with a change in the decisions and ratings made by the Comptroller General?

Mr. SIMMONS. In this motion?

Mr. GREEN. In this appropriation.

Mr. SIMMONS. No, sir.

Mr. GREEN. Does it affect any of his decisions and ratings in any way?

Mr. SIMMONS. No, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CLARKE. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York to recommit the bill with instructions.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GRIFFIN) there were—ayes 48, noes 180.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Twenty-one gentlemen have risen, not a sufficient number.

So the yeas and nays were refused.

So the motion to recommit was rejected.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I desire to propound a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I do not know whether this is the opportune time or not. If it is not, the Chair can so inform me and I will present it later. When a motion for the previous question has been adopted upon an appropriation bill, with all amendments thereto, to final passage, and following the adoption of the amendments and the third reading of the bill a motion to recommit is made, is it, under those circumstances, the rule of the House that the previous question applies to the motion to recommit without further debate?

The SPEAKER. So far as debate is concerned, it does. The motion to recommit, however, is open to amendment but not to debate. In other words, as the Chair understands it, the motion to recommit with instructions is treated in the same category as an amendment to the bill, and the previous question having been ordered on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage, the motion to recommit is then not debatable.

Mr. TILSON. And, Mr. Speaker, if any amendments are offered to the motion to recommit, those would not be debatable.

The SPEAKER. They would not be debatable. The Chair has before him a precedent and will call the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee to 5571 of Hinds' Precedents, which is exactly in point.

The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. SIMMONS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I object, Mr. Speaker.

INVALID PENSIONS

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 16500) granting pensions and increase of pension to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war and ask unanimous consent that this bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that this bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill.

MAJ. WALTER REED

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, when No. 557 on the calendar (H. R. 13060) to recognize the high public service rendered by Maj. Walter Reed and those associated with him in the discovery of the cause and means of transmission of yellow fever, was called, I happened to be out of the Chamber. An objection was made to it. Certain amendments have been agreed upon which will be offered to the bill, which I think will meet the objection, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be treated as having been passed over temporarily, as I would like to have the bill called later.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the bill referred to may be treated as having been passed over temporarily. Is there objection?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, has the gentleman talked with the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS] about that bill?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I have, and with Mr. TILSON and Mr. KNUTSON, and the amendment to the bill will be offered by the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, Mr. KNUTSON.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

JOHN W. LEICH

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11854) for the relief of John W. Leich, alias John Leach.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, John W. Leich, alias John Leach, who was a member of Company G, Sixty-seventh Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a member of that organization on the 12th day of July, 1864: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

With the following committee amendment:

Line 6, strike out the initial "G" and insert the initial "B."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the committee amendment will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word and ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes out of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BACON. Reserving the right to object, has this last bill been passed?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No; it has not. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, for years the Florida delegation has been working hard to secure flood control of the Everglades, and since December I have been busy not only on these bills but with department matters.

I understand there are about 300 witnesses to appear before the Committee on Ways and Means, and it will therefore be practically impossible for me to appear before that committee. Perhaps it is better that I should speak to my colleagues and let it go in the RECORD. I ask unanimous consent that this telegram petitioning for a tariff on palm-leaf fiber may be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The telegram referred to is as follows:

PALATKA, FLA., January 23, 1929.

Hon. JOE SEARS,

House Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

This is to request that you use your efforts toward having protective tariff placed on imported palm-leaf fiber. Understand hearings on this subject now under way by Ways and Means Tariff Committee. Imported palm-leaf fiber free of duty detrimental to moss-products industries and its future development. Your efforts along this line will be greatly appreciated.

PUTNAM COUNTY CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, it is a rather unique thing for a Democratic Member of Congress to appear before his colleagues asking for a tariff, but this is not the first time that I have done so. The Tariff Commission will bear out the assertion that I have been very vigilant in an effort to secure a tariff on tomatoes and vegetables grown in the State of Florida. We are now getting a half cent a pound, but this is no protection at all. We must have at least 3 cents a pound in order that we may even compete with Mexico and their cheap labor. Unless we get this relief the tomato growers of Florida will be put out of business.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The gentleman mentions Mexico, with its cheap labor. He fails to mention Texas. I understand that it is Texas that is causing the Florida people all of the trouble, because that State is raising a great amount of citrous fruits and also vegetables. The difficulty is not with a foreign country.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. Texas does not bother us. It is Mexico.

Mr. ROWBOTTOM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEARS of Florida. I do not want to have all of my time taken up by others.

Mr. ROWBOTTOM. Will the gentleman vote for the bill if they give him 3 cents?

Mr. SEARS of Florida. I shall not vote for the bill because I will not be here. Recently I was chided by my friends for seeking a tariff on tomatoes and at the same time voting against a tariff on agricultural products.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield? Of course the gentleman is now representing Republican Florida instead of Democratic Florida.

Mr. SEARS of Florida. I doubt that. So many intelligent Republicans have moved to my State and become Democrats that they will have to show me in the future whether they remain or not. Most of the intelligent ones become Democrats. The point I was making was this: The charge was made that I talked for a tariff on tomatoes but voted against it. The person who started that report, as all of my colleagues know, simply made a willful misstatement of the truth; because the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, as you know, clearly shows SEARS of Florida voted for the resolution urging the Ways and Means Committee to report out a tariff bill with the hope of securing protection on Florida vegetables, while SEARS of Nebraska voted against it. Fortunately, or unfortunately, there are two SEARS in Congress. By this I do not intend to reflect on Judge SEARS of Nebraska, because there is no Member of Congress whom I hold in higher esteem than he, for he is one of my best friends and I consider him one of the ablest Members in Congress. So I say the one who first started the report knew it was not true. There are hundreds and perhaps thousands of citizens in my district who thought it was SEARS from Florida who voted "no." I simply wanted to make that statement in fairness to myself, and I sincerely hope my colleagues in this House will have incorporated in the next tariff bill which will be passed, a tariff of not less than 3 cents a pound on tomatoes and a tariff on palm-leaf fiber and such other products in Florida which need protection. Gentlemen, I thank you. [Applause.]

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVITT. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Were there any attorneys in this case who presented it to Congress?

Mr. LEAVITT. Some attorneys may be interested in the case. A former Senator from that State spoke to me about the matter. I do not know that he is engaged as an attorney, but I think so.

Mr. SCHAFER. I shall have to object unless an amendment is inserted limiting the attorney's fee to 10 per cent. Will the gentleman offer that amendment?

Mr. LEAVITT. I will offer that amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. LEAVITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that identical Senate bill, S. 2362, be considered instead of the House bill.

in this connection it may be added that the Director of the Budget has advised that the payment of the claim is not in conflict with the financial program of the President.

JOHNS-MANVILLE CORPORATION

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1547) for the relief of Johns-Manville Corporation.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. HUDSON. I object.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. HUDSON. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Has the gentleman read the documents incorporated in the report?

Mr. HUDSON. I have.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. And upon them does he not think that this is an equitable claim?

Mr. HUDSON. I do not think that I would want to go into the RECORD as saying that the claim under the form of the bill ought to be paid.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The Navy Department states that while they do not specifically recommend the passage of the bill, there is equity and merit in the claim.

Mr. HUDSON. In reply to the gentleman, I read from the report:

The Comptroller General in his decision takes the position that the contractor waived these delays by commencing the work on each building after notice so to do. This point of view has been followed by the Court of Claims in a decision in the case of the Detroit Steel Products Co., where the work was done on the same buildings concurrently with that of the claimant in this bill.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Certainly. If these people could get relief in the courts, they would not come here. If they could get relief from the Comptroller General, they would not come here. All of these claims brought before Congress are brought here in the nature of petitions, to seek from Congress redress and relief where it can not be procured in a suit in the courts or in a proceeding before the Comptroller General. In this case this company proceeded to erect under contract a large number of buildings. The delays which prevented them from proceeding with the work were entirely the fault of the Government. The very same document from which the gentleman read to us states:

The work was very much delayed through no fault of the claimant, and the number of days equivalent to the delay was allowed the contractor as provided by the contract.

Further on it says:

The contract under which this work was done specified the number of days that should be occupied in completing each of the four buildings after notice to proceed with the work. The specifications gave the approximate days upon which the buildings would be ready for roof-deck work and roofing, for the information of bidders and not guaranteed. The date on one building was August 1, 1919, and on the other three September 1, 1919. This contemplated the probability of reasonable continuance of work for the contractor after it had placed its machinery and working force on the ground. As a matter of fact, the work could not be started until several months after the dates estimated, while on one building there was a delay of 17 months.

This corporation, of course, could have refused to go ahead with the construction. They could have said to the Government, "You have delayed us in proceeding and it is going to cost us extra money, and we refuse to proceed," and the Government would have had to advertise for a new contract, and in all probability would have paid a great deal larger sum than is claimed in this bill. But instead of that, they proceeded at the request of the Government and erected these buildings and took a chance on Congress or some one else relieving them of the additional cost which was occasioned by these unreasonable delays. When a construction company makes a bid to start the erection of buildings it certainly does not contemplate being delayed 17 months by the owner or representative of the owner in proceeding to begin to execute the contract.

Mr. HUDSON. The gentleman from Illinois must realize that this company, with its nation-wide reputation and standing, must know the provisions under which the contracts are made, and they knew that they were possibly running up against the very circumstances they did.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Of course they knew that they were being delayed in the performance of the contract; but they relied, as well they might, upon the sense of fairness of the Government representatives in the first place and of Congress in the second place, if it became necessary to come here.

Mr. HUDSON. The gentleman would not want to say that all contractors engaging in work for the Government can rely on the generosity of Congress adjusting any claims for them.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. This is what the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks said:

While the claim has been held to lack legal standing, it would appear to the bureau, from the viewpoint of equity, to have merit, and relief in the sum of $6,338.61 is recommended.

The Secretary of the Navy takes practically the same position, and the Director of the Bureau of the Budget says that the report of the Navy Department submitting the facts to Congress without a recommendation is not in conflict with the financial program of the President. The claim is therefore submitted to Congress by the executive department without prejudice, addressed solely to our judgment as to the equities.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, in justification of the committee's report, this only follows the line of procedure that has met with the approval of the Congress for the last four or five years in adjusting these claims which can not be adjusted through the comptroller's office, because they do conflict with the letter of the law. It is largely a technical matter. I feel that the comptroller could frequently relieve contractors if he would, but having taken that stand, we are obliged to hear these claims and report according to the evidence submitted.

Mr. HUDSON. Will the gentleman from Illinois or the chairman of the committee permit an amendment which would take from this sum the amount of $1,267.72, which is the item to cover overhead?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Michigan does not object, I shall object to the bill.

Mr. HUDSON. With that amendment I am quite willing to permit the bill to pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard.

CARLISLE COMMISSION CO.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask what has become of the Weymouth Kirkland bill which precedes that—No. 758?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. We have not reached No. 758 yet.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HUDSON. I ask unanimous consent that the House return to the first notice of this bill in order that the chairman of the committee may explain somewhat in regard to it. Here is a bill calling for $38,000. I think there should be divulged in connection with the bill the amount of interest on the claim, and so forth.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HUDSON. Reserving the right to object, I wish the chairman would explain in relation to the items of this bill.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. This is a bill where the Carlisle Commission Co. entered into contract to furnish hay to the Government during the war. They furnished the Government with 200,000 tons of hay and received their pay in full with the exception of $179,302.88. Later, December 17, 1920, the Government approved the claim as a legal debt, but they held back 20 per cent of the claim to cover errors which might have escaped the auditor of the department. They thought that good business and good practice, so they held back 20 per cent. These people have waited all this time for their money. Now, the War Department says that they found no error, and have owed it since the 17th day of December, 1920, and approve the claim. There is no doubt about the justice of it.

Mr. HUDSON. If the gentleman from Kansas will allow, does this carry an interest charge?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. It carries an interest charge since the date the Government approved the claim because the claimants have not had the money all of this time. I would like to say further these claimants are practically bankrupt as a result of their contract with the Government.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I will.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Is it the practice of the Committee on War Claims, in spite of the fact it is well established, to allow interest on claims?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. We never allow interest on claims except under an express contract with the Government when goods are furnished under contract with the Government and the Government withholds payment without just cause.

Mr. UNDERHILL. I do not wish to interfere with the policy of the War Claims Committee, but it is well established and recognized absolutely, so far as I know, that the Government does not pay interest outside of its securities.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. The Government does not pay interest on claims we, as committees, grant on equitable matters, but this is a claim where the Government absolutely received the hay and approved the claim in 1920. They admitted they owed it at that time and they withheld the 20 per cent in case of any emergency that might come up. These claimants are practically bankrupt, and the Government admits they owe the money and should have paid it back in 1920. And if you read the report of the War Department they approve the payment of interest since December 17, 1920. It is certainly a just claim.

Mr. HUDSON. Why the interest at 6 per cent rate from the time they admitted they owed the money?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. It is certainly just.

Mr. HUDSON. Why did the committee make the rate 6 per cent?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Because that is the going rate. The claimants having been paying that much or more for money they have had to borrow while the Government has been wrongfully withholding their money.

Mr. HUDSON. We loan money to the Government at less rates than that, do we not?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I expect we do. But this man has paid 6 per cent interest or more.

Mr. HUDSON. Unless the gentleman is willing to adjust that interest charge I must object.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Make your amendment at 4 per cent. I do not want to be guilty of it.

Mr. BLANTON. The Government has already paid this man $180,000 on this identical claim, and paid it years ago. The gentleman is asking for $38,000 more.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I would like to have the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COMBS], who introduced the bill, make a statement as to that.

Mr. COMBS. Mr. Speaker, it may be he accepted the $180,000 from the Government in lieu of the full amount, but he was in financial straits, being pressed by his bankers.

Mr. BLANTON. Does not the gentleman believe that when a man is dealing with the Government and agrees to accept $180,000 in full settlement of his claim he ought to be held to the same rules of law that govern him when he deals with his fellow men?

Mr. COMBS. There is no question that both on legal and ethical grounds this settlement was a coercive settlement; that it was obtained by legal duress at a time when the man was on the verge of bankruptcy. But it seems to me the Government expressly acknowledged that it owed the full sum.

Mr. BLANTON. The War Department does not usually do that way. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard. The Clerk will report the next bill.

Mr. SWING. They are husbands and wives.

Mr. EDWARDS. May I ask the gentleman for an explanation of the bill?

Mr. SWING. These two bills and the two bills which the House has just passed grew out of an accident in which a Government-operated automobile ran into the machine carrying these two men and their two wives, destroying the machine and putting the four people in the hospital.

Mr. EDWARDS. It damaged both the husbands and wives?

Mr. SWING. Absolutely.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I noticed in the papers recently that the former standard bearer of the great Democratic Party has gone to my State to bathe in the sunshine and surf; that the President elect has gone to that great climate to select his Cabinet, and that President Coolidge will soon go down there, so that it seems to me it should be termed a tranquil refuge for migratory Presidents. We welcome them to Florida. Mr. Speaker, I shall not object.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Is this a controversy between California and Florida?

Mr. HUDSPETH. It seems to be.

Mr. GREEN. I was just suggesting that it was a migratory land for Presidents and a haven of refuge, by the way.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the War Department states that this kind of a discharge was granted this soldier because of an order from high authority and because his service was not honest and faithful. Under that kind of a report I would like to ask the gentleman from Washington why we should override it?

I know lots of these bills are passed, and I dislike to object to the gentleman's bill; but there is that kind of a report—that his service was not honest and faithful.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If the gentleman will read the entire report, he will find the service was faithful.

Mr. BLANTON. I mean that is what the department says about it. The report states, "In a cablegram dated November 4, 1902, the Secretary of War directed the discharge without honor for the good of the service of all soldiers whose services had not been honest and faithful," and this man was one of them, he states.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Well, we have been sitting here listening to the passage of a number of these bills.

Mr. BLANTON. I know that a lot of them have gone through, but there has not been this situation disclosed with reference to them.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The very next letter is a letter from the man himself, and this letter has been verified carefully. In very warm weather and in a climate entirely different from that to which he was accustomed he was called on sentry duty at 2 o'clock in the morning and fell asleep at a time when there was an insurrection there, but there was no danger in his particular locality. This was his offense.

Mr. BLANTON. We are passing lots of these bills, and it occurs to me that the committee has been a little careless concerning them. I shall not object to the gentleman's bill, because some of the others are just as bad as this one.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me if this man's record is to be corrected it should be done as suggested by the War Department and I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws James D. Poteet, who served as a private in Company F, Fifth Regiment Tennessee Volunteer Mounted Infantry, from November 25, 1864, to May 1, 1865, shall hereafter be held to have been discharged honorably from the military forces of the United States on May 1, 1865; but no pay, bounty, pension, or other emolument shall accrue prior to the enactment of this act.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, I objected to Calendar No. 775, a bill for the relief of Jacob Scott, thinking I was objecting to Calendar No. 776, a bill for the relief of James D. Poteet.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. We have passed 775 and 776 also.

Mr. HUDSON. I want to withdraw my objection to Calendar No. 775, the bill of Jacob Scott, as I objected under a misapprehension.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection we will return to Calendar No. 775.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Speaker, if the request of the gentleman is to return to Calendar No. 775 there is no objection, but if he desires then to make an objection to 776 I shall object.

Mr. HUDSON. I was objecting for my colleague, who was called out of the room. I supposed I was objecting to Calendar No. 776.

Mr. TARVER. The gentleman does not ask to return to Calendar No. 776?

Mr. HUDSON. No; I suppose I have lost my right to object to that.

J. M. GRAY, JR., CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3677) for the relief of J. M. Gray, Jr., Co.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to F. M. Gray, Jr., Co., of Milwaukee, Wis., the sum of $2,500, being the amount of damages incurred between the 12th day of December, 1921, and the 31st day of March, 1922, by reason of the action of the Engineering Department of the Government shutting off the water and steam at well being drilled at the Edward Hines, Jr., Hospital, Maywood, Ill.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof as follows:

"That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to allow the F. M. Gray, Jr., Co. the sum of $2,460.92 in full settlement of all claims under or arising out of contract dated September 21, 1921, for drilling a well at United States Public Health Service Hospital No. 2, Chicago Broadview Hospital, Maywood, Ill., and there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,460.92 with which to pay the claim."

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment to the committee amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the committee amendment strike out the period and insert a comma, and insert the following:

"Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of $100 thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered, or advance or advances made in connection with said claim.

"It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, or withhold, or receive in any sum which exceeds $100 of the amount appropriated in this act on account of services rendered or advance or advances made in connection with said claim any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I rise to discuss the amendment and to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER] why he offered that amendment. Is there a contract in his case with some attorney?

Mr. SCHAFER. I will say to the gentleman that to my knowledge there is no contract. The case in question was brought to my attention by the president of the company. I believe, however, that bills of this nature should have an attorney's limitation. There was no attorney's work performed in presenting this case to Congress, and I want to be certain that money appropriated does not go to attorneys for services that they did not render.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Is the gentleman himself an attorney?

Mr. SCHAFER. I do not happen to be one.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. What is the gentleman's prejudice against attorneys?

Mr. SCHAFER. I am not prejudiced against attorneys; but I am prejudiced against shyster attorneys that get many claims before Congress on a 40, 50, and 60 per cent basis.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. The gentleman from Wisconsin is the author of this bill. He says the president of the company, as I understand it, called his attention to the matter of having this amendment adopted. Is that right?

Mr. SCHAFER. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. That to my mind is pretty good evidence that the president of this company probably has a contract with some lawyer, and he is trying to use the Congress of the United States to pull his chestnuts out of the fire and prevent the fulfillment of the contract with this attorney.

I do not know who the attorney is, but it seems to me that this is an unfair and an unjust thing for this Congress to do. If this company has entered into a contract with some lawyer to present its claims and get the claim through, it ought to be held to that obligation. I do not think it is just to have an open season for attorneys simply because they happen to be attorneys. I dare say that attorneys sometimes earn their compensation, and I say to the gentleman that this habit of preventing attorneys from getting fees for services rendered in cases of this kind frequently operates to the detriment of the person having the claim. For instance, in cases in the Veterans' Bureau we prevent attorneys from taking fees. The result of that is that many times meritorious cases do not get proper attention from the Veterans' Bureau because the claimant can not employ an attorney to look after his case. [Applause.] Members of the House and Senate can not prepare these cases frequently as they ought to be prepared; they are not on the ground; they can not get the proof; they can not know the testimony; and so, through this maudlin, sickening sentiment that manifests itself through a fear that some attorney somewhere is going to get a dollar out of the Treasury for services actually rendered, many hardships on claimants have been caused. I am not in sympathy with the gentleman's amendment. Here is a bill that is to compensate a corporation. That corporation is supposed to have men at the head of it who have intelligence, who have business capacity. They do not have to enter into any contract with an attorney; but if they do, they ought to be held to that contract, to the liability which they voluntarily assume.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. They are able to protect themselves. They do not have to have guardians. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SCHAFER. I introduced this bill, and have given it very careful consideration. No attorney, to my knowledge, has performed legal services, and I do not see why there should be objection to this limitation. If there is a contract I say that it should not be enforced, since no attorney has presented the case to Congress.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. That is the difference between the gentleman from Wisconsin and myself. I believe in the validity of contract, but if the attorney has not performed any services in carrying out that contract, of course he could not get compensation.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Yes.

Mr. UNDERHILL. There are two sides to this question. It has not been the practice of the Committee on Claims to urge a provision of this character in small bills, but the Committee on Claims and other committees of this House are continually bothered by claim agents, or lawyers in the city of Washington, who are digging up all kinds of claims, writing to some one who knows that he has not any real justification for a claim, agreeing to take the proposition on a contingent fee, on a 50-50 basis. There have been many instances where bills have passed the Congress which were just in their character, but where the attorneys have collected unconscionable fees. One instance I might call to the attention of the gentleman was the Oliver case. There never was a greater injustice done a citizen of any country than was done to Mr. Oliver, of Kentucky, by his Government. Congress took that view and made Mr. Oliver an award of several thousand dollars. The attorneys in the case, who had not appeared before the committee or in any way, shape, or manner added one single dollar of value to the claim, collected over $40,000.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I remember that claim. It passed the Congress all right. Mr. Oliver got his money.

Mr. UNDERHILL. He got only a part of it.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. He got what we passed here. The chances are that that claim would not have been properly presented to this Congress if Mr. Oliver had not asked the aid of legal assistance.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Oh, no. The only reason that claim was presented to Congress and eventually went through was because of the hard work of one of our colleagues.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I am not disparaging his merits. Let us take up this claim. Does the gentleman think it is fair when the president of a company comes to his Congressman and urges to amend it so that no lawyer can get anything out of the claim? Does not that——

Mr. SCHAFER. The president of the company did not make any suggestion whatever as to this amendment. He does not know this amendment was even contemplated. If I said that, I did not understand the gentleman's question correctly.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I thought he suggested the amendment.

Mr. SCHAFER. No; he does not know it is even contemplated.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. What did prompt the gentleman to offer this amendment?

Mr. UNDERHILL. If the gentleman will permit, this has been the practice of the gentleman since he has been a member of the committee.

Mr. SCHAFER. If the gentleman was a member of the Claims Committee he would see many cases where the attorneys get 50 per cent and the wife and children get 50 per cent, without the attorneys doing any work.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I am not speaking of those cases. Here is a corporation. If a president wants Members of Congress to prohibit that company from paying out any claim in which attorney fees are involved—I do not know whether they have a contract or not, but I do not think that would be fair.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. I agree with the gentleman from Texas that the amendment proposed should not be inserted in the bill, and I agree most heartily with what the gentleman said in regard to a limitation of the fee, but there have been many cases involving technical points of law and fact where lawyers have been the means of enabling men to secure the compensation to which Congress has said they were entitled but without whom claimants would have been helpless against the clever and able men in some of our bureaus who act as guardians of the Public Treasury and deem it no part of their duty to point out to an inexperienced person how proof may be perfected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I ask for an additional five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. And I might add that one of the great difficulties with my good friend from Wisconsin—and is one I share with him—is the realization that many claimants do not have the benefit of the tireless advocacy which he gives without stint or recompense to the war veterans of his district. He represents a district with a branch of the National Military Home, in which there is a great concentration of veterans of our wars, and especially of the late war. This colleague of ours from Milwaukee has maintained at times an office at the soldiers' home at Milwaukee, and he works indefatigably on these claims of the veterans and renders an extraordinary service. I have some appreciation of what he does, because the Central Branch of the Soldiers' Home is in my district, and I know of the great amount of gratuitous work which must be done in order that veterans may receive their rightful pensions and equitable compensation. He has a right, possibly, to have a suspicion of lawyers who may seek to exact compensation from these unfortunate men in return for inadequate service. Many veterans in other parts of the country are not blessed as are those at Milwaukee with a Congressman who has made such a thorough study of the pension and compensation laws and the procedure in the Pension and Veterans' Bureaus and who gives the time and exacting care to the veterans' claims as our friend from Wisconsin. There ought to be a way to separate the good from the bad. Unless some of these veterans and others having claims involving intricate questions of law and facts and requiring time, patience, and persistence to secure the convincing-evidence demand are permitted to employ and pay skillful lawyers, they will never succeed and justice will be denied them.

I believe that this amendment should not be adopted. It would seem to invite repudiation of a possible contract, and possibly a perfectly fair one.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask for recognition. Gentlemen, I think it is well that it should be known that in the general run of claims cases it is not necessary to retain a lawyer. The Claims Committee sits as a quasi-judicial body and carefully passes on all of these claim bills. It has an established system of investigation and all claims get a fair hearing. Now, if we establish a system or, rather, let it be known that it is the sense of Congress that out of these payments arising from claims bills a lawyer could come in and establish an ambulance-chasing business and take these claims on a contingent basis, you will create a condition which will bring in thousands of claims, and not meritorious claims. That is the situation.

As to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Texas, which was applauded by some of my colleagues, to the effect that it might be well to permit veterans to retain lawyers to press their cases, I say that the minute you create any such condition you will have runners and ambulance chasers following these boys, and it will so congest conditions in the Veterans' Bureau that you will destroy the very purpose of giving these men a speedy adjudication of their claims. If after going through a war a soldier or sailor fighting under the flag of the United States needs legislation requiring the services of a lawyer to press his claim, we are, indeed, in a very sorry state.

The trouble is not that the boys are not able to press their claims, but the trouble is that Congress has pampered the Veterans' Bureau. You have too much red tape in the Veterans' Bureau. We pamper them by giving them all they want for salaries, by countenancing their disgusting bureaucratic red tape. Let us establish by law that where a boy has received his injury in battle, where his disability is the result of gunshot wounds, that the Veterans' Bureau can not disturb the rating of that boy and call for a reexamination every six months or every year just to give idle people in the Veterans' Bureau something to do. You can do that without allowing lawyers to come in and press the cases of these veterans.

As to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER], it may not be necessary on this particular bill, but it will certainly assist in making lobby lawyers know that they will receive but little sympathy at the hands of Congress.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER] to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. SCHAFER. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. A division is called for.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 23, noes 30.

So the Schafer amendment to the committee amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

YELLOW FEVER—MAJ. WALTER REED AND OTHERS

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 557, on the first page of the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 557. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Let us have the bill reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13060) to recognize the high public service rendered by Maj. Walter Reed and those associated with him in the discovery of the cause and means of transmission of yellow fever.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in special recognition of the high public service rendered and disabilities contracted in the interest of humanity and science as voluntary subjects for the experimentations during the yellow-fever investigations in Cuba, the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to publish annually in the Army Register a roll of honor on which shall be carried the following names: Walter Reed, James Carroll, Jesse W. James Hildebrand, Hospital Corps; and Pvt. Edward Weatherwalks, Hospital Corps.

With a committee amendment as follows:

On page 2, line 18, after the word "Lazear," insert "Mrs. William Crawford Gorgas."

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. Is it an amendment to the committee amendment?

Mr. KNUTSON. It is not.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KNUTSON: Page 2, line 10, strike out everything after the semicolon following the word "Cuba" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "And in further recognition of the high public service so rendered by the persons hereinbefore named the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to cause to be struck for each of said persons a gold medal with suitable emblems, devices, and inscriptions, to be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury, and to present the same to each of said persons as shall be living and posthumously to such representatives of each of such persons as shall have died, as shall be designated by the Secretary of the Treasury. For this purpose there is authorized to be appropriated the sum of $5,000; and there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such amounts annually as may be necessary in order to pay the following-named persons during the remainder of their natural lives the sum of $125 a month, and such amount shall be in lieu of any and all pensions authorized by law for the following-named persons: Private Paul Hamann; Private John R. Kissinger; Private William Olsen, Hospital Corps; Private Charles J. Sonntag, Hospital Corps; Private Clyde L. West, Hospital Corps; Private James Hildebrand, Hospital Corps; Private John H. Andrus, Hospital Corps; Mr. John R. Bullard; Dr. Aristides Agramonte; Private A. W. Covington, Twenty-third Battery, Coast Artillery Corps; Private Wallace W. Forbes, Hospital Corps; Private Levi E. Folk, Hospital Corps; Private James F. Hanberry, Hospital Corps; Dr. R. P. Cooke; Private Thomas M. England; Mr. John T. Moran; and the widow of Private Edward Weatherwalks."

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this amendment is to equalize the pension that shall be paid to all those who took part in the experiments with yellow fever, and their widows. That is the whole thing in a nutshell.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ADRIAN VAN LEEUWEN

Mr. STOBBS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 737, H. R. 7887, a bill placing Cadet Adrian Van Leeuwen on the retired list. It is a bill which I introduced, but I was out of the House at the time the bill came up for consideration, and I understand there was objection to it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 737, H. R. 7887. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I thought I objected to that bill.

Mr. STOBBS. Will the gentleman withhold his objection until I make a statement?

Mr. WARREN. I will.

Mr. STOBBS. Mr. Speaker, this bill was introduced for the purpose of providing some compensation for a West Point cadet who was discharged from the academy because of disability incurred in the course of service. This boy was one whom I had appointed to the academy. During his plebe year he suffered from hazing at the hands of some upper classmen, as a result of which some bones were broken in the back part of his neck. He was obliged to go to the hospital and he spent two or three months there. He was finally sent home with the idea of coming back the next year, because he had lost so much time away from his studies. A board of inquiry was held at the academy and at the time all the facts were gone into. The hazing was in the nature of the so-called bracing exercise, and this boy was compelled to go through that exercise an extraordinary number of times so that it caused the bones in the back of his neck to be broken. As the result of the inquiry held at the time the board on inquiry decided and found that this disability was incurred in the course of service, because the academy authorities frankly stated that they allowed a certain amount of corrective exercises to be given to these plebes by upper classmen and that, therefore, they had to take the responsibility for whatever occurred. One of the men who was guilty of the hazing was a sergeant in the Cadet Corps, and I think he was reduced in rank. I have forgotten what was done to the other man.

This man went back the following June to take up his course at the academy again. He tried to go back to duty, but after he had been there for three weeks he found he was unable to go back to duty and he was again sent to the hospital. He was there for several weeks and finally I went on, at the request of his father, to confer with the academy authorities.

I talked over the case with the surgeon in charge at the academy and I talked it over with Colonel Hodges, who was then commandant of cadets. They both advised that the boy could no longer continue at the academy because of what had happened and because of his disability and also because of a certain amount of mental reaction as a result of it. So they took the responsibility of discharging him by reason of disability actually incurred in service.

Now, that boy's future is ruined by reason of what happened at West Point. Then the question came up as to what ought to be done for him. The only precedent I could find was where a cadet at West Point had been injured in a cavalry drill, receiving a very severe injury to his back, and in that case there was a special bill passed by Congress placing that boy on the retired list as a second lieutenant of Cavalry.

I want to say to gentlemen here that the War Department approves this bill. It is with their consent and approbation that this bill has been put in. In talking it over with the representative of the War Department and the subcommittee of the Military Affairs Committee, which had this matter in charge, we worked out the problem in this way: That by analogy to allow this boy to receive the same compensation that a similar disability would be allowed by the Veterans' Bureau for a man who had incurred such disability in actual service. In other words, there is no money provided here in so many dollars and cents, but it is left to be worked out so that he shall receive just the same treatment as any other man who was in the service of the World War and shall receive the same amount of compensation from the Government that the Government would allow to such a man in the World War for a similar disability incurred in the course of service.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STOBBS. Yes.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. What machinery does the gentleman provide for ascertaining those facts and for payment in this particular case?

Mr. STOBBS. I have come into the Chamber very recently and I have not gone into the report on the bill. It was all talked over with the subcommittee and that was left with them to work out. Major Hammond and the Military Affairs Committee and the War Department are responsible for working out the phraseology and the form of the bill.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I think the precedent which the gentleman cites of the case of the boy injured in cavalry drill and retired as a second lieutenant might well be followed, but I think it is very dangerous if we establish the precedent now of putting these cases into the Veterans' Bureau.

Mr. STOBBS. If the gentleman will pardon me, my original bill provided to place this boy on the retired list as a second lieutenant of Infantry.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. STOBBS. But the members of the Military Affairs Committee felt that in view of the circumstances that was too much compensation for the injury. So it was at the request of the Military Affairs Committee, and with the approbation of the War Department, that the bill was put in its present form, and they are responsible for the draft of it.

I would be very glad, indeed, to have this boy made a retired second lieutenant of Infantry, and if the gentleman wants to offer such an amendment, I shall have no objection at all to that.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Is the gentleman's reservation still pending, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Further reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure if the gentleman will look into it he will find that the members of the Military Affairs Committee are sympathetic to his bill. The objection to putting anybody on the retired list comes from the War Department, and, unfortunately, the Military Affairs Committee is susceptible to the wishes of the War Department. I speak from my actual experience as a member of that committee some time ago. The gentleman's bill provides for this case following the precedent of the previous case, and I think if we pass the gentleman's bill as he introduced it and vote down the committee amendment, we will fully answer the purpose and will establish no precedent of referring nonwar or peace-time cases over into the Veterans' Bureau.

Mr. STOBBS. That is entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. There is a tendency now to do that, and we should resist it.

Mr. STOBBS. Will the gentleman offer an amendment to that effect?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I will reserve the right to object unless the House will consent to vote down the committee amendment and retire this boy on the merits of the case, so that we can deal with each one of these cases on its merits without establishing the precedent of referring cases like this openly to the Veterans' Bureau.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, as the member of the Military Affairs Committee——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must obtain recognition before addressing the House. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, as the member of the Military Affairs Committee who reported this bill, I would say that I concur in everything that has been said by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. STOBBS], but I can not agree that the provisions of the bill as originally framed would not establish a very much more unfortunate precedent than the provisions of the committee amendment.

We have never gone so far as to accord retirement in cases of this kind, and it seemed to the committee, well recognizing the very great claim that this young man has upon the tender consideration of the Government, as a practical way out of it, that he should be put in the same position and accorded the same benefits as a man disabled under the World War veterans' act. With this provision he would be compensated in proportion to the extent of his disability, and it seemed to us this would furnish a very much better precedent—realizing there was really no precedent for the case—than if we established the precedent that disabled students at the Military Academy, disabled in line of duty and through no fault of their own, should be put upon the retired list of the Army.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman realizes now that in passing this bill he is establishing a precedent?

Mr. STOBBS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I have not the floor, but the gentleman from New York, who is a military man and who loves to obey rules, because he did finally get permission of the Chair under proper excuse to speak, ought not to establish this new precedent applicable to the Naval Academy and the Military Academy.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. I would say in answer to the gentleman that if we are going to accord any relief in this case we are establishing a precedent.

Mr. BLANTON. And you are going to establish a precedent no matter which way you act, whether you pass the bill as it is or whether you accept the suggestion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Exactly; and we will be establishing a better precedent if we afford relief under the committee amendment rather than under the bill as originally framed.

Mr. STOBBS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Yes.

Mr. STOBBS. For the benefit of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], perhaps he did not hear the statement made at the time. There is already a precedent here where a boy was injured while at the academy at cavalry drill, and there has been a bill passed putting that boy on the retired list as a second lieutenant of Cavalry.

Mr. BLANTON. And this enlarges the precedent by establishing another one.

Mr. STOBBS. No; it does not enlarge the precedent; it follows a precedent, I will say to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. It provides that if a boy should be taken sick at either academy, this precedent can be followed.

Mr. STOBBS. No; if the gentleman from New York [Mr. WAINWRIGHT] will still further pardon me, this precedent would not apply to a boy who is sick. But here is a boy who is actually hazed by upper classmen, and the academy authorities take the responsibility of it because they allow the upper classmen to undertake these corrective exercises with the plebes.

Under these circumstances it is not a question of the boy being sick; it is a case of actually being disabled in course of service.

Mr. EDWARDS. Has this hazing been stopped at the academy?

Mr. STOBBS. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Not this particular kind.

Mr. STOBBS. Mr. Speaker, if this discussion is to continue much longer, I shall call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Further reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER. The regular order has been called for.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas did not call for the regular order; he said he was going to.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise further to reserve the right to object.

Mr. BOX. I call for the regular order.

Mr. BLANTON. Then I object, because it will establish a new precedent.

CHARLES SILVERMAN

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9972) for the relief of Charles Silverman.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HUDSON. I object.

Mr. BLOOM. Will not the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. HUDSON. I will.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, this is a case where a man has been in the Navy for 30 years, and after he was in the Navy 14 years he discovered that he had given the wrong age at the time of his enlistment. He is still in the Navy, and all that this bill seeks to do is to correct this one mistake in this man's career. He never discovered this mistake until he had been in the service for years; but when he did, he corrected it. Cases of this kind are on record where the mistake has been corrected by the man himself.

Mr. McSWAIN. As I understand, this man gave his age as older than he was at the time of the enlistment?

Mr. BLOOM. Yes.

Mr. McSWAIN. I do not think that is a very serious offense—it is rather an act of patriotism.

Mr. HUDSON. The record is as to his falsification with the Civil Service Commission; it is not in the Navy.

Mr. BLOOM. But the man corrected the mistake himself and is now in the Navy. His record is clear. The letters from the Secretary of the Navy and Admiral Plunkett show that this man's record is absolutely clear and has been for 30 years.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What do you seek to do by the bill?

Mr. BLOOM. His record was corrected 16 years ago. The department has fined him 10 days' pay, and we are trying to correct it, as it is the only blot on his record of 30 years.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $76 to Charles Silverman, supervising clerk, navy yard, New York, for the loss of 10 days' pay, due to his suspension by the Secretary of the Navy for said period of time (August 16–26, 1926), at the request of the United States Civil Service Commission, on account of an error made by him, in good faith, as to the date of his birth in a civil-service examination taken in September, 1898; and the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and directed to remove this order of suspension from the record of the said Charles Silverman.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EDWARD A. BLAIR

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1633) for the relief of Edward A. Blair.

The Clerk read the title to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I object.

Mr. GAMBRILL. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will withhold it.

Mr. GAMBRILL. This is a bill to correct the record of Edward A. Blair and place him upon the retired list. He served in the Coast Guard from 1907 to 1908. Before entering the service he was examined physically. He was separated from the service of the Coast Guard because he failed in his examination in Spanish.

Then he went into the Marine Corps in 1909 and served until 1913, when he was retired by a retiring medical board that was under the impression that the trouble he was suffering from was congenital or hereditary. The disease caused a deformity of the bones. He is a helpless invalid and has been for some years. More recently, in 1927, he put himself under the care of Dr. William S. Baer, of the Johns Hopkins Hospital, the best-known orthopedic surgeon in the United States and possibly in the world. Doctor Baer has made an affidavit to the effect that this disease is not congenital or hereditary, but that it was caused by an infection incurred in the line of duty. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. He was in the Marine Corps from 1909 to 1913?

Mr. GAMBRILL. He was a lieutenant in the Marine Corps. The disability occurred in line of duty. That is the affidavit made by Dr. William S. Baer, one of the greatest surgeons of his kind in the world.

Mr. SCHAFER. The medical record in the Marine Corps showed a treatment for arthritis deformans.

Mr. GAMBRILL. It showed that he was examined by the medical board. That medical board came to the conclusion that the disease from which he was suffering was hereditary and congenital, but the Navy Department, in view of the high standing and well-known reputation of Doctor Baer, made its report on this case, and submitted the bill to the Congress without any recommendation. If you gentlemen will bear with me just a moment, I want to show the attitude of the Navy Department. A hearing was had on this bill, and Commander Wilkinson appeared before the Committee on Naval Affairs and was interrogated by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE], a member of the committee:

Mr. HALE. The Navy Department does not at this time make any recommendation in this matter?

Commander WILKINSON. No.

Mr. HALE. The department feels that a doubt exists as to whether the incapacity from which Blair now suffers was incurred in the line of duty?

Commander WILKINSON. That is true.

Mr. HALE. Should not the former officer have the benefit of that doubt?

Commander WILKINSON. I think so.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman also read this, that while the young man was a cadet in the Coast Guard Academy, within three months of his appointment as a cadet, and was still at the school of instruction, Blair was observed to be unable to perform the physical drill satisfactorily, and that three weeks later, on February 17, 1907, both Cadet Blair and his father are reported to have stated that the defects noted were congenital and hereditary, an assertion accepted by the medical examiner as consistent with its findings?

Mr. HALE. If the gentleman from New York will continue on, he will find that the record shows that it was not until January 16, 1909, that the first entries of the record were made that showed any such condition. The former statement was merely a report.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. He was commissioned as a second lieutenant on January 16, 1909.

Mr. HALE. And within a few months after January 16, 1909, which was considerably more than a year after he was admitted to the service, he took a severe physical examination and passed it. It seemed to the committee a very meritorious case.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But the gentleman weakens his own case by pointing out that in view of his medical history and statements made by himself and his father but a few months after his commission as second lieutenant in the Marine Corps he again reports as being unfit for duty. Seemingly this boy gave about three or four months' active service.

Mr. HALE. I think the gentleman from New York is mistaken. What he has quoted is a report given by some one, we do not know who, of what this boy is supposed to have stated. The best evidence is the record.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. True.

Mr. HALE. And the record does not appear until 1909 to show that he had any such disease.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But he was commissioned on January 16, 1909, and within a few months after his appointment he is reported sick.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is authorized to appoint Edward A. Blair a second lieutenant of the United States Marine Corps and to retire him and place him upon the retired list of the Marine Corps with the retired pay and emoluments of that grade.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LIEUT. L. A. WILLIAMS

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10238) for the relief of Lieut. L. A. Williams, Supply Corps, United States Navy.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the General Accounting Office is hereby authorized and directed to credit the accounts of Lieut. L. A. Williams, Supply Corps, United States Navy, in the amount of $175.44, which amount represents funds deposited by Lieut. L. A. Williams with the Treasurer of the United States by order of the Secretary of the Navy covering payments made by Lieut. L. A. Williams to certain men of the United States Navy, these payments later disallowed by the Comptroller General of the United States.

With the following committee amendment:

Line 5, strike out "$175.44," and insert "$63.12."

The committee amendment was agreed to and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

WANG ERH-KO

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 15279) for the relief of the family of Wang Erh-Ko.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object—and I do not intend to do so—to call attention to a matter of procedure of the House. This bill was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, when it should have been referred to the Committee on Claims. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the appropriation is hereby authorized, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, of the sum of $875 as indemnity to the family of Wang Erh-Ko, late of the city of Peking, in the Republic of China, deceased, who was killed on January 4, 1927, by being struck by an automobile negligently operated, not in the line of duty, by members of the United States Legation guard in said Peking; such indemnity to be used for the purchase, on terms satisfactory to the American minister at Peking, of an annuity for the family of Wang Ehr Ko.

With the following committee amendment:

Line 12, at the end of the line strike out "Ehr Ko" and insert "Erh-Ko."

The committee amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

J. H. S. MORISON

Mr. REECE. May I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 67, which was considered?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 67. Is there objection?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, we will have enough time to consider the bill hereafter. There is no report at all, and I ask the gentleman to let it go over. There will be several considerations of private bills.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Regular order!

Mr. REECE. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I understood that the gentleman from New York was the one who made objection, and I spoke to him before making my request; otherwise, of course, I would have spoken to the gentleman from Georgia, who interposed the objection.

My reason for believing this bill is different from others which might be on the calendar and appear to be similar is that in addition to being an unusually qualified physician he is one of the few physicians who were awarded the distinguished service cross for bravery during the World War. This merely makes the authorization; it does not direct. If by chance the report is made and they do not find him qualified, they would be under no compulsion to commission him.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. WARREN. I am going to ask the gentleman from Tennessee to let it go over. I think we ought to have a statement from the proper department. There is no report, and reports come in on the other bills.

Mr. REECE. The department made a report which is adverse. The department reported it adversely. An official report from the department will be adverse, because it is contrary to their policy.

Mr. WARREN. I could tell the gentleman the President vetoed a number of similar bills.

Mr. REECE. There is a difference, if I may say so. This bill relates to the Medical Corps——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.
The SPEAKER. Is there objection?
Mr. WARREN. I object.

TIMOTHY J. MULCAHY

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4770) for the relief of Lieut. Timothy J. Mulcahy, Supply Corps, United States Navy.
The Clerk read the title of the bill.
The SPEAKER. Is there objection?
Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to call attention to the report on this bill. We passed two bills before this in which the item was a very small amount, something like $63.12. Now, here is a bill calling for a payment of some $315 and some odd cents to correct the incapacity of a man to do his business correctly. Are we going to establish this precedent that every officer in the Navy or in the Army will not take his job seriously and has to come here for us to correct his negligence? We would not do such a thing in private business. Are we going to establish this precedent in Congress? Let me read you from the report:

Although the circumstances indicate that the relatively small overpayments would have been difficult to avoid in the process of work at the receiving ship, Philadelphia, Pa., yet the principle remains that the disbursing officer is responsible for the accuracy of his accounts. Any relief extended by private legislation of this sort to one disbursing officer would serve as a precedent for the relief of others and would tend to weaken the sense of personal financial responsibility in disbursing officers in general.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?
Mr. HUDSON. I agree with that, and it seems to me we ought to consider very thoroughly what precedents we are establishing.
Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield there?
Mr. HUDSON. Yes.
Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The gentleman has read the report of the Navy Department. As a matter of fact, there is a bill pending on this calendar of similar nature, where the department recommended that the paymaster should be relieved, and for that reason the committee applied to this case the principle that the Navy Department applied in the other case. One is a precedent which the Navy Department itself has set up by making the recommendation. Is the gentleman opposing the bill as one Member interested in these matters?
Mr. HUDSON. I will reply that the Navy Department does not recommend the passage of this bill.
Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.
The SPEAKER. The regular order is, Is there objection?
There was no objection.
The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.
The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Lieut. Timothy J. Mulcahy, Supply Corps, United States Navy, the sum of $315.65, to reimburse said officer for certain unauthorized overpayments to various enlisted men while he was acting in the capacity of disbursing officer at the United States receiving ship, navy yard, Philadelphia, Pa., which amount said officer refunded to the Government to remove the disallowance in his accounts because of such overpayments.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.
A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

REFERENCE OF CLAIMS BILLS

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to refer to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HUDSON] a short time ago in regard to the bill H. R. 15279, Calendar No. 781. The Chair thinks the gentleman was entirely correct.
Clause 3 of Rule XXI of the House provides that—no bill for the payment or adjudication of any private claim against the Government shall be referred, except by unanimous consent, to any other than the following committees, viz: To the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to the Committee on Pensions, to the Committee on Claims, to the Committee on War Claims, to the Committee on the Public Lands, and to the Committee on Accounts.

This is evidently a private claim, and should have gone to some other committee other than the Committee on Naval Affairs.
The Chair will remind the House that the Chair has no control over the reference of private bills by Members.
Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, Members have the sole right of reference of private bills. This right, however, is dependent upon the rules, so that if a committee reports a private bill over which it has no jurisdiction it is subject to the point of order as provided in clause 2 of Rule XXII.
Mr. EDWARDS. It is true that in the case of a great number of cases bills in behalf of citizens of foreign countries are referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and the amounts carried are given to the foreign governments for the benefit of the claimants.
The SPEAKER. That may be.
Mr. EDWARDS. I think this one that the Chair referred to is for the benefit of a Chinese.
The SPEAKER. That is an obligation of the Government.
Mr. BLANTON. To keep the distinction clear, if this bill ought not to have been on the Private Calendar but on some other calendar, which would have given the Speaker a chance on it, that would not be the case after the committee reported it.
The SPEAKER. That is the case with public bills, but as to private bills the rule is this, quoting from page 375 of the manual in connection with clause 2 of Rule XXII:

Errors in reference of petitions, memorials, or private bills are corrected at the Clerk's table, without action by the House, at the suggestion of the committee holding possession. But in cases where the House itself refers a private House or Senate bill a point of order may not be raised as to jurisdiction.

The rule provides that—

An erroneous reference of a petition or private bill under this clause shall not confer jurisdiction upon the committee to consider or report the same.

Section 4382 of Hinds' Precedents, volume 4, reads as follows:

4382. The erroneous reference of a private bill to a committee not entitled to jurisdiction does not confer it, and a point of order is good when the bill comes up for consideration either in the House or in Committee of the Whole.

So that the rule is different in the case of private bills. The Chair thinks that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HUDSON] is correct.
Mr. HUDSON. A point of order would not now lie against it?
The SPEAKER. No; it would not. The bill has been passed.
Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the Committee on Claims, I have found in following these references that if the other committees will follow the general practice of the Committee on Claims this will not happen. I have not raised the point of order, although I have raised it is some instances.
The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

FRANK C. MESSENGER

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12390) for the relief of Frank C. Messenger.
The title of the bill was read.
The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?
There was no objection.
The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.
The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President is authorized to appoint Frank C. Messenger (retired), formerly chief gunner in the United States Navy, a lieutenant in the United States Navy, and place him upon the retired list of the Navy with the retired pay and allowance of that grade: Provided, That no back pay, allowance, or emoluments shall become due as a result of the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.
A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.
The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

PEDRO P. ALVAREZ

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 13573) for the relief of Pedro P. Alvarez.
The title of the bill was read.
The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?
Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise for recognition, not to object, but to call again the attention of the House to the fact that here is a wrong reference. The bill should have gone to the Committee on Claims.
The SPEAKER. Is there objection?
There was no objection.
The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.
The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $60 to pay to Pedro P. Alvarez, a physician and surgeon of Bluefields, in the Republic of Nicaragua, for medical services and hospital treatment of Señora Josefa Somarriba, whose foot was injured at El Bluff, in the said Republic, on October 10, 1927, by a motor launch attached to and operated by a crew from U. S. S. Cleveland.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

HUGH ANTHONY M'GUIGAN

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 13658) for the relief of Hugh Anthony McGuigan.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $313, to Hugh Anthony McGuigan, formerly a fireman, United States Navy, for expense of medical attendance and hospital treatment incurred while he was on furlough from the U. S. S. Cleveland.

With a committee amendment as follows:

Page 1, line 6, strike out "$313" and insert in lieu thereof "$213."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

GOLD MEDAL AWARDS

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 4338) to authorize the President to award, in the name of Congress, gold medals of appropriate design to Albert C. Read, Elmer F. Stone, Walter Hinton, H. C. Rodd, J. L. Breese, and Eugene Rhodes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and is hereby, authorized to award, in the name of Congress, gold medals of appropriate design to Lieut. Commander Albert C. Read, United States Navy, commanding officer; to Lieut. Elmer F. Stone, United States Coast Guard, pilot; to former Lieut. Walter Hinton, United States Navy, pilot; to Lieut. H. C. Rodd, United States Navy, radio operator; to former Lieut. J. L. Breese, United States Naval Reserve Force, engineer; and to former Machinist's Mate Eugene Rhodes, United States Navy, engineer, for their extraordinary achievement in making the first successful trans-Atlantic flight, in the United States naval flying boat NC–4, in May, 1919.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VINSON of Georgia: On page 1, line 5, after the word "to," insert the words "Commander John H. Towers for conceiving, organizing, and commanding the first trans-Atlantic flight."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I offer another amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia offers another amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VINSON of Georgia: Page 1, line 6, after the word "officer," strike out the semicolon and add the following: "NC–4."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. LEECH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a short statement with reference to the history of the preparation for and execution of that first trans-Atlantic flight.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. LEECH. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I insert a statement with reference to the history of the preparation for the execution of the first trans-Atlantic flight.

The statement is as follows:

THE NAVY'S TRANS-ATLANTIC FLIGHT

JANUARY 16, 1929.

The NC flying boats which were used on the trans-Atlantic flight marked the culmination of the war development of aircraft in the Navy. In August, 1917, Admiral Taylor, chief constructor, initiated the project of building the largest flying boats in the world, to be of novel construction, and to attempt to cross the Atlantic. This project was conceived with a view to getting antisubmarine planes into the war zone independent of shipping. The plan was to produce these great flying boats in quantity and to fly them across the Atlantic to the center of submarine activity. The armistice came before this plan could be carried out, but the trans-Atlantic flight which was undertaken in May, 1919, was strictly in line with the original purpose of the design and really in the nature of a service trial. These flying boats were designated NC, the N for Navy and C for Curtiss, because they were the joint production of the Navy and the Curtiss Engineering Corporation. The designers of the NC were Mr. G. H. Curtiss and Mr. W. L. Gilmore, of the Curtiss Co., and Commanders Westervelt, Richardson, and Hunsaker, of the Construction Corps of the Navy.

The hull of the NC was 45 feet long by 10 feet beam. The bottom was a double-plank V with a single step somewhat similar in form to the standard Navy pontoon for smallest seaplanes. Five bulkheads divided the hull into six water-tight compartments with water-tight doors and a wing passage for access. The bare hull, as completed by the builder and ready for the installation of equipment, weighed only 2,800 pounds, yet the displacement was 28,000 pounds, this giving a ratio of 0.1 pound of boat per pound of displacement. This lightness of construction was attained by a careful selection and distribution of materials. The keel was of Sitka spruce, while the bottom planking was of Spanish cedar. Longitudinal strength was given by two girders of ash braced with steel wire. To guarantee water-tightness and yet keep the planking thin there was a layer of muslin set in marine glue between the two plies of planking.

The wings carried a load of 11.7 pounds per square foot in the air but the structural weight was only 1.2 pounds per square foot. The total wing area was 2,380 square feet. The main wing spars were hollow spruce boxes. Each rib was a truss designed like a bridge consisting of continuous cap strips of spruce, corresponding to the upper and lower chords of a bridge truss, tied together by an internal web system of vertical or diagonal pieces of spruce. The ribs were 12 feet long, but they weighed only 26 ounces each. An interesting detail of the wing construction was the hinged leading edge which inclosed the control cables to the allerons. This eliminated the air resistance of these cables while at the same time they were accessible for inspection by merely swinging up the leading edge on its hinges.

The tail surfaces of the NC were made up as a biplane which resembled in general appearance and size the usual airplane. The NC tail was in fact twice as large as the ordinary complete single-seater fighting airplane. The tail was over 500 square feet in area and the structure was supported by three hollow spruce booms braced by steel cable in such a way as to remain clear of all breaking seas and to permit a machine gun to be fired straight aft from the stern compartment without interference. This method of support was a radical change from former American and foreign practice but resulted in several advantages besides an important saving in weight.

The four Liberty engines which drove the boat were mounted between the wings. At 400 horsepower per engine, the maximum power was 1,600 horsepower, or with the full load of 28,000 pounds, 17.5 pounds carried per horsepower. One engine was mounted with a tractor propeller on each side of the center line and on the center line the two remaining engines were mounted in tandem, or one behind the other. The front engine had a tractor propeller and the rear engine a pusher propeller. This arrangement was novel and had the advantage of concentrating weights near the center of the boat so that it could be maneuvered more easily in the air.

The NC flying boat weighed when fully loaded 28,000 pounds and when empty, but including radiator, water, and fixed instruments and equipment, 15,874 pounds. The useful load available for crew, supplies, and fuel was, therefore, 12,126 pounds, or over 43 per cent. The NC was capable of an endurance flight of 1,400 miles, carrying a crew of five men (900 pounds); radio and radiotelephone, 220 pounds; food and water, signal lights, spare parts, and miscellaneous equipment, 524 pounds; oil, 750 pounds; and gasoline, 9,650 pounds. The radio outfit was of sufficient power to communicate with ships 200 miles away. The radiotelephone could be used to talk to other planes in a formation or within a distance of 25 miles.

The first of the four NC flying boats which were constructed was completed and flown on October 4, 1918, or approximately one year from the commencement of the design. In this test, although the craft was somewhat tail-heavy, its operation as a whole was very satisfactory and indicated that the work of the designers had been a success. It was found necessary to make slight changes in the position of the horizontal stabilizer to neutralize this tail-heavy condition, but otherwise no radical changes were required in the design or construction. The second NC boat, the NC–2, was completed in March, 1919, and the NC–3 and the NC–4 were completed in April, 1919. Due to injury to two outer wing sections while at anchor in a gale late in March, 1919, the NC–1 was put temporarily out of commission. After the completion of weight-lifting trials on the NC–2, the outer wing sections of that boat were transferred to the NC–1, as no spares were available. As a result of this regrettable injury, only three NC boats remained available for the trans-Atlantic flight.

The three flying boats NC–1, NC–3, and NC–4 were placed in regular commission on May 2, 1919, and Commander J. H. Towers, United States Navy, assumed command of the NC seaplane division 1, comprising these three boats. This was the first time in the history of the Navy that any aircraft had been placed in regular commission. In addition, Commander Towers was detailed to command the NC–3, which therefore became the "flagship" of the division; Lieut. Commander P. N. L. Bellinger was detailed to command the NC–1; and Lieut. Commander A. C. Read to command the NC–4.

The plans for conducting the trans-Atlantic flights were complete in every detail. In the first place the route from Newfoundland to Portugal via the Azores was chosen because its distances were the shortest and its areas of uncertain weather conditions the least. A patrol of destroyers was established along this route so as to reduce the danger to personnel to a minimum. At all ports of call mother ships were stationed in order to provide fuel, spare parts, repair facilities, etc., for the planes.

The actual start of the three airplanes, NC–1, NC–3, and NC–4, on their attempt to fly across the Atlantic, was made from the United States naval air station, Rockaway, Long Island, on May 8, 1919. The first leg of the flight was from this station to Halifax, Nova Scotia. Leaving Rockaway at 10 o'clock in the morning, all three airplanes preserved formation; everything went well until about 2.30 in the afternoon, when the NC–4 was forced to drop astern because of engine trouble. Shortly afterwards additional engine trouble forced the NC–4 to land about 80 miles east of Cape Cod and the plane was taxied under its own power to the naval air station at Chatham, Mass. In the meantime the NC–1 and NC–3 continued their flight to Halifax and arrived there around 7 o'clock in the evening.

As preparations for starting on the second leg of the flight from Halifax to Trepassey, Newfoundland, had just been completed on the morning of May 10 and the NC–1 was taxiing about the harbor waiting for the NC–3 to take off first, a starting motor on the latter broke. The NC–1 was thereupon directed to proceed to Trepassey by itself and the NC–3 started shortly afterwards. Both planes arrived at Trepassey in the late afternoon of May 10. These two planes were joined at Trepassey by the NC–4 on May 15, the NC–4 arriving there from Chatham via Halifax.

Personnel of the NC–1 and NC–3 immediately assisted the NC–4 in changing one engine, fitting the airplane with new propellers, and getting her in all respects ready for departure the following afternoon. Reports from the Weather Bureau representatives at Trepassey all indicated very favorable weather and advised a start on the afternoon of May 16. A start was decided upon and all three airplanes took off that afternoon for Horta, a port in the Azores Islands.

Formation was assumed and was fairly well preserved during the afternoon and early evening. Later when it became dark and overcast, however, and the running lights of the NC–3 stopped functioning due to grounding of the circuit by salt spray, the three planes were soon lost to each other and each continued the flight independently. A little before dawn the NC–4 began flying much faster than either the NC–1 or NC–3 because its pilots did not feel entirely stable at the higher angle of incidence given by lower speed. About 8 o'clock in the morning the three planes encountered intermittent rainfalls and a very thick fog. As the Azores were approached the fog became thicker and thicker and interfered seriously in determining the course which was being flown, as it was impossible to obtain a reliable sextant altitude of the sun. Various altitudes were tried to avoid the fog, but it merged with the clouds which, most of the time, extended very high and made flying at any altitude over 1,000 feet very difficult for the pilots.

Shortly before noon the NC–1 landed for the purpose of determining its position by taking radio-compass bearings on destroyers, but the water conditions were worse than had been expected and entirely too rough to take off into the air again. About a 22-mile wind was blowing, with a cross sea and a heavy swell. For four hours attempts were made to call to destroyers for aid by means of the radio but with no success. In the meantime the sea had carried away the elevators and a portion of the wings. Finally, late in the afternoon the crew of the NC–1 were picked up by a passing steamer, the Greek ship Ionia, and taken to Horta while the plane itself was subsequently sunk to remove a menace to shipping.

At 1.30 p. m. on May 17 the NC–3 also landed in order to obtain radio-compass bearings and was unable to take off again due to the rough sea and to damages received in landing. The plane's position was obtained, however, by means of radio-compass bearings as being 34½ miles southwest of Horta. Due to injury to the radio apparatus evidently received while landing, the NC–3 now found itself able to receive messages but unable to send any except on a short-range battery set. Those messages, however, were not intercepted by the ships. A heavy storm arose that afternoon and for two and a half days the NC–3 fought that storm and endeavored to utilize the very limited sailing qualities of the NC–3 toward getting to the island of San Miguel. This was finally accomplished and on the evening of May 19 the NC–3 reached the port of Ponta Delgada.

The NC–4 reached Horta safely on the afternoon of May 17, completing the distance of 1,200 nautical miles from Trepassey to Horta in 15 hours and 18 minutes. The NC–4 was thus the only plane left to continue the flight. The personnel of the other two planes were taken aboard the Bainbridge to Lisbon and thus to Plymouth via the Rochester.

The NC–4 was held at Horta by fog and later by a gale until May 20. On the afternoon of this day the flight from Horta to Ponta Delgada was accomplished, the trip consuming about two hours. Here the NC–4 waited six days for favorable weather and sea conditions, as the plane was too near its goal to take any unnecessary chances for the sake of completing the flight a day or two sooner. Finally, early in the morning of May 27, the NC–4 departed from Ponta Delgada for Lisbon, and arrived at Lisbon late in the afternoon of the same day.

On the 30th of May the NC–4 got an early morning start for the last leg of the trip from Lisbon to Plymouth. After about two hours of flying, however, a leak of unknown origin was discovered in the port engine and it became necessary to land in the mouth of the Mondego River near Figueira, Portugal, to make repairs. These repairs were soon completed and the NC–4 left about 2 o'clock in the afternoon for Ferrol, Spain, as it was too late by this time to attempt to make Plymouth before dark. Ferrol was reached about half past 4 in the afternoon. The following morning the NC–4 left Ferrol for Plymouth and at half past 1 that afternoon (May 31) arrived safely at Plymouth, England, thus being the first aircraft to cross the Atlantic Ocean by air.

THE PRIVATE CALENDAR

WILLIAM D. GHRIST

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 14572), for the relief of William D. Ghrist.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is a case where a postmaster cashed counterfeit war-savings stamps to the amount of $2,875 and now we are reimbursing him. Was there any great amount of counterfeit war-savings stamps cashed during the period after the war?

Mr. UNDERHILL. There was a very large amount.

Mr. BLANTON. What has been done about it?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Nothing could be done about it, because they have never been able to discover the counterfeiters.

Mr. BLANTON. And the fellows who cashed them have gotten away with it?

Mr. UNDERHILL. No; the fellows who cashed them did not get away with it, but the counterfeiters got away with it. The fact is the counterfeits were so nearly perfect that for a long, long time even the Treasury Department and its corps of experts did not discover them.

Mr. BLANTON. You may remember that there were brought before a committee of Congress hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of so-called counterfeit Liberty bonds. They were shown to have been duplicates, and so recognized by the Government, both sets of them. That was quieted down, shunted aside, pigeonholed, and nothing was ever done about it, and I thought maybe this was another series of duplicate war-savings stamps.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Not at all. This was done outside, and the Treasury Department, the Post Office Department and its officials or employees have never been charged with this counterfeiting.

Mr. BLANTON. And our efficient Secret Service has never been able to find the counterfeiters?

Mr. UNDERHILL. No; they have never been able to find out who did the counterfeiting.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General is authorized and directed to credit the account of William D. Ghrist, postmaster at Uniontown, Pa., in the sum of $2,875, being an amount charged in the postal account due to the cashing of war-savings stamps in year

1924, which were found by the Treasury Department to be counterfeit and charged back to the postmaster's account, for which amount the postmaster was in no way responsible, the loss having occurred without negligence on his part.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

FLORENCE P. HAMPTON

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 15004) for the relief of Florence P. Hampton.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I shall not—it seems to me Congress has been most liberal in granting the gratuities which we are constantly voting here. This is a case of Federal prohibition officers going down to Florida and asking one of the citizens there to accompany them on a raid. He was killed, and we now propose to pay his estate $5,000. We are much more liberal with individuals than we are with those who are in the service of the Government.

Now, here is another side of the picture. Two years ago there was called from my district in North Carolina and sent down to Florida a young man in the very vigor of health and activity. He was brought down there as a member of the Coast Guard because they needed a brave, courageous, and honest man to perform the particular business that he was ordered there for. He had not been there 10 days before he was shot down like a dog by rum runners, and then his Government turns to his widow and three little baby children and says, "If you can show your dependency, we will give you six months of your husband's pay."

Now, that widow and those three little baby children are in destitute circumstances to-day, and yet Congress time after time has refused to recognize this noble service for humanity by placing the Coast Guard under the pension laws of this country on the same plane as the Army and Navy. The great Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce which has jurisdiction over this subject should bring in a bill and permit the House to grant long-delayed justice to these noble men.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and in full settlement against the Government, the sum of $5,000 to Florence P. Hampton, on account of the death of her husband, Henry Alfred Hampton, who was killed in Calhoun County, Fla., September 6, 1928, while deputized as a prohibition enforcement officer.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

WINSTON W. DAVIS

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 15039) for the relief of Winston W. Davis.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is another bill to pay a postmaster $13,100 for counterfeit war-savings stamps which he cashed. Our friend the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KENDALL] tells me that these counterfeiters were caught and were sent to the penitentiary.

Mr. UNDERHILL. My information may have been incorrect. I understood they had not been apprehended.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KENDALL] tells me they have been sent to the penitentiary.

Mr. UNDERHILL. In this case I understand that is the fact.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit the account of Winston W. Davis, former postmaster at Johnstown, Pa., in the sum of $13,100, being an amount charged in the postal account due to the cashing of war-savings stamps in the year 1924 which were found by the Treasury Department to be counterfeit and charged back to the postmaster's account, for which amount the postmaster was in no way responsible, the loss having occurred without negligence on his part.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CARLISLE COMMISSION CO.

Mr. COMBS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to the bill (H. R. 10774) for the relief of the Carlisle Commission Co., Calendar No. 757.

Mr. SCHAFER. Reserving the right to object, has the Member who made the prior objection withdrawn his objection?

Mr. COMBS. Yes; it is my understanding he has.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 757. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, I want to ask the chairman of the committee if this does not go beyond the limits that the committee has adopted and been proceeding under?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Not at all.

Mr. BLANTON. You are paying $25,000 to one family.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Not to one family; it is for two deaths and one permanent injury, and in that case the injured person had better be dead.

Mr. BLANTON. The committee allows $5,000 for the loss of each life, and here you are paying $10,000 for an injury and $15,000 for loss of life and for personal suffering.

Mr. UNDERHILL. No; not for personal suffering.

Mr. BLANTON. The bill indicates that.

Mr. UNDERHILL. My colleague [Mr. COCHRAN of Pennsylvania] has devoted much time and attention to the study of this case and the mass of evidence, although I am perfectly familiar with it myself——

Mr. BLANTON (interrupting). Then this is not an enlargement of the committee's rule?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Not at all; it is the most harrowing case that was ever brought before the committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is a bill to credit the account of a postmaster with $14,224.37 on account of stamps lost in a burglary. This is just one of the scores of such bills. The Post Office Department has a rule, and it is very liberal and generous to postmasters, whereby it protects them when they conrply with the regulations. When they do not comply with the regulations, the Post Office Department turns them down. These bills are coming to us by the score from all over the country. The postmasters get lax and have improper employees under them, and the stamps disappear and then the Congress is asked to reimburse a postmaster.

Mr. SCHAFER. But those stamps were not lost; they were stolen in a burglary of the post office.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; but sometimes these burglaries occur in the building at lunch time, with safes improperly locked, and sometimes they occur in the afternoon, when the regulations of the department require them to be properly taken care of at all times.

Mr. UNDERHILL. In this instance, and in practically all instances the committee has reported all of the regulations and the rules of the department have been complied with.

Mr. BLANTON. Were they in this case?

Mr. UNDERHILL. They were.

Mr. BLANTON. If they were in this case, I have no objection, but the postmasters of the country ought to be given to understand that they must comply with the rules, or that Congress is not going to relieve them.

Mr. UNDERHILL. What the postmasters of the country ought to have is an armed guard there all of the time.

Mr. BLANTON. They ought to watch and properly protect the property that belongs to the people.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman would not expect the postmaster to stand over his safe at night with a machine gun?

Mr. BLANTON. No; but I would expect him to properly lock the safe and put the combination on it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit the accounts of Matthias R. Munson, postmaster at Prairie du Chien, Wis., in the sum of $14,224.37, due to the United States on account of stamps lost in the burglary of the post office at Prairie du Chien, Wis., September 12, 1925.

Chatcuff, storekeeper, first class, United States Navy, so as to restore to him the rating of storekeeper, first class, from July 15, 1926, to February 21, 1928, with the pay of that rating during this period, and so as to have such period of time computed as time served in the Navy in an active-duty status."

ADJOURNMENT OVER

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, considerable progress has been made to-day in the consideration of the Private Calendar, so that all bills that were reported more than a week ago have been called. Those Members who have been specially following these bills have about reached the limit of the bills they have thus far had an opportunity to study. I think, therefore, that we should not go further with the calendar to-day. I wish to say that it is my hope and purpose to have at least two or three more days hereafter on which these bills may have a fair opportunity to be considered.

Mr. Speaker, I now ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LAUNCHING OF SCOUT CRUISER "SALT LAKE CITY"

Mr. THATCHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to be allowed to extend my remarks in the RECORD touching the launching of the scout cruiser Salt Lake City at Camden, N. J., on last Wednesday, and to include as part of my remarks the address delivered on that occasion by the Secretary of the Navy, Hon. Curtis D. Wilbur.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. THATCHER. Mr. Speaker, on last Wednesday, the 23d of this month, there was launched at the yards of the New York Shipbuilding Co., in Camden, N. J., the U. S. scout cruiser Salt Lake City.

This event was notable for many reasons. Particularly, it emphasized the return of our Nation to a naval construction program that has been held in a state of suspended animation since the Washington limitation-of-naval-armaments treaty. While, under that treaty, the tonnage and armament of this cruiser have been limited, yet this practical beginning of the work of carrying into effect the policy of further naval construction, is most heartening. The Salt Lake City is the first of eight 10,000-ton cruisers, which we are building under existing congressional authorization; and it is to be hoped that pending legislation providing for the construction of 15 additional cruisers of like construction, and one airplane carrier, may be shortly enacted. If and when such additional authorization and construction may be effected, all told, our Navy will yet be below its prescribed ratio of 5–5–3 fixed by the Washington conference. How, then, can there be raised any valid objection to the construction of these additional cruisers? A failure to provide, in a reasonable manner, for our national defense, is an act of omission which can not be excused. Such failure not only invites trouble, but leaves us at the greatest disadvantage when trouble arises. Our country is no longer insulated, and it must not be permitted to become impotent.

We have legitimate interests in every sea and in every quarter of the globe; and the moral worth of an adequate naval force will serve to provide and insure—without the necessity of a recourse to arms—protection to these interests.

I do not mean to advocate any blind or unlimited program of naval construction. What is being done, and what is now proposed in Congress in the way of a naval construction program, are features of what I believe to be a wise and reasonable policy—a policy that is inspired neither by the spirit of jingoism nor by that of pacifism, but, alone, by the spirit of sound Americanism.

The sight of this new cruiser—slim, graceful, and fleet as a thoroughbred racer—as it smoothly slipped from the sheds into the tidal waters of the Delaware River was most inspiring; and as one who in Congress had supported the necessary legislation and voted for the necessary appropriations which made this launching possible, I was greatly gratified.

A distinguished figure in evidence on this occasion was our able and patriotic Secretary of the Navy, Hon. Curtis D. Wilbur, and in his address, then and there delivered, he dealt with the subject of adequate defense so concisely and effectively that I believe his speech is well worthy of a place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; and under leave granted me to do so, I include it as a part of these remarks:

ADDRESS OF THE HON. CURTIS D. WILBUR AT THE LAUNCHING OF THE U. S. S. "SALT LAKE CITY," CAMDEN, N. J., JANUARY 23, 1929

The launching of the Salt Lake City is significant, as it is the first posttreaty cruiser to be launched by the United States. Its tonnage and its armament are limited by a treaty with the great naval powers. If we were to build the type of cruiser most needed by the United States its tonnage would be 40,000 instead of 10,000 tons, and its guns would discharge 2,100-pound projectiles instead of 250 pounds, such as the Saratoga, which was building in this yard at the time of the limitation of naval armament, one of whose guns was vastly more powerful than all of the guns of the Salt Lake City combined. The war and the Washington treaty left us with an unbalanced fleet. This was because of the exigencies due to the submarine war. We abandoned cruiser construction and devoted all our shipbuilding activities to the construction of a vast merchant marine, which we expected to be sunk by submarines, and a great number of destroyers and submarines to protect our transports and the Allied merchant marine. We still have these destroyers and submarines, but with the lapse of time they are rapidly approaching obsolescence.

The treaty of Washington required us to scrap all our partly completed battle cruisers, as well as our uncompleted battleships, except the West Virginia and the Colorado, now with the fleet. We did complete ten 6-inch gun cruisers, and this represents our entire cruiser strength of vessels under 20 years of age.

Notwithstanding our shortage in cruisers we have proceeded hesitantly, and even reluctantly, to build new cruisers, not because they are not urgently needed, but because we hoped that either by our example or by further limitation the cost of naval armament to the naval powers might be further reduced.

Other powers to the treaty—Great Britain, Japan, France—however, proceeded to round out their fleets by the construction of the much needed cruisers. We are about to launch our first 8-inch gun cruiser. Great Britain has launched 16 (counting four 7½-inch), Japan 8, France 2, completed. We should regard this construction by these powers as evidence of the greatest possible weight as to the value of and the need of cruisers in national defense. Those who are unwilling to accept the evidence and the judgment of our own officials charged under the Constitution with our national defense, those who discount the official declarations of the President and of his Navy Department, should be persuaded by this tangible evidence, the best possible proof, by other naval powers, as to such need. Nor are we driven to the necessity of inference from actual cruiser construction, however plain and manifest that inference, but we have the most formal and solemn statement of British needs, made in friendly conference at Geneva, that she needs, must have, and is constructing with all reasonable diligence 600,000 tons of cruisers.

The unanimous testimony of all naval authorities thus agrees to the positive need of cruisers.

Conclusive as this expert evidence is, the average layman does not need it, if he is aware of the nature and extent of our world commerce and the utility of cruisers for its protection. Commerce is the economic blood of the Nation, and foreign commerce is as much a part of our circulatory system as interstate and intrastate commerce. We can be bled to death economically as well by severing lines of international commerce as by severing the interstate lines. Prosperity depends upon the maintenance of the whole circulating system.

This cruiser is named for a city remote from the sea, and apparently remote from its interests, and yet, day and night, the commerce of the Orient passes through her portals. It is doubtful if in ancient times, or even in more recent times, the proudest seaport received so great a volume of foreign commerce as now passes the portals of Salt Lake City and Ogden. Nor can we readily appreciate the vast increase in that commerce to be expected in the near future; nor is Utah alone interested. The panacea offered for farm relief is international commerce and disposition of our farm surplus abroad. Naval needs are heeded in Iowa and Nebraska, Dakota, and Minnesota as never before. If we are to have foreign commerce it must be protected, not only upon the high seas but its agents annd emissaries must be protected wherever they may be. Their lives and their property must be secure. It is our policy to do that. Three of our 10 cruisers have visited Central American waters to supplement the 5 obsolete cruisers there, and 6 have visited Chinese waters on this mission.

Some of our enemies at home and abroad have characterized such protection as "dollar diplomacy" and demand that human rights be placed above property rights. We are asked to forego such protection and bring home our citizens to avoid controversy and thus advance human brotherhood. But we may ask, What is brotherhood worth that will not stand actual contact? Without contact, brotherhood is a mere sentiment of no real significance. Brotherhood finds its only real value and expression in working out the problems of actual contact. Modern commerce not only demands such contact and the solution of such problems, but also furnishes the best means for the development of real brotherhood. We have done much and will do more by missionary effort to extend adherence to the teachings of the Prince of Peace, but this development of international interest and contacts by commerce, and the honest and fair conduct of its activities, and the just adjustment of its differences will do more. The real question is not what do we teach, but how do we act. We have no quarrel with those who do not believe in the right of self-defense; with those who feel no obligation to defend helpless women and children; with those who believe it a duty to stand idly by, while ignorance or brutality or hatred destroy their loved ones; but we do deny the right of such to advise or counsel the Nation on its needs for national defense. We deny their competency to measure the means to be used for self-defense.

We can admire the man who will suffer death rather than resist aggression. He pays the penalty for his own folly. But what patience can we have for him when he attempts to disarm those who must and will fight for home and country. For such a man to be thoroughly good, must he add murder to suicide? For to deprive a man of weapons when he is about to fight an armed man is to aid and abet his murder, for such it would be.

It is only by asserting that there will be no more war, no more armed conflict, that we can escape the consequences of disarming our Navy, and yet one of our boys, a marine, Everta Rector, was killed yesterday in Nicaragua. I speak for the man in uniform, not for his ambitions, not for his profession, but for his life, when I say that to the man who has sworn to protect this Nation against all enemies, foreign and domestic, we owe the plain and unmistakable duty of providing him with the means for the performance of his sworn duty, the means for his own protection while so doing. The first duty of a nation, sometimes overlooked or neglected, is that of protecting our protectors. I am speaking not only for the man in uniform to-day but also for your children and grandchildren yet unborn. The life of this ship is 20 years. Most of the men who will man her in 1949 are yet unborn. For them I now give thanks that their fathers and mothers, with their other fellow citizens, have provided for their protection and for the protection of the Nation this splendid ship, with ten 8-inch guns and engines capable of developing over 100,000 horsepower.

SENATE

SATURDAY, January 26, 1929

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Merciful God and Heavenly Father, who hast planted our feet in a world so full of change that we know not what a day may bring forth, and hast curtained every day with night and rounded our little lives with sleep, look with loving pity, we beseech Thee, upon the sorrows of the loved ones and friends of him whom Thou didst but yesterday call to his reward. In the service of his country he bravely upheld the right and generously lived for others' good.

Help us, therefore, to use with all diligence the span of our appointed time, so that when our summons comes we may receive that blessing which Thy well-beloved Son shall then pronounce to all who love and fear Thee, saying, Come, ye blessed children of my Father, receive the kingdom prepared for you from the beginning of the world. Grant this, O Father, through Jesus Christ, our Mediator and Redeemer. Amen.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Thursday last, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

COMPACTS BETWEEN CERTAIN STATES

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, on Thursday I entered a motion to reconsider five bills which had previously been reported from the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation and which had passed the Senate. I explained at the time the reason for requesting their return from the House. The bills have now been returned, and I call up my motion to reconsider the votes by which the bills were ordered to a third reading and passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the motion to reconsider is agreed to, and the Chair lays before the Senate the bills in question.

The bills were read by title, as follows:

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, I ask for action on the amendments of which I gave notice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is upon the adoption of the amendments offered by the Senator from Colorado, to strike from the bills the words "from the Department of the Interior."

Mr. PHIPPS. That is correct.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendments suggested by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] will be considered as having been agreed to, and the bills, as thus amended, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following telegram from the president of the Porto Rico Chamber of Commerce, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SAN JUAN, P. R., January 26, 1929.

UNITED STATES SENATE, Washington, D. C.:

Chamber Commerce, Porto Rico, strongly indorses House bill 13936, increasing $25,000 limit individual loans our local Federal land bank and requests its passage early date. Such action would be important factor economic rehabilitation island from effects recent disastrous cyclone.

DOMENECH, President.

Mr. TYSON presented petitions of sundry citizens of Dyersburg and Humboldt, Tenn., praying for the passage of the bill (S. 4689) to provide for the making of loans to drainage or levee districts, and for other purposes, which were referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation.

ELECTRIC-LIGHT RATES IN CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I desire to detain the Senate for just a few moments to put into the RECORD some statistics in regard to a comparison of electric-light rates in a few places along the Canadian border in Canada and in the United States.

Some one sent me a few days ago a copy of Barron's Financial Weekly of December 3, 1928. The leading article on the front page of this publication had for its burden a demonstration that the hydroelectric commission system of generating and distributing electricity in Ontario, Canada, was a failure; that the people of that Province are tired of it and were about to put it out of business, and that they were all praying for the blessed initiative which comes with the private development and distribution of electricity.

These statements have as a matter of fact no basis of truth to substantiate them. The commission has been killed by representatives of the Power Trust every year for the last 20 years. Since I have been killed so often and am still living, I rather enjoy their predicament. But in the article a demand was made that the way to compare electric-light rates on the United States side of the border and on the Ontario, Canada, side was to get definite bills which were actually paid on both sides or get the bills on one side and figure out the cost for the same amount of electricity on the other side. It seemed to me that that was a fair proposition.

It is said with a great deal of force, I think, that it was not always fair to pick out a favored locality and compare the rates charged there with the rates in some localities not favored by nature. So within the last few days I have gathered together a few actual bills on both sides of the line where the generation and the distribution of electricity takes place under exactly the same physical conditions.

I have a bill from a man who lives in Niagara Falls, N. Y. The Senate will remember that there is a Niagara Falls, N. Y., and there is a Niagara Falls, Canada, just across the river. They are supplied with electricity coming from Niagara Falls. On the American side it is done by private initiative and the efficient methods of private ownership and private distribution and private generation. On the Canadian side it is done by the publicly owned hydroelectric commission. Here is the bill of a man who lives in Niagara Falls, N. Y. The bill is for the month ending January 2, 1929. That is not ancient; it is the last bill he has received. He lives in a 7-room house. He has electric lighting, a vacuum sweeper, an electric iron, an electric washing machine, and an electric range. For the month of December, 1928, he consumed 256 kilowatt-hours of electricity. That is quite a large amount of electricity for a 7-room house. The ordinary consumption of electricity in a house of that size where they use electric lighting only would be between 40 and 45 kilowatt-hours, but having all these electric appliances he consumed in that little modest home 256 kilowatt-hours. He paid a bill for that amount of electricity of $6.44. As rates go in the United States that is a cheap rate. But he had no discount on that bill. That was net. In fact, if he did not pay it within 10 days a 10 per cent penalty was added.

Now let us see what that man would have had to pay for the same amount of electricity for the same service if he had lived just across the line in Niagara Falls, Canada. His bill then would have been $3.28, with a discount of 10 per cent if he paid it within 10 days, making a net bill of $2.96 on the Canadian side as compared with the net bill of $6.44 on the American side for the same service, the power coming from the same water from the same river from the same Niagara Falls.

I have another bill from a man who lives in the same city of Niagara Falls, N. Y. He lives in an 8-room house, and has electric lighting, a vacuum sweeper, an electric iron, an electric washing machine, and an electric range. He consumed for the month of December, 1928, 493 kilowatt-hours of electricity. He paid a bill of $9.64. That is net, with no discount. Had he lived across the river in Niagara Falls, Canada, for the same electricity for the same month, generated from the same water from the same river, he would have had to pay $5.77, with a discount of 10 per cent if he made prompt payment, so that his net payment would have been $5.20—$5.20 on the Canadian side as against $9.64 on the American side.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, perhaps I misunderstood the Senator from Nebraska, but I understood him to say the bill would be $9 plus on the Canadian side and $5 plus on the American side?

Mr. NORRIS. Let me repeat my figures in answer to the question of the Senator from North Carolina. The electricity cost $9.64 on the American side and $5.20 on the Canadian side.

I have here a bill rendered on the Canadian side. This bill is for two months' service. The consumption was 1,130 kilowatt-hours. A gross bill of $12.50 was rendered. If the customer took advantage of the discount of 10 per cent, he would have had to pay $11.25. Had he lived over on the American side, for the same amount of electricity consumed in those two months at the American rate charged in Niagara Falls, N. Y., he would have had to pay $22.22. On the American side he would have had to pay $22.22, and on the Canadian side he would have had to pay $11.25.

Here is the bill of a photographer. His place of business is Niagara Falls, N. Y. He consumed for the month for which this bill was rendered 224 kilowatt-hours, and he paid a bill of $7.60. If his place of business had been just across the river in Canada, and he had secured his electricity from the publicly owned hydroelectric commission service, and had taken advantage of the 10 per cent discount for prompt payment, his bill would have been $2.69—$2.69 on the Canadian side as against $7.60 on the American side.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, why is it that such a great difference exists at the two places, one just across the river from the other?

Mr. NORRIS. In the one case, on the Canadian side, the generation and distribution of electricity is a public enterprise, while on the other side, the American side, it is a private enterprise. It can be produced, however, just as cheaply on the American side as it is produced on the Canadian side.

Mr. HEFLIN. If I understand the Senator from Nebraska correctly, then the rate paid on the American side, just across the river, for the same service is three times, or a little more than three times, the rate on the Canadian side?

Mr. NORRIS. It is about twice the cost on the Canadian side.

Niagara Falls, N. Y., is pointed to as one of the places where, under our method of producing and distributing electricity, one may get cheap electricity. I have referred to the article in Barron's Financial Weekly, in which it was said comparisons should be made of actual service and actual prices under the same conditions. It would be difficult to find places where conditions are more similar than in those I have given, but I can give another instance where the conditions, perhaps, are even more similar. In the city of Hamilton, Ontario, a city of about 125,000 people, some of the people are served by the hydroelectric publicly owned commission and others of the people are served by a private corporation, which was doing business in the city prior to the commencement of the hydroelectric publicly owned commission service. The top rate for domestic service in Hamilton is 2 cents a kilowatt-hour for the first 60 kilowatts; for all over that the rate is 1 cent a kilowatt-hour. The private company is supplying its patrons with electricity at the same rate as is the publicly owned system. By the way, a year or two ago I saw the report of the manager of that privately owned concern to the stockholders, in which he gave rather a glowing account of the prosperity and financial condition of the concern. They were making money. That is a demonstration that the privately owned companies can produce and distribute electricity cheaper than they are producing and selling it to the people of the United States. That is one of the reasons, as shown by the evidence adduced by the Federal Trade Commission in the investigation now going on, for the enormous profits of the Power Trust, enabling it to spend literally millions of dollars for propaganda purposes.

But let us make another comparison along the border. In this case the hydroelectric commission does not enter into the equation. Along the Minnesota boundary line between America and Canada is located, on the American side, International Falls. There is a bridge there. The river is the boundary. The bridge crosses to Canada, where there is a town named Fort Francis. There is a dam right at the bridge, owned by the Backus interests, with which many Senators are somewhat familiar. It is true that to comply with the Canadian law they had to incorporate on the Canadian side, so there are two corporations—one on the Canadian side and the other on the American side—but both of them are entirely owned by Backus and his associates on the American side. They distribute electricity to International Falls and South International Falls, which adjoins International Falls, and a little town called Ranier, that is within a mile or two of International Falls. The same private corporation sells electricity to the town of Fort Francis, Canada, but there the electricity is distributed through a municipally owned distributing plant. I might add that both on the Canadian side and on the American side this corporation has steam stand-by plants to help out during periods of low water. Let us see what the rates are. Incidentally I might remark as I go along that this privately owned plant sells to the Canadian town of Fort Francis very cheap electricity. It sells them their electricity at $14 per horsepower per year, which is a very cheap rate. The question might be asked, Why does this concern sell the electricity so cheaply on the Canadian side? It is because Fort Francis is in Ontario, where the hydroelectric commission operates, and the consumers there would be able to hook in with the hydroelectric system and get cheap electricity in that way. So the privately owned concern meets that competition, comes down in its price, and can make money when it is doing so.

Now, let us see what the rates are there. In Fort Francis, Canada, they charge a flat rate for light, regardless of how much may be consumed, of 3 cents per kilowatt-hour, with a minimum charge of 60 cents. They supply electricity for heat at 1 cent per kilowatt-hour, with a minimum charge of $1. They have a sliding scale for power purposes, starting with 3 cents per kilowatt-hour for the first hundred kilowatts, 2½ cents for the next hundred, 2 cents for the third hundred, and 1½ cents per kilowatt-hour for all over 300, with a minimum charge of $1.50. Now, let us see what the rates are at South International Falls, just across the river on the American side. The rates there are the same for light, heat, and power; for the first 60 kilowatts, 12 cents per kilowatt-hour; for the next 120 kilowatts, 11 cents; for the next 540 kilowatts, 9½ cents; all over 720 kilowatts, 8 cents. Those are the rates for South International Falls.

The service is a little cheaper at International Falls, which adjoins South International Falls. For the first 60 kilowatts the rate is 10 cents per kilowatt-hour; for the next 120 kilowatts, 9 cents per kilowatt-hour; for the next 540 kilowatts, 7½ cents per kilowatt-hour; for all over 720 kilowatts, 6 cents per kilowatt-hour. Those are the rates in International Falls.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, is the Senator in both cases referring to the price paid by the consumer?

Mr. NORRIS. I am referring to the price paid by the consumer.

Mr. SIMMONS. In both cases?

Mr. NORRIS. In both cases.

At Ranier, a mile or two away, the same private Backus Co. charges the following rates: For the first 60 kilowatt-hours, 13 cents per kilowatt-hour; for the next 120 kilowatt-hours, 12 cents per kilowatt-hour; for the next 540 kilowatt-hours, 10 cents per kilowatt-hour; for all over 720 kilowatt-hours, 9 cents per kilowatt-hour.

I have here some bills rendered consumers on both sides of the river. I have first a bill rendered to a consumer on the Canadian side taking electricity from the publicly owned municipal plant, the electricity coming from the same dam and from the same river and owned by the same people who furnish the power on the American side. Here is the bill of the Royal Theater in Fort Francis for light for one month. They consumed 60 kilowatt-hours and their bill was $1.80. Had that theater been operating just across the river on the American side and had it consumed the same amount of electricity in that month its bill would have been $7.20—$1.80 on the Canadian side where there is a publicly owned distributing plant, as against $7.20 on the American side where the plant is owned by a private corporation, with blessed private initiative in complete control. That bill was for light.

The same theater—the Royal Theater, of Fort Francis—took electricity for heating purposes from the municipally owned distributing plant. I do not mean to say that the theater was heated with the electricity the year around, but only during the evenings in the summer, when in that region it was too cold without heat, or in the early fall or late spring. For that same month the theater consumed 175 kilowatt-hours of electricity for heating purposes and paid $1.75 for it. If it had been on the American side and consumed an equal amount for such purpose it would have had to pay $16.35.

Here is the bill of a consumer on the American side who consumed during the month 44 kilowatt-hours. I presume the bill was for light only, although it does not so say. The rate on the American side is the same for light, heat, and power. The consumer in this instance had to pay $4.40 for 44 kilowatt-hours. He got a discount, so that his net bill was $3.96. Had he been over on the Canadian side, at Fort Francis, he would have had to pay—this was for light—$1.32. If it had been for heat he would have had to pay $1. If it had been for power he would have had to pay $1.32.

Here is a bill, now, over in South International Falls, which adjoins International Falls on the American side. This man consumed 31 kilowatt-hours. He paid a net bill, after getting his discount, of $3.35 for 31 kilowatt-hours of electricity. If he had been on the Canadian side, for light—and this bill was for light—he would have had to pay 91 cents instead of $3.35. If it had been for heat, he would have had to pay $1. If it had been for power, he would have had to pay $1.50.

Here is a bill from Ranier, almost adjoining International Falls. The consumer consumed 14 kilowatt-hours of electricity. You will notice that these people on the American side consume very small amounts of electricity. They have not sweepers and ironers and washers and electric ranges. They have no electric fans, because electricity is too expensive. This man consumed only 14 kilowatt-hours, and he paid a net bill of $1.64 for it. If he had been across the river in Canada, and if this bill was for light, he would have had to pay 60 cents. That is the minimum over there. He would not have consumed enough to come up to the minimum. If it was for heat, he would have had to pay $1, because he had not come up to the minimum. If it had been for power, he would have paid $1.50. I think it is fair to assume that all these bills are for light only, because the amount is so small. So, assuming that this bill was for light, on the Canadian side he would have paid 60 cents and on the American side he actually paid $1.64.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the American plants referred to by the Senator are in the State of New York, are they not?

Mr. NORRIS. No; these that I have just been comparing are at International Falls, Minn., and Fort Francis, Canada. They are away up along the northwestern boundary of Minnesota, where, the Senator will remember, quite a number of years ago Congress passed a bill permitting the Backus people to build a dam at International Falls. This electricity on both sides of the river is generated from the dam that we authorized that corporation to construct.

Mr. HEFLIN. The plants referred to earlier in the Senator's speech are in the State of New York?

Mr. NORRIS. Those plants are at Niagara Falls, in the State of New York; yes, sir.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat, I think he referred to one case where the consumption was 256 kilowatt-hours.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. BLAINE. I did not get the charge that was made in Canada and the charge that was made for that amount of electricity in the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. I can give the Senator that information.

That was the bill of a man who lived in Niagara Falls, N. Y., for the month of December, 1928. He lives in a 7-room house. He has electric lighting, a vacuum sweeper, an electric iron, an electric washing machine, and an electric range. He consumed during that month 256 kilowatt-hours. His bill was $6.44, from which there is no discount. If he did not pay it promptly, 10 per cent was added as a penalty. If he had lived across the river in Niagara Falls, Canada, and consumed during that month the same amount of electricity, his net bill, after getting the benefit of a 10 per cent discount for prompt payment, would have been $2.96.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I desire to call his attention to a situation that is much more aggravated than the comparison he has made.

In my own State a farmer who consumed 256 kilowatt-hours in December, 1928, for light for the house, barn, and other buildings, power for washing machine, ironing, milking machine, cream separators, feed grinder, and electricity for a small electric range would have paid, if he had consumed 256 kilowatt-hours—and I am figuring this from an actual contract—$26.50, made up of these two items: $24.17 for the electric consumption, and then a surcharge equal to the amount allowed to the utility as a return of 7 per cent upon $400 made as an advancement, which would be $2.33 per month, making a total of $26.50 for the consumption of 256 kilowatt-hours.

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Senator from Wisconsin for the information he has given us; and for his benefit I think I ought to say that it would be very easy to give many instances of greater glaring discrepancies between electricity in the United States and Canada. I explained when I began, however, that I am following a suggestion made in Barron's Weekly Financial Review in which they condemn the Ontario system and say that it is about to go out of business and say that we ought to compare places that are under exactly the same conditions. Hence I have taken only those places, and I have done this within the last three or four days. I could get hundreds of others; but the instance, for example, of Niagara Falls, N. Y., is a place where, as electricity goes in the United States, they have very cheap rates; and yet I have taken those cheap rates, among the cheapest that can be found anywhere in the United States, and compared them with the rates charged by the publicly owned system just across the river, and the results are as I have given them.

CONDITIONS OF INDIANS IN UNITED STATES

Mr. PINE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article in the current issue of Good Housekeeping. This article is written by Vera L. Connolly, and is entitled "The Cry of a Broken People." It contains information regarding the treatment received by the Indian wards of the Government.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is here printed, as follows:

THE CRY OF A BROKEN PEOPLE—A STORY OF INJUSTICE AND CRUELTY THAT IS AS TERRIBLE AS IT IS TRUE

By Vera L. Connolly

(On, and ever on! That has been the story of the Indian ever since the white man began to covet his lands. To-day, when he can be driven no farther, he is oppressed, mistreated, robbed, starved. Shall we allow this injustice to continue until the Indian is gone forever? The answer is with us.)

The solemnity of that roomful! Never shall I forget it!

It was in the Indian pueblo of Taos, N. Mex., in July, 1928. A council of grave import was being held for us by the headmen of the tribe.

All around the bare, whitewashed walls ran a narrow seat. On this we sat, tense and waiting, a few palefaces in a long line of silent, dignified Indian men.

In a corner by the fireplace stood a table with a small lamp. Beside this sat the Indian "governor" of the pueblo—a man of majestic stillness, with a hawk face and quietly folded arms. He wore a shirt of faded red that glowed softly in the lamplight. His hair hung forward over his shoulders in two braids twisted with colored strands. Near him, crouching on the floor, respectful, silent, was the Indian interpreter.

In a rear room huddled the women and young girls. They had greeted us when we arrived with the gracious gestures of an ancient race. Then, soft voiced, charming in their vivid shawls, they had quietly withdrawn. The council is not for Indian women.

The room after that had commenced rapidly to fill with sober-faced Indian men. Like Arabs they had come slipping in, swathed in their white cotton blankets, and had taken their seats solemnly around the wall. Now every inch of the encircling seat was occupied. And the doorway was filled with shrouded figures, beyond whom, on the moonlit desert without, we could faintly discern a throng of other still forms.

The seated men had thrown off their white blankets, and the room glowed with the soft colors of their shirts—faded blue, sage green, pale vermilion. Some wore turquoise earrings and a few had about their necks strings of old Indian jewelry—wampum, coral, and silver beads—in some cases the owner's sole wealth. For though self-supporting and of regal dignity, these were poor Indians.

Presently the governor raised his hand. The council began.

He first addressed the Indians, speaking in the native tongue. He told them that we, their white visitors, had heard in New York City that all was not well with the Indian people, wards of our Nation. We had come out to the West to learn if these rumors of misery and injustice were true.

When he had finished speaking the interpreter repeated the words to us in English. And again a sober silence fell. Outside on the moonlit rooftops an Indian drum sounded softly, and then a low, minor chanting began and drifted in at the doorway.

Suddenly, one by one, the Indians commenced to speak. They spoke heatedly, rapidly, with gestures. Yet their passion was so restrained that no voice ever rose above a tense monotone. Each addressed the governor, who in turn asked the interpreter to translate for us.

It was a passionate plea for just one thing—better treatment of Indian children in the Government boarding schools. The other wrongs the race may have suffered in the past at our hands—loss of lands, water rights, and personal freedom—obviously signified nothing in their eyes compared to the sufferings of the 27,000 Indian children in the Government boarding schools to-day.

These children, it was explained to us, are taken forcibly from their mothers' arms, as early as 6 years of age in some Indian communities, and sent away to distant boarding schools to stay till 18. There they are underfed, roughly treated, and required to work half of every day at hard industrial labor in the fields or in the laundry, in addition to the half day of school.

It was a story of frightened, lonely, hungry, exhausted childhood they told. Of children poorly housed in crowded dormitories, with so little protection against disease that infections rage through the schools. Of children cruelly overworked. Of children so underfed that they snatch like famished little animals at plates of bread. Of children struck and thrown into the school "jails" for infringement of minor rules.

And these statements coincided with the rumors that has caused the editor of Good Housekeeping to send me West, to the Indians themselves, to ascertain the facts.

The governor told of visiting one of these schools himself in May, 1928, and finding the food not only insufficient in quantity but of the wrong kind for growing children forced to do hard work.

THE CHILDREN ARE HUNGRY

Another Indian, Alvino Lujan, described his visit to the Santa Fe School in 1928:

"I sat down to supper with the little boys," he said, "and when the bread arrived the boys grabbed all of it, yet were still hungry. No more was served them. I asked for some bread for myself and was given two thin slices. But when it came the little boy beside me kept staring so at my bread—he was so pitiful—I turned my head away. When I looked around again my bread was gone.

"At breakfast the same thing happened. The boys snatched the bread as though half starved. I went to San Ildefonso pueblo and asked some bread from the Indians and took it to the hungry boys at the school. All this is wrong! Those children work very hard! The night I slept there one boy was awakened at midnight to go out and work on some machinery."

A third Indian—Juan Archuleta—declared that the main meal at noon, when he visited the Santa Fe School in 1927, consisted of "gravy, a kind of tea just like water, and some bread and sirup." And "the boys did not have enough of this," he added. "They left the table hungry."

Antonio Mirabal, the interpreter—a man with a fine, thoughtful face—told with quiet compassion of his visit to the Albuquerque School in March, 1927. "Breakfast was oat meal with sirup, bread and coffee. The boys rushed for it. There was not nearly enough. So I ate nothing. I wanted them to have it all."

When the men had finally ceased speaking, some of the boys, home on vacation, told timidly of their treatment in the schools. Again it was a tale of loneliness, overwork, undernourishment, and brutal discipline. How tragic, thought the writer, for this cruelty to be inflicted on the boys and girls of a race noted for its love of children! One may wander all day about an Indian pueblo, up and down the ladders, in and out of the quaint, many-storied house, and never see a child struck or hear a harsh word spoken to it. Indian women, if one of their number scolds a child, derisively call her "white woman." Firm discipline of childhood, yes. That is to be found in the Indian household. But it is not the rule of fist and boot.

"The disciplinarian closed the door," said Fernando Romero, a schoolboy, in describing the punishment meted to him at the Santa Fe boarding school, because of a misunderstanding over the washing of some shirts, "and grabbed hold of my neck and tried to choke me. Then he struck my mouth, and it began to bleed. Then he grabbed me again and knocked my head against the door and told me to go back to work. I couldn't eat for two days, my mouth was so swollen."

Other boys told of the cruel jails at the schools; of little boys of 12 forced to dig ditches and do other work too hard for them; of boys hit in the face for coming late to work; of the terrible food—usually oatmeal, sirup, bread, and coffee for breakfast; gravy and bread, potatoes and tea for dinner; and beans and bread and tea for supper. And never, never enough!

Leaving the council room, the writer slipped back for a word with the shy girls in the rear part of the house. They told a similar story, describing the long, exhausting hours in sewing room and laundry before the school day began. Girls were roughly punished, too; sometimes struck; sometimes made to kneel on the floor in the hall all night for being late to work.

Several girls had tubercular coughs.

"They never sick till they go away to boarding school," said a woman, with quiet despair, in broken English.

I recalled then some of the statements in the official reports I had recently seen—that the Indian boarding schools are overcrowded, unsanitary, and foul with two diseases—turberculosis, a gift of the white race to the Indian people, and trachoma, an eye disease closely connected with malnutrition.

I had read that often healthy children were brought to these schools and, after being subjected to years of hunger, unkindness, overwork, and infection, sent home dying of tuberculosis or half blind with trachoma to infect their helpless families and communities.

Could these things be? In the United States of America?

THEIR HOPE IS IN US

I returned to the council room. The meeting was over, and we departed, promising to tell white Americans—parents themselves—what the Indian child is suffering in the boarding schools, and promising to make a plea that day schools on the reservations be substituted for these distant boarding schools.

When we passed out the door the white-robed, Arablike forms fell back respectfully, and we walked between them across the plaza, upon which the centuries-old houses look down, to our waiting automobile.

As we drove away over the moonlit desert plateau we looked back at the Sacred Mountain, with ancient Taos pueblo crouching at its foot. From the roof tops there still reached us faintly the chanting of the singers. It was buoyant, confident singing! It was a song of good hope, explained one who was with us—a hope that the council meeting had not been in vain.

In the weeks that followed, the writer of this article visited many groups of Indians, not only in New Mexico but in Arizona, Colorado, Oregon, Washington, and Wisconsin. In all these States and in California, she also studied every official report she was able to obtain. Besides, she interviewed prominent white men and women who for years have been quietly battling for the Indian people.

Partly as a result of her own fleeting observations, but chiefly through her interviews and study of authentic reports, among them the one submitted a year ago by the Institute for Government Research after a 15 months' investigation made at the request of the Secretary of the Interior, the writer found abundant verification of all that had been claimed in the Taos Council regarding the boarding schools. And she also discovered that this wrong being done the Indian people is but one of many!

Gaunt poverty is apparent on almost all reservations to-day. And so is hunger. And so is contagious disease. And so is complete subjugation of person and property. Although all Indians to-day are citizens, made such in recognition of their voluntary service during the World War, the Indian Bureau, which for 70 years has had despotic control over the Indians, pronounces 225,000 of them "incompetent." This bureau regards its acts as not subject to court review.

To quote from Congressman JAMES A. FREAR, of Wisconsin, in a recent issue of Plain Talk:

"The Indian Bureau holds itself above the law, and in the disposition of property belonging to 'incompetent' Indians considers that its acts are not reviewable by the courts. This arbitrary stand makes it impossible for the 225,000 'incompetent' Indians to prevent the wholesale wasting of their property. More than $90,000,000 in cash and securities and more than $1,600,000,000 in land and personal property belonging to Indians are under the exclusive control of the Indian Bureau, while the owners of the property are denied any voice in its disposal and often refused any share of the proceeds. As an inevitable consequence, the property of the Indians has literally been looted to the extent of millions of dollars."

SLAVERY STILL EXISTS

The American Indian can not sell his own lands. He can not worship in his own way. He can not rear his own children. If he leaves the reservation without permission, he can be tried by a "judge" appointed by the agent and thrown into jail for any length term in ball and chain. For him there is no jury trial unless he has been specifically charged with one of eight major crimes named in Federal law; in the latter case he may demand and get trial in the Federal courts, though the bureau controls his money for hiring attorneys and his choice of attorneys. For all other cases, for crimes and misdemeanors named or unnamed in law, or for simple disagreements with bureau officials the Indian may be and is arrested without warrant, imprisoned without (a) trial in any court of record; (b) advice of counsel; (c) right to be confronted by accuser or to compel attendance of witnesses; or (d) any right of court review. The Indian agent carries out the whole process—or an "Indian judge" appointed by the agent and paid $11 a month carries it out. There is no limit in any law of Congress to the amount of fine or length of imprisonment.

Virtual slaves, in a land where slavery was abolished years ago, victims of horrible diseases the whites have brought but will not bother to cure, deprived of the children they have borne, hungry and in despair, thousands of our Indian citizens present a spectacle that touches the heart.

"If Harriet Beecher Stowe were here," said Congressman FREAR before a Senate committee, on his return from a 4,500-mile trip at his own expense to 20 reservations, "she could write a story far worse than anything that ever appeared in Uncle Tom's Cabin."

The writer of this article found that the information she was obtaining was of three sorts—personal wrongs, maladministration of property, and suggestions as to a solution of the Indian problem. She has, therefore, prepared three articles, one devoted to each of these phases.

This first article will deal with the personal wrongs.

The maltreatment of the Indian child has already been touched upon, and will be referred to again later in this article.

Next, there is the dire poverty of the Indians. For most of them are poor, bitterly poor. A few tribes have discovered oil on their arid lands, and the sudden wealth of these has created the public impression that all Indians to-day are prospering. This is a mistake. Most of them are extremely poor. Some are starving.

Next to the threat of starvation, our greatest crime against the Indians to-day is our gross neglect of their health. This is of tragic importance. Not only is a lovable, picturesque race dying of contagious diseases we have bestowed on it—the Indian death rate increased 62 per cent from 1921 through 1925—but in dying the Indians are unconsciously wreaking on us, their white conquerors, a grim revenge for our century and a half of cruelty and neglect. For to-day many Indian settlements threaten to become dangerous sources of infection from which contagious diseases will spread to the surrounding white communities.

Such is the sober warning sounded in the institute report. It is the statement of all recent investigators. And it is my earnest warning, fleeting as were my glimpses, in six States of Indian life.

At Walpi, an ancient sky town of crazy, picturesque stone houses flung up in wild beauty against the heavens atop a mesa, or rock island, rising sheer from the Arizona desert, I saw a gifted people so afflicted with a virulent skin disease (impetigo) that some faces were literally covered with scabs. It is here that the famous snake dance is held, to which tourists flock from all over the world. The danger to the white race is obvious. And so is the needlessness of the situation. We are told in the Reference Handbook of the Medical Sciences that treatment of impetigo is simple and effective. It consists of "removal of the crusts by soaking in olive oil * * * after which an application of a 5 to 10 per cent ointment of ammoniated mercury completes the healing in a few days." Why were those Indians not receiving this treatment?

At Zuni, in the home of the pueblos' governor, while I listened to a story of contaminated drinking water, dysentery, and a reservation doctor who would not pay vists to sick Indians, I saw a young mother anxiously looking down into the face of the terribly sick baby in her arms. The child was covered with a scabby disease.

At Hotavilla, an Indian pueblo on the Arizona desert, I stopped to witness a ceremonial dance in the plaza. It was a colorful scene. The partly naked men dancers were painted and hung with green sprigs and animal skins; their heads were encased in grotesque masks; they carried gourd rattles which they shook as they danced. On the roof tops sat the Indian women, one blaze of color in mantas, kerchiefs, and shawls. And thronging the narrow street were white tourists under vivid parasols. Yet within 10 feet of me, in that crowd of Indians, I observed four women and five children in advanced stages of trachoma. This village is a favorite haunt of tourists.

TUBERCULOSIS RAGES UNCHECKED

As for tuberculosis—it was appallingly in evidence in all Indian settlements I visited, especially on the Bad River Indian Reservation in Wisconsin. Even on the blazing Arizona desert it seemed to me to be raging. Figures prove that my impression was correct, as the tuberculosis death rate among Arizona Indians is seventeen times the general rate for the country as a whole. This is partly due to the children returning from the boarding schools infected and giving tuberculosis to the adults.

Statistics show that the medical service provided by the Indian Bureau is hopelessly inadequate in virtually all Indian communities. In some settlements there is none at all. As a result 21 per cent of the Indians, or more than 60,000, have trachoma. And the average Indian death rate in the country as a whole is two and one-fourth times that of the general population.

At Pine Ridge, S. Dak., an investigator recently discovered two physicians serving 7,800 Indians scattered over 2,400 square miles. In the western Navajo jurisdiction one serves 8,000 Indians scattered over 5,000 square miles. At Soboba, in southern California, Dr. Allan F. Gillihan, who was making a survey for the State board of health, found one doctor serving 1,500 Indians, his territory extending 100 miles to the east of the hospital and 25 miles to the west and south. Doctor Gillihan had previously surveyed conditions in northeastern California. He offered the following conclusions regarding the California Indians:

"1. That the ill treatment of the Indians during the past 70 years has resulted in reducing the population from over 100,000 to about 17,300. * * *

"2. That the Indians are now living a hand-to-mouth existence.

"(a) In houses not fit to live in.

"(b) Upon land that is useless.

"(c) Without water.

"3. That they are not receiving an education worthy of the name.

"4. That a great deal of sickness exists among them and they are receiving absolutely no care.

"5. That they are not receiving any advice, assistance, or encouragement in their business dealings with the outside world or in the personal side of their lives or in the lives and health of their families."

At Odanah, Wis., on the Bad River Reservation, the writer talked to a number of Chippewa Indians and to two white missionaries. All declared health conditions on the reservation unspeakably bad.

"According to Government statistics," said W. H. Thompson, the Methodist missionary, "over 60 per cent on this reservation have venereal disease. Tuberculosis is rife here as well. I've been here four years, and 80 per cent of my funerals have been over tuberculosis victims. No effort is made to check these diseases. We have no doctor. We have no hospital. Conditions are pitiable!"

And Rev. E. P. Wheeler, a noted missionary and lifelong friend of the Chippewas, had this to say of the Bad River Reservation:

"Things are seriously, horribly wrong here. The reservation seems wide open to liquor and prostitution. Venereal disease is rampant."

MEDICAL SERVICE IS IMPERATIVE

Sometimes it is claimed that a good medical service would be wasted on the Indians, that they would not make use of it. Congressman FREAR quotes as follows Dr. Frances Sage Bradley, director of the State Division of Child Welfare, Montana. She is speaking of the Blackfeet Indians:

"Pathetic and hopeless is the physical condition of young children and the eagerness of the mothers for help. We have held what we call children's conferences on various reservations, and men and women have sledded their children 35 and 40 miles in snow on a level with their roofs, with the thermometer 14 below zero, to find out how to cure rickets, trachoma, tuberculosis * * * I want to state that nothing but a prompt, vigorous, baby-saving campaign can prevent the extermination of the Blackfeet."

If we wonder at this high mortality rate among the Blackfeet, perhaps we can find the explanation of it in the testimony given in 1927 before the Senate Indian Affairs Committee by William Madison, who had just returned from the Fort Peck, Blackfeet, and Flathead Reservations in Montana.

He tells of old Indians living in tents in the bitter cold, with no food but the flesh of horses found on the town dump or killed by passing trains. He describes one old woman who was refused food and help by the agent, the latter telling her to drown out gophers for meat to eat. He cites the case of a woman whose child died eight days after birth, and who, while the child was still in the coffin, and with the thermometer at 30° below zero, was ordered with her husband to vacate the house, the exposure making her a hopeless invalid.

Hunger! Sickness! Maltreatment! They are to be found, apparently, in some form, from the Canadian border to the Pima Reservation in Arizona!

At Riverside, Calif., the writer interviewed the gallant, silver-haired white woman, Mrs. Stella M. Atwood, who is gratefully called "mother" to-day by Indians all over the United States. It was Mrs. Atwood who, in 1921, at the Salt Lake convention of the General Federation of Women's Clubs, informed the club women of America of the tragic plight of the Indian people. She was assisted in her plea by Mrs. Gertrude Bonnin, a beautiful and cultivated Indian woman. And so eloquently did the two plead that there was created the Indian welfare division of the general federation, with Mrs. Atwood at its head.

The torch Mrs. Atwood lighted was caught up by John Collier, already a student of the subject and a publicist, and thrust up before the public gaze. For over seven years these two pioneers have fought—Mrs. Atwood with the club women of America as a mighty force behind her, John Collier as executive secretary of the American Indian Defense Association. They have fought in season and out, at home and abroad, in Congress, among the Indians, among the whites. And they have blocked some of the most vicious legislation of recent years designed to rob the Indians.

An epitome of courage, strength, and motherly kindness, of all that is best in womanhood, Mrs. Atwood sat facing the writer in Riverside last August, telling of pitiable conditions among the Indians to-day.

"The health service," she declared, "is atrocious! Indian reservation doctors are, for the most part, derelicts. I found four doctors who were dope fiends the first month I was in this work, nearly eight years ago."

Many of the doctors, she went on to say, while not dope fiends or liquor addicts, are callously indifferent. Frequently they refuse flatly to respond to a summons. She cited an instance. A doctor on the Navajo Reservation in 1927 refused point-blank to drive 40 miles at night, with some white people who had come for him, to attend a Navajo woman dying of hemorrhages after childbirth.

FOOD FOR THIS STARVING PEOPLE

"But the first, the crying need of our Indians to-day," Mrs. Atwood exclaimed, and tears sprang suddenly to her eyes, "is food! Simply enough food to satisfy the pangs of semistarvation! About five years ago I was invited out to Arizona, to Sacaton, where the Indians and whites were celebrating San Carlos day. The agent—there are kind subordinate officials in the Indian Service as well as the other sort—was giving the Indians a feast that day, consisting of frijoles, beef, coffee, and bread.

"I walked with him to the place where the food was. And when I saw the Indians coming out with hungry, eager faces, and trembling hands, I exclaimed, 'Why, these Indians are famished!' He said, 'Yes; this is the only full meal they'll get during the year.' These were the Pima Indians, gentlemen and gentlewomen. Their proud boast is that they have never shed a drop of paleface blood. In the early days they always succored the whites, taking them into their homes when dying of thirst and nursing them to health.

"These Indians were starving because the whites had taken their water from them on the upper reaches of the Gila River. The Government had built a storage dam but had failed to put any laterals down to the Indian land. So for three successive years the Pimas had planted their crops and seen them wither and die. It was all a wicked injustice! They are such fine farmers that when they could get even a little water they took all the sweepstakes in prizes in State and county fairs."

But we are digressing! This article has to do only with personal not property wrongs. Just a word more about cruelty to adults, then we will consider again, briefly, the plight of the little Indian child.

Chain-and-ball treatment for both sexes—in one case an Indian woman was put in a 1-room jail with three men; semistarvation; the giving of spoiled food to helpless old Indians as "rations"; the refusal of reservation doctors to attend women dying in childbirth; permitted bootlegging and moral evils; these cruelties to the Indian race were reported in almost all sections I visited.

Mrs. Gertrude Bonnin—Zitkala-Sa, president of the National Council of American Indians, a descendant of Sitting Bull, and one of the most cultivated women of her race, made the following statement to me:

"During my visit this summer to various reservations, I saw, at one place, Indians bathing the corpse of a man. They cried aloud so hopelessly that I wept with them. The body of the dead did not have a bit of flesh on it. It was just skin and bones. He had starved to death. He had had no food and no proper medical care. I saw hungry Indians everywhere I went.

"Then, too, there is increasing immorality and drunkenness, due to slack supervision, on all reservations."

Now—one last word about the children! The writer is convinced that if the white children of this country, whose beloved outdoor clubs are based on Indian woodcraft and Indian folklore, could know of the treatment the little Indian child is receiving, there would be a modern children's crusade. Perhaps, when the facts are told, there will be a crusade of American white mothers in behalf of the Indian child, our ward.

Think what is required in an average American family to feed a white child one day. Then listen to this, taken from page 327 of the Institute report, regarding the Indian boarding schools:

"The average allowance for food per capita is aproximately 11 cents a day. * * * At Rice School (San Carlos Apache Reservation, Ariz.) * * * the average amount spent for food was 9 cents a day. The dietary was examined * * * and it was obvious that the children were not receiving an adequate amount of food even of the very limited variety supplied. Malnutrition was evident. They were indolent, and when they had the chance to play, they merely sat about on the ground, showing no exuberance of healthy youth."

Exuberance? In an Indian boarding school?

LABOR IS ENFORCED IN SCHOOL

I visited a number of these prison-like schools. Everywhere I found extensive provisions for child labor. Provisions for play were almost lacking. In two schools I was shown "recreation rooms." Both were gloomy, musty-smelling basement rooms. And this on the desert where sunlight and space are cheap! But the rooms showed no signs of use. Indian boarding-school children evidently have neither the time nor the vitality for play.

"The labor of children as carried on in Indian boarding schools," the report tells us further on, "would, it is believed, constitute a violation of child labor laws in most States."

And the report goes on to tell us:

"The laundry is an important feature of every Government school. It is one of the chief sources of labor for the pupils. * * * The space allotted to the laundry is often small. At one large school this fact is capitalized. The superintendent reported that he can get much more work out of the children if he keeps large piles of laundry before them. An inspection of the plant verified his statement. A number of small children were literally hidden behind great piles of wet laundry in a greatly overcrowded room filled with steam * * *."

Finally: "The prevalence of tuberculosis in boarding schools is alarming," the report informs us on page 206.

There is not room here to tell of half the horrors in these schools where our little Indian wards spend their lives from 6 to 18, virtually as prisoners, though they have committed no offense except that of being Indians instead of whites.

One investigator last year found 30 children sleeping two in a bed, in single beds, at one school. And at a school in Arizona the writer saw one dormitory which contained 18 beds and only two small outside windows. Bathing and sanitary facilities are usually of the very worst, and epidemics sweep the schools.

Dr. B. O. Thrasher, formerly the doctor at the Fort Apache Indian School, describes as follows the condition of the little Indian children being "civilized" hundreds of miles from their mothers' arms:

"Many of these small boys came to the clinics with their hair filled with nits. Some with crusted sores on their heads from lice. Many with clothing many sizes too large for them. Clothing of some stiff with dirt. Stockings tied up with pieces of string. Some were found using segments of automobile tubes as garters. These little boys were being criminally neglected * * * in their dormitory."

In the Towoac School, in Colorado, the cook discovered that the dried fruit was full of worms. The attention of the school principal was called to the situation, but he told her that when the water boiled it would sterilize the worms and it would not hurt the children to eat them. She was made to serve this food and also to cook and serve maggoty meat.

More light has been shed on this Towoac School by the former matron, who loved the children and was loved by them. The flour, she declares, which was stored in the basement, was infested with mice, rats, and weevils. In addition, when the floors above were scrubbed the dirty water would drip down on the flour. Finally she ordered all the flour removed. The school principal, hearing of this, declared that the flour was all right, in proof of which he thrust his hand into a sack. When he withdrew his hand it contained a number of small mice as well as flour. Yet he ordered a portion of the flour used for the children. The remainder was put in storage and given to the poor and old Indians.

The children, this former matron declares, were lice infested and pitifully underclad. Only cheap canvas shoes were provided, gingham dresses, and no petticoats, and only the thinnest of underwear. All were underfed. The food actually "smelled." There was much sickness, and the children received no care. She sent one very sick little girl to the hospital, but the doctor twice returned her, refusing to have her there.

The boarding schools! Everywhere the writer went among Indians she heard the pitiful plea:

"We don't want boarding schools away off; our children come home sick; we want day schools here."

And the bitter complaint from the children: "We work too hard. They don't give us enough to eat."

On the Colorado plain near Ignacio the Utes—in gorgeous bead and feather regalia, for it happened to be the last day of a 4-day sun dance—gathered around the writer and told their troubles. The elders complained of injustice, of lack of medical care, of cruel neglect of aged Indians. The shy young people, home on vacation, told of harsh punishments in the distant boarding schools.

SCHOOL DISCIPLINE IS CRUEL

And as the writer continued to move about among Indians and whites in half a dozen States she heard more and more of the cruel discipline at the Indian boarding schools.

"I have seen Indian boys chained to their beds at night for punishment," Construction Engineer Russell, of Flagstaff, Ariz., has declared. "I have seen them thrown into cellars under the building which the superintendent called a jail. I have seen their shoes taken from them and they forced to walk through the snow to the barn to help milk. I have seen them whipped with a hemp rope, also a water hose, and forced to do servants' work for employees and superintendent without compensation, under the guise of industrial education."

W. Carson Ryan, jr., professor of education, Swarthmore College, one of the institute investigators, found these conditions on his trip to Wahpeton, N. Dak.:

"School supplies right down to rock bottom—not sure whether they can hold out, and superintendent may have to keep youngsters alive out of his own pocket. Rations consist of bread and mush. This and other schools in the Dakotas and Minnesota make one wonder if Dakota is not the Siberia of the Indian Service.

"The superintendent showed me a dungeon in the basement previously used for girls, up to his coming two years ago. 'I never locked up any Indian child yet, and I don't intend to begin,' he said. The dungeon is 18 by 8, absolutely dark. Girls told the superintendent of two or three of them sleeping there on mattresses and rats crawling over them at night. Their food was bread and water. Brick walls showed where the girls had worked holes through and escaped."

Finally Mrs. Bonnin made to the writer the following statement in regard to the Oglala School in South Dakota:

"Conquering Bear's two boys were in Oglala boarding school, and they ran away to Corn Creek, about 40 miles away. Policeman Jumping Eagle and the disciplinarian went after them and brought them back and gave them a severe beating. They were about 12 and 14 years at the time. Their heads were shaved, though it was winter. One of the boys had a ball and chain locked onto his leg and was locked to the bed at night. My informant saw this herself. The boys were in the jail above her room. They were in a dirty, filthy place, with a bucket to be used as toilet.

"She said it hurt her so to see all these things, such as this little boy carrying the ball when marching to meals, that she could not eat. The boy even went to school with the ball and chain on, and it bothered the other children. Many requests were made to the principal to have the disciplinarian take the chain off, but days went by before this was actually done."

And Mrs. Bonnin related this incident:

"A district-school teacher, still in the Indian Service, hitched 12 little boys together and plowed an acre of ground. When a boy lagged behind because of exhaustion he was prodded with a sharp stick. The father of one of the boys told me this during my visit last summer."

WHO IS RESPONSIBLE?

What of the Indian Bureau—the Indians' "guardian"—while these things are taking place? Are these frightful conditions never reported to the Indian Commissioner and Assistant Commissioner?

I am informed they are. That every now and then some bureau employee, placing loyalty to humanity above loyalty to superintendent or other petty superior, reports conditions directly to Indian Commissioner Burke.

For example: Dr. S. S. Warren, at the Leupp Boarding School on the Navajo Reservation, made such an appeal, in desperation, during an epidemic in 1925 to save the lives of little Navajo children. First, however, he notified the local superintendent of the epidemic, as follows:

"We have approximately 100 cases of measles and 7 cases of pneumonia. Having just gone through an epidemic of influenza, our nursing force of teachers and two nurses are worn out and unfit for duty."

For a time he made these appeals daily to the reservation superintendent, urging the desperate need of more nurses and medical assistance. He did not get either. Finally, as a last measure, with children dying all about him needlessly, he wired directly to Indian Commissioner Burke on April 29 in these words:

"We have had an epidemic of measles and influenza since March 17. Four deaths, and typhus suspect in hospital now. Dormitories and hospitals foul with contagion. No sanitary measures have been taken in conformity with public health and State laws to clean up. Children being bedded in and occupying quarters used for the sick, to the future detriment of health."

Doctor Warren obtained no aid. Six months later the following rebuke was sent him:

"In the Indian Service all matters of importance should be carried out through the superintendent as administrative officer. If you will inform the superintendent in writing as to what you believe should be done * * * your responsibility ceases. All such matters are checked up sooner or later, and should the superintendent fail in his duty he must take the consequences."

Checked up sooner or later? Ah, no doubt.

But the dying little Navajos had not been able to wait. They had gone on the long trail to hunting grounds which, we hope, were happier than those.

Edwin M. Stanton, Secretary of War in Lincoln's Cabinet, said in 1864, when Bishop Whipple, of Minnesota, was in Washington on behalf of the Sioux Indians:

"What does Bishop Whipple want? If he has come here to tell us of the corruption of our Indian system and the dishonesty of Indian agents, tell him that we know it. But the Government never reforms an evil until the people demand it. Tell him that when he reaches the heart of the American people the Indians will be saved."

CONSTRUCTION OF CRUISERS

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have here two letters in the nature of petitions. One of them is from Rev. Robert H. Lynn, pastor of the Sixth Avenue Baptist Church in Tacoma. The other is from former Judge Austin E. Griffiths, a very prominent citizen of Seattle. Each of these letters is in the nature of a protest against the passage of the cruiser bill. I merely want to make that statement, without asking that they be printed. I present these letters and ask to have them referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. They will be so referred.

POLICE PROTECTION DURING INAUGURATION

Mr. VANDENBERG. From the Committee on the District of Columbia I report back unanimously the usual joint resolution to provide for police protection and other general protection of life and property during the inauguration. I think there will be no debate on the matter. It is quite essential that it should have immediate action. I ask unanimous consent for its consideration at this time.

Mr. BLEASE. Let it be read, please.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 198) to provide for the maintenance of public order and the protection of life and property in connection with the presidential inauguration ceremonies in 1929, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, payable in like manner as other appropriations for the expenses of the District of Columbia, is hereby authorized to be appropriated to enable the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to maintain public order and protect life and property in said District from the 28th of February to the 10th of March, 1929, both inclusive, including the employment of personal services, payment of allowances, traveling expenses, hire of means of transportation, cost of removing and relocating street-car loading platforms, and other incidental expenses in the discretion of the commissioners. Said commissioners are hereby authorized and directed to make all reasonable regulations necessary to secure such preservation of public order and protection of life and property, and to make special regulations respecting the standing, movements, and operating of vehicles of whatever character or kind during said period; and to grant, under such conditions as they may impose, special licenses to peddlers and vendors to sell goods, wares, and merchandise on the streets, avenues, and sidewalks in the District of Columbia, and to charge for such privilege such fees as they may deem proper.

Such regulations and licenses shall be in force one week prior to said inauguration, during said inauguration, and one week subsequent thereto, and shall be published in one or more of the daily newspapers published in the District of Columbia, and in such other manner as the commissioners may deem best to acquaint the public with the same; and no penalty prescribed for the violation of any of such regulations shall be enforced until five days after such publication. Any person violating any of such regulations shall be liable for each such offense to a fine not to exceed $100 in the police court of said District, and in default of payment thereof, to imprisonment in the workhouse of said District for not longer than 60 days. And the sum of $2,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby likewise authorized, to be expended by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for the construction, rent, maintenance, and expenses incident to the operation of temporary public-comfort stations, first-aid stations, and information booths, during the period aforesaid, including the employment of personal services.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I understand that this is the usual joint resolution which has been adopted on previous occasions.

Mr. VANDENBERG. It is the usual joint resolution adopted prior to 1924.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, what is the total appropriation for expenses in connection with the inauguration?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Does the Senator mean the complete total, including everything?

Mr. DILL. I understand $45,000 has been already appropriated.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am unable to answer the Senator. This provides for an ultimate maximum of $25,000, which I understand from the District Commissioners this morning is the limit appropriated prior to 1924, and they say it is not in conflict with the financial program of the President and has the O. K. of the Director of the Budget.

Mr. DILL. I do not want to dispute the commissioners, but it seems to me a very large sum for the simple purpose of moving platforms around and making other arrangements.

Mr. VANDENBERG. It is to defray the cost of bringing 200 policemen from Baltimore for one thing. That has been done heretofore.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, on these occasions I am told that it has been the custom to employ a large number of special police.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Some of them are imported from other cities.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The police duties have been very largely increased by the presence of so many Republicans in Washington.

Mr. VANDENBERG. There will be an unusually large number this year from States which usually have not contributed to our celebrations.

Mr. SACKETT. It is to protect the Democrats in Washington against the Republican hordes that are coming in.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I am not going to object to the consideration of the joint resolution; but I think it is a reflection on the American people that the Congress of the United States, because a man has been elected President, especially by the wonderful majority received by Mr. Hoover, must spend $25,000 in the face of these orderly Americans, to hire policemen to keep them from violating the law. As I have said, I shall not object; but I am really against it, and I think it is a reflection on the American people.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

KILLINGS BY PROHIBITION OFFICERS

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I would like to have inserted in the RECORD a summary from a publication known as the Minute Man of killings by prohibition officers, and also from the same publication another summary of murderous assaults and outrages by such prohibition officers.

In addition to these summaries I also desire to have inserted in the RECORD a newspaper account of the latest killing of the kind. It is the killing by a deputy constable of a little girl 6 years old at Clinton, Mo., on or about the 22d of this month.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the articles were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Greenville (S. C.) News, October 19, 1925]

KILLINGS BY PROHIBITION OFFICERS

J. D. PITTMAN

Justifiable homicide in self-defense was undoubtedly the view taken by Federal Judge Cochran of the killing of J. D. Pittman by Federal Prohibition Agent Seabrook and State Constable Harrington in Beaufort County last May. In directing a verdict of not guilty the judge expressed the view that the officers were within their rights in their methods of boarding the craft occupied by Pittman.

The decision undoubtedly is in conformity with the interpretation placed by the courts upon the rights of prohibition officers in making searches and seizures. The homicide is, nevertheless, an illustration of the trouble-making (sic) possibilities that frequently arise under the prohibition law and the efforts to enforce it.

The testimony adduced at the trial shows that the officers had information of the expectancy of a shipload of liquor in that vicinity. Seeing what they thought to be a signal, they approached Pittman's boat, which was on blocks. It was nearly midnight; and supposing the Pittman boat to be the one referred to in their source of information, they boarded it and were in the act of crawling along the deck when they were discovered by the owner. When Mr. Pittman discovered them the officers called out to him to hold up his hands, declaring that they were officers and desired to search the boat. Mr. Pittman, instead of doing as commanded, went into the cabin, got a gun, and fired, whereupon the officers returned the fire and killed him.

The investigation and trial established several facts. One was that the boat was not the one supposed to be carrying a quantity of liquor. The search revealed less than a quart of liquor. Several witnesses also testified that Pittman, to their knowledge, was not engaged in the liquor business, but made his living by hunting and trapping. Another fact fairly well established was that the boat was occupied by Pittman as his home, and that he had no other home. Still another fact was that the officers in boarding the boat to search had no warrant authorizing them to make a search.

It is well established, of course, that a man's home is his castle and can not be invaded, even by officers, without warrants. But while the boat may have actually been Pittman's home, there was nothing to indicate that it was a home, and the officers presumably entered it without knowing that it was such. They regarded it as a craft or vehicle, which it was to all appearances. While there was little liquor aboard, the officers may be construed as having had reason to believe that it was a craft transporting or having in storage a quantity of liquor in violation of the law.

The courts have held that where officers have good reason to believe that liquor is being transported illegally, they have the right to enter upon and search such suspected vehicles without a warrant. And this ruling is the reason why many fatalities and much serious friction have come about through natural errors made in the attempt to enforce the prohibition law.

Such an interpretation of the rights of officers would seem to be necessary if officers are to make any real headway in stopping the illicit transportation or storage of liquor. Yet it has cost the lives of many citizens. Officers' suspicions have often been unfounded; often untactful conduct is employed by officers; often a citizen is unduly (sic) resentful of the effort to search his effects; often, again, the citizen either fails to learn that the invaders are officers of the law, or, if he is so informed, may sometimes be in fear that highwaymen or bandits are using the ruse to rob him; and various combinations may lead, as they frequently have led, to fatalities for which there appears to be no legal blame.

The pint or so of liquor which Pittman had does not seem to enter into the grounds upon which this case was settled, and for the sake of an illustration let us suppose that Pittman had never violated the prohibition law at all, and had never drunk a drop of liquor. Suppose that officers under the mistaken belief that his boat was a vehicle being used for liquor, entered it under the legal authority of the prohibition law. Suppose that Pittman, on the other hand, regarding his boat as his home and his castle, determined to exercise his right to prevent an unlawful invasion of it by officers or anybody else. Under this illustration both parties would have been acting according to their legal rights, and either would probably have been freed for the killing of the other.

Many lives have been taken in the enforcement of the prohibition law through such combinations of errors (sic), many of them perhaps natural and perhaps unavoidable on both sides. Just what is to be done about it is a problem for wiser heads than ours to solve. Greater care and greater caution on the part of officers who, because of their duties, must initiate these events, may reduce, though it will not wholly remove the danger of such fatal clashes.

The situation appears to be peculiar to the prohibition law. The effort to enforce it thoroughly appears to make necessary the taking of a human life now and then.

In May last year a poor hunter and fisherman named Pittman, whose only home for years was his boat, was wantonly slain in the dead of night by a Federal prohibition agent named Seabrook and a State constable by name Harrington.

Seabrook and Harrington were tried for murder in a Federal court in October, 1925, and the learned Judge Cochran, under the authority of the Supreme Court decision in the Carroll case, directed an acquittal, although it was admitted that the officers had no search warrant, and further that they had no grounds for suspecting the boat to be a rum runner, as it was on blocks and consequently on land and not a movable object.

On September 5, 1926, a drag-net raid took place in what is known as the Hell Hole section of Charleston, S. C., in which over 100 men took part, resulting in a bag of 33 men. The chief aide of the chief, Dunning, was an "undercover" man by name C. D. McKnight, a former "king of the rum runners" of that section.

Among the caught was Alonzo B. Seabrook, one of the killers of the poor, friendless Pittman.

We quote from the news account of what was unearthed in the Seabrook home:

"Prohibition Agent Seabrook was arrested at his home by Deputy United States Marshal C. H. Schaltz, who was accompanied by McKnight and several other prohibition agents. His house was searched.

"Officers claimed they found 14½ gallons of moonshine whisky in the house and $1,155 in bills, of which $390 was marked money, alleged to have been given to Seabrook by planted rum runners under Dunning's direction."

It is reported that Seabrook is a rich man, all of his money obtained since his appointment as a prohibition officer.

STEPHEN S. HOLT

RALEIGH, June 1.—Stephen S. Holt, Smithfield attorney, was instantly killed this afternoon when Detective Jesse Wyatt, of the Raleigh police, fired on an automobile that failed to stop at his order.

The shooting occurred 3 miles out from Raleigh on the Smithfield Highway about 4 o'clock. Wyatt was accompanied by Police Chief Winder Bryan, and both in civilian clothes, suspected the car of carrying liquor. As it passed he signaled for it to stop, and when it failed to respond to his order he fired, the ball plowing through Holt's brain.

A jury impaneled this evening by Coroner L. M. Waring ordered Wyatt held pending action by the grand jury. The officer previously had been allowed to go to his home after reporting at police headquarters, but after the verdict of the coroner's jury he was arrested and confined. It was expected bond would be arranged.

Mr. Holt had been in Raleigh appearing before the Federal court and was on his way home. He was riding on the back seat with J. Will Wright and Joe Woodard, both of Smithfield, while Doc Woodard and A. H. Woodard were on the front seat, the latter driving.

The car halted about 3 miles out while one member of the party went into some woods near by. Wyatt and Chief Bryan, up the road some distance, saw it stop and in a few minutes start off again. That, according to reports on the shooting, was the basis for the suspicion that it was carrying liquor. When the machine passed the officers the order to stop was given.

The men in the car insisted that they did not recognize any signal to stop, nor did they particularly notice the officers on the side of the road, as they were not dressed in uniform.

Detective Wyatt said he fired at a rear tire, and suggested that the ball must have struck the pavement instead and glanced upward, penetrating the rear curtain, and striking Holt. An examination of the pavement revealed no evidence of an indentation such as a bullet might make, Smithfield persons who visited the scene afterwards said.

A search of the car disclosed no liquor, and no member of the party had been drinking, it is said.

Mr. Holt was 49 years of age and had been practicing law in Smithfield for many years. He leaves a wife, three children, and three stepchildren, besides brothers and sisters.

OTTO ESKE

PLATTSBURG, N. Y., August 11.—Otto Eske, of 527 Timpson Place, New York City, was shot and killed to-day by Federal dry agents near Cooperville, a hamlet about 20 miles north of this city, while attempting to run an automobile laden with liquor past the Federal officials. Henry Denner was in charge of the Federal forces and was accompanied by Kenneth Bates, Edward Kearns, and Samuel Dickson.

Eske was driving one of three rum-running cars which had crossed the border a few minutes before the shooting. The Eske machine was the last of the three in line, and was met by a fusillade of bullets near a bridge outside the village. In the midst of the shooting Eske turned his automobile into a dirt road and was followed by the officers. About 2 miles from where the shooting occurred the car was found at the side of the highway with Eske still grasping his wheel, but dead, a bullet from one of the dry agents' guns having pierced his neck, severing the jugular vein.

The shooting has caused a sensation throughout this entire section, and threats are heard on all sides because of what is regarded as unjustified use of guns by Federal officers in the arrest of alleged violators of the law.

A quantity of Canadian ale was found in Eske's car.

UNBORN CHILD

Suit for $25,000 was brought in common pleas court Thursday against W. J. Patrick, East Cleveland dry raider, charging him with having by his conduct caused the death of an unborn child. The suit for $25,000 was brought by France R. Wiggins, 4716 Hough Avenue. He charges that Patrick and five men forcibly entered the home of his wife's mother at 3382 East One hundred and second Street while his wife was confined to bed. Despite his pleas, he charges, Patrick and his men disregarded his wife's condition, struck and pushed him, and ransacked the house, including the room in which she was. Alarmed by their presence, his wife fell from the bed, with the result that her child was born prematurely. The child suffered from a heart imperfection because of the operation, he said, and died on July 3.

UNNAMED NEGRO

Thursday night, while Representative JOSEPH T. DEAL, of Norfolk, was explaining to an audience in this city how the Constitution of the United States was being flagrantly violated in enforcing the eighteenth amendment, the body of a colored man was lying in his humble home in Elizabeth City County rigid in death, having been pierced by a bullet in the back fired by a county constable while the man was fleeing in an attempt to escape arrest, according to the verdict of the coroner's jury.

The man who was shot was apprehended in a place where a still was being operated and was fleeing to escape arrest, it is alleged, when the officer fired upon him. Under the Layman Act the operation of a still is made a felony, and the officer may have been justified in law in using his weapon. But every such killing prejudices the public more and more against the prohibition enforcement act.

[From the Chicago (Ill.) Tribune, August 4]

JOHN BUONGORE

John Buongore, a veteran of the World War and later an enlisted man in the Sixth Field Artillery at Camp Meade, was entrapped by two prohibition agents at Havre de Grace, Md. They gave him an order for liquor and he delivered two quarts of whisky to them. One of the agents was Joseph A. Ferbershaw, sent from Washington to Havre de Grace.

Buongore was placed under arrest and he asked permission to telephone his wife. He was allowed to do so, and took the opportunity to run away. Ferbershaw shot him twice in the back while he was running and a third time after he had fallen, killing him. The coroner's jury immediately held the agent for an unjustified killing and he was put in jail.

This was a brutal, inhuman killing. In spite of the rights which an officer of the law has to subdue a person resisting arrest or to stop one running away from him after arrest, it was murder done with official authority. It was dehumanized ferocity consistent with the history and precepts of fanaticism. The local authorities ought to seek for responsibility above the agent who did the killing, and if it is found that this man's superiors in Washington gave him instructions to shoot and kill on such occasions have them also indicted for murder.

There are many people in the United States who think that Buongore ought to have been killed if he tried to run away after selling two quarts of whisky. They do not believe that any methods of preventing the sale of intoxicants can be too severe. They have more sympathy for a man killer than for a violator of the Volstead Act. They indorse punishment by injunction and contempt proceedings and by trial without jury. They indorse search and seizure without writs, the invasion of homes without authority. They indorse double jeopardy. They indorse entrapment. They are contemptuous of all the protections which the law heretofore has put around the individual.

The former disposition of courts was to frown on a case or throw it out if the agents of the law had solicited the accused to commit the crime of which he was charged. It is frequently an easy way of getting evidence, but in many cases morally offensive.

The moral support given prohibition enforcement officers in any methods they care to use to take violators of this sumptuary law is indicative of the fanatic spirit of part of the country. Quick-trigger shooting has become one of the characteristics of enforcement, which has no regard for any of the old rights of the citizen. Pleasure yachts have been fired at by Government boats. The suspicion that they might be rum runners was enough. That has happened off the seacoast and in the Great Lakes. When the Yale and Harvard crews were in training on the Thames the coaches' boat was fired at. These incidents caused a great protest, as they should, and brought an order to stop it.

When law steps out of its proper field of activity it releases a multitude of disorders, and no law ever before let loose so many of them as the Volstead Act has. The rule of fanatics is a rule of terrorism.

ROSCOE E. BRUNER

Roscoe E. Bruner, a youth 20 years of age, lies in a hospital in the town of Norton, Va., with a bullet hole in his back, put there, it is believed, by an officer of the law.

The youth was shot while riding in an automobile in company with his brother and another youth. The boys say they were returning to their home in Lee County after having attended a singing in the neighborhood, when they saw two cars parked on the roadside. One of the cars pulled out of the way and the boys drove on, but just as they passed a man jumped out of each of the parked cars and yelled at them to stop. Then one of the men fired at the car in which the boys were driving and young Bruner was shot in the back, as he was riding on the rear seat.

That is the story related to the sheriff by the boys, after which the sheriff started to the scene of the shooting. On his way he met five men, two of whom were officers. The officers professed to know nothing of the shooting, but the sheriff examined their pistols and found that both had been fired. The sheriff then called one of the other men in the party aside and asked him about the shooting. This man gave much the same account of the shooting as the boys had given, and the sheriff placed the officers under arrest. The sheriff further said that none of the boys had been drinking and he found no liquor in their car.

In a Richmond hospital is a youth from another State who was shot under similar circumstances.

In Newport News two nights ago a prominent citizen was driving quietly through the city in an automobile, accompanied by his wife and child, when a car came dashing up at a speed estimated to have been 50 miles an hour. At the corner of Thirtieth Street and Madison Avenue the approaching car struck the car in which the citizen and his wife and child were riding and turned it around, but, as if by miracle, no one was seriously hurt.

It turned out that the offending car was run at a breakneck speed through the streets because it was being chased by a police officer in another car, on the presumption that the car ahead was driven by a bootlegger.

LEONARD TRIPLETT

BLOWING ROCK, June 21.—Leonard Triplett, about 20 years old, is dead, and H. W. Wooten, 40, deputy sheriff of Watauga County and former chief of police of Blowing Rock, is in jail at Boone under a charge of murder as a result of an affray about 2 miles northwest of there last night.

The affray had its inception in a raid made by Wooten and Chief of Police J. V. Bauguss on a small roadster occupied by Triplett and two companions, Hal Teague and Jack Hampton.

It seems from all information obtainable that Bauguss and Wooten, the latter of whom did police duty here in addition to his work as deputy sheriff of Watauga County, were out on a liquor raid. Wooten said in jail this morning at Boone that they had information that Triplett and his companions were bringing liquor into Blowing Rock. According to best accounts, they stopped the car bearing Triplett and his companions and searched it.

Finding no liquor, they ordered him to move on, and went to raid another car in the same party which contained six young men. No liquor was found here also, Wooten said. While they were raiding the second car, it is said that Triplett and his companions came up and began abusing the officers, who had raided them and found no whisky. Here is where the evidence conflicts.

The side represented by the officers states that Triplett and his crowd began assaulting Wooten, while the other side claims nothing of the sort was attempted.

Wooten stated this morning that seven of the men in the party jumped on him and that he tried to make for his automobile. He said that while he was on the running board of his car the crowd started at him again and that he shot in self-defense. The other side claims that Wooten addressed Triplett with an oath saying, "I'll get you, you * * * ," and forthwith shot. Death was instantaneous.

Wooten admitted none in either auto party was armed.

The body was brought back to Blowing Rock in the second car that was raided, and Wooten immediately made his way to Boone, where he gave himself into the custody of Sheriff L. M. Farthing, and is being held pending a hearing, which is scheduled for to-morrow.

Triplett's reputation here is of the best. He has been in the employ of the village on several occasions, but never before, it is said, has he run afoul the law.

JACOB D. HANSEN

Jacob D. Hansen, secretary of the Lodge of Elks, Niagara Falls, N. Y., was murderously assaulted by two ununiformed members of the Coast Guard hunting under orders for liquor. He had none.

He was shot through the head, the bullet putting out both eyes, this on the morning of May 6, 1928.

Jacob D. Hansen died in October, 1928.

ROSS W. HUGGINS

TUCSON, ARIZ., September 28, 1928.—Border-patrol officers shot and killed Ross W. Huggins, of Tucson, and an unidentified negro near Deming, N. Mex., yesterday, when the two failed to stop their automobile as ordered. The officers said the automobile in which the men were riding was loaded with liquor.

ELISHA NORTHCUTT

In Anderson, Ind., on August 8, 1923, Elisha Northcutt, of 1520 Hendricks Street, was shot and killed by Seth Ward, deputy State prohibition officer of Indianapolis; witnesses, Fred Pettigrew and Lex Bricker.

Ward attempted to search Northcutt's premises; he was asked by Northcutt to read his search warrant; witness Bricker states that Ward said he "needed no warrant to make the search"; Northcutt, resisting, was shot and killed by Ward.

THOMAS MONTEFORTE

In April, 1924, two Federal agents, Samuel Kupferman and Robert J. Owens (see comment below), went to the garage of Thomas Monteforte, 245 North Eighth Street, Brooklyn, searching for liquor. Monteforte resisted and was shot dead and his brother was shot in the back. No shots were fired except by the Federal officers.

Robert J. Owens figured as the chief of the Federal raiders in an unlawful search and seizure in the home of H. G. DeFritsch, New York City, some three months after this killing, conclusive proof that he had not lost standing as an officer of the law. He was dismissed from the service, and that will probably be his only punishment.

Chief prohibition enforcement officer for New York, Merrick, remarks that it was "an honest mistake."

JOE AND HERMAN BAZEMORE

SYLVANIA, GA., July 15 (Associated Press dispatch to the Evening Star, Washington, D. C.).—Joe and Herman Bazemore, brothers and prominent Screven County farmers, were shot and killed last night on a road about 4 miles from here by Policeman J. V. Dolan, who stopped the automobile, in which they were riding with two of their children, to search it for whisky.

The policeman, who brought the bodies to a local undertaking establishment and then reported the affair to county authorities, asserted that the Bazemores drew revolvers on him and a brother officer as they approached to explore the contents of the automobile. He said he fired, killing them instantly, when it became apparent that they intended to shoot.

J. TOM BRITT

On April 13, 1923, the automobile of J. Tom Britt was chased by officers near Columbus, Ga., who suspected it carried liquor. Mrs. Britt was driving, and not halting on their demand they fired and killed Mr. Britt, who was shot through the back. There was no liquor in the car.

LOUIS LIZOTTE

An Associated Press dispatch from Caribou, Me., May 14, 1925, reports:

"Louis Lizotte, of Connor, died in a hospital here to-day seven hours after he had been shot by a highway policeman, who opened fire on a speeding automobile in an effort to force the driver to stop. No liquor was found in the automobile."

[From the Chicago Tribune, September 8, 1926]

UNNAMED VICTIM

Another minister of the gospel has been taken in charge accused of murder in the first degree. The killing occurred in a raid upon a moonshine still in the neighborhood of Orting, Wash., the raid being initiated by the clergyman, the Rev. George A. Seeley, pastor of the Free Methodist Church and publisher of the Orting Oracle, who, suspecting or learning of the existence of the still, called upon Federal prohibition agents and led them to the spot. The Reverend Seeley asserts that he himself did no shooting, but was armed. He and the Federal agents say they were fired on and responded in self-defense. The victim was shot in the back, and the local prosecuting attorney calls it "a case of cold-blooded murder."

CARL STIERLE

Prosecutor Morris Parks, accompanied, so the account runs, by prohibition officers from Indianapolis, shot and killed on July 19, 1926, Carl Stierle, a suspected rum runner. Parks claimed he shot in self-defense; that Stierle had drawn a revolver and thrown it away after he was shot. No revolver was ever found; he was shot in the back and then threw his revolver away!

[From the Charlotte (N. C.) Observer, December 17, 1926]

UNNAMED MAN

Out in Arkansas, in which a sheriff and four deputies were out looking for moonshine stills, when an automobile occupied by four young men went by. They told the driver to halt—were not heeded. Then the officers opened fire. At least 25 shots were directed at the automobile and one of the young men was killed. Then the sheriff and his posse found that the boys were not mixed up with whisky at all but were returning from a hunting trip.

Of course, the officers were sorry but their sorrow does not atone for the life of an innocent man nor for the outrage against the privileges of the highway. The sport of shooting into automobiles is not likely to be checked in States where the custom is not outlawed, as in North Carolina, until the courts begin sending the shooters to the penitentiary, or, in cases like that we have just narrated, to the gallows or electric chair.

PAUL PIETROWSKY

SEATTLE, WASH., June 3, 1927 (by A. P.).—Paul Pietrowsky, 70, skipper of an unnamed cabin launch, was fatally wounded by machine-gun fire from Coast Guard cutter 269 near Acorte, Wash., when he brandished a shotgun at guardsmen who sought to board his ship in search of liquor.

Boatswain John H. Davis ordered the gunner to fire at Pietrowsky when the aged skipper raised his weapon as the boarding party approached, according to a report received by Capt. F. G. Dodge, Coast Guard commandant here.

Pietrowsky died on board the cutter. No liquor was found on the boat, Davis reported.

[From the Scottsbluff (Nebr.) Republican, July 23, 1926.]

WILLIAM TRUTE

About the worst crime that has yet been perpetrated by so-called prohibition officers is the one at Tecumseh, where another bonehead ignoramus got smart with a gun and killed William Trute, a 48-year-old Tecumseh carpenter simply because Trute refused to throw up his hands when the bonehead shouted the order at him from the cover of a hayrack in Trute's own barn.

An officer named Hurtlett went to Trute's house to look for liquor. None was apparent so he left a fellow by the name of Holden guarding the barn while the officer went away, presumably for a search warrant. Before he returned Trute came home and went out to the barn to see who was prowling around. When he entered the barn Holden commanded him to put up his hands. Trute refused and started toward the hayloft and the lunatic in the loft shot him in the back. Trute died the next morning.

The officer who took Holden along with him is just about as much to blame as Holden himself. He left an armed halfwit in possession of a gun and obsessed with the idea that he was under the cloak of the law. The man was not even deputized. If Holden is a murderer, then Hurtlett is an accomplice.

ERMON H. JONES

MIAMI, FLA., April 26.—Three Coast Guard men were indicted on charges of first-degree murder by the Dade County grand jury yesterday afternoon. The guardsmen are Boatswain H. P. Parry and James Kazlon and M. E. Lowery, all charged with the death of Ermon H. Jones, of Miami, who died in a hospital here April 16 from the effects of a bullet wound in his head, received March 14, when coast guards are alleged to have fired on a pleasure yacht on which he was a passenger.

According to testimony at the coroner's inquest, Jones and three friends were on a small yacht in the bay south of Miami, when they sighted another small craft at nightfall. It proved to be a Coast Guard picket boat.

The occupants of the pleasure craft, however, thought it was another pleasure craft, they testified at the coroner's inquest, and started to race with it.

They heard no shooting, Brown, an occupant of the boat on the night of the shooting, testified, and did not know they were under fire until Jones staggered and slumped to the deck, holding his head.

The coast guards, in testifying, declared that they saw a number of flashes from the pleasure craft and thought it was pistol fire. Hallman and Brown declared it was the motor backfiring, but Parry, at the inquest, declared he picked up two empty cartridges on the boat. He did not produce them at the inquest.

WALTER LORRANCE

MANCHESTER, TENN., July 16.—W. B. Stone and Clay Conatser, United States prohibition agents, charged with the murder of Walter Lorrance, were bound over to the grand jury under bond of $10,000 Saturday afternoon in a preliminary hearing before Magistrates E. R. Holmes and J. W. Powers. The bond was executed.

Lorrance was shot and instantly killed on June 23 near the Cannon County line following a raid by the officers on a wildcat still at which it is alleged he was at work.

Testimony at the preliminary hearing purported to show that Lorrance was shot in the back, the bullet severing the spinal cord and going through the body. Witnesses said that Stone a few minutes after the shooting said, "We officers killed him. Lorrance turned on us with a knife and we had to take care of ourselves."

WILLIAM RISK

The Denver (Colo.) Post, September 12, 1925, reports that three Federal prohibition officers were charged with gross cruelty to a prominent Colorado cattleman, near whose ranch a mountain still had been discovered. The agents handcuffed him with his arms around a tree and then ordered him to confess that he was a moonshiner. L. A. Williams, the cattleman, has brought suit, alleging unlawful restraint, assault, torture, intimidation, and abuse. They also searched his ranch without warrant and found nothing.

According to the same paper, the three agents the day before killed William Risk, manager of the Harry Gehm Cattle Co. ranch, 11 miles from Divide, Colo., after seizing a mountain still. The coroner's jury in this case returned a verdict that the man was shot by Federal officers "in the performance of their duty," but the rancher made a dying statement declaring that he was shot in the back.

ROBERT H. BROOKS

LYONS, N. Y., October 17.—State Trooper Howard Spellacy is a prisoner in the Wayne County jail here charged with murder in the first degree for the shooting of Robert H. Brooks, a Savannah farmer. The shooting is admitted by Spellacy. He refused to explain his act, but it is believed the trooper mistook Brooks for a bootlegger. Coroner George D. Winchell will hold an inquest at Savannah next Thursday morning.

Information from which the warrant was drawn was based on the deposition of Mrs. Charles Rotach, who was riding with Brooks when he was shot. Her story is that Brooks drove his car into the ditch near here somewhere near midnight and that he awakened her to help him get back into the road. Then she went for a ride with him. She says Trooper Spellacy and another trooper followed them.

The bullet passed through the back of the car and entered Brooks's body between the shoulder blades. Brooks fell forward, according to Mrs. Rotach, and his coat sleeve, she thinks, caught the gas throttle, stalling the car.

D. C. SHANNON

In an attempt to establish a principle that violations of the liquor laws "are not capital offenses, punishable by death without trial," a coroner's jury to-day held a Coast Guard ensign and four of his crew for the crime of manslaughter.

The jury returned its verdict after listening to a score of witnesses who testified that D. C. ("Red") Shannon, rum runner, was shot last Wednesday night through the back while his hands were raised above his head, in token of surrender, and after he had shouted, "Don't shoot; I surrender."

Ensign P. E. Shaw, Boatswain P. S. Austin, Seamen B. C. Smith, E. McAuld, and Otis Meeking testified that they did not fire after they saw Shannon and his men hold up their hands. Their testimony, the jury found, was not convincing.

Warrants were issued by H. W. Penny, a justice of the peace. Capt. C. G. Porcher, Coast Guard commander, accepted responsibility for delivering the men. Bonds were fixed by Justice Penny at $5,000 for the ensign and $2,500 for the enlisted men.

Nine Federal men engaged in war on liquor traffic are now under State charges of either manslaughter or aggravated assault and robbery in this section of Florida. Four agents who raided suspects at Key West last week are now awaiting trial for assaults and for robbing their victims.

"Florida is interested to know if liquor violations justify summary executions," Attorney Bart A. Riley, who examined witnesses before the coroner's jury, declared. "And we will take this means of finding out.

"There is something wrong when law officers take alive men charged with murder, highway robbery, treason, arson, rape, or counterfeiting, but shoot and kill suspects when the liquor law is involved. The Volstead law does not provide a death penalty—yet. Even if it did, a trial would be more conventional."

W. W. SMITH

Mrs. Helen Smith wants $7,500 from the prohibition officers who, she says, shot her husband in the back.

William W. Smith, 34, died last June from bullet wounds. The shots are alleged to have been fired by Sheriff John Manning, of Yamhill County, and Ray Amy, State prohibition officer.

Mrs. Smith sues as administratrix of the estate.

The two officers were searching for stills in Yamhill County, the complaint recites, and shot Smith in the back from ambush as he was walking on a public road.

GIRARD KADENBACH

Girard Kadenbach, of Atlantic Highlands, was killed in a fight between the Coast Guard and two power boats off Sandy Hook. He was found unconscious in the bottom of his boat when the shooting stopped. There was no liquor on board. The dying man was transferred to Monmouth Memorial Hospital, Long Branch, N. J.

GEORGE HOFFMAN

VALLEY STREAM, L. I., July 21, 1925 (special to the Washington Post).—Frightened to death, according to his family, by two prohibition agents who arrested him, George Hoffman, proprietor of the Hoffman Inn, Valley Stream, was buried to-day.

The agents first went to Hoffman early last week. According to Mrs. Hoffman, they asked her husband where they could get whisky and he referred them to a man from whom they bought two cases. Wednesday they returned to the inn and meeting Hoffman told him he was under arrest. He fainted and did not recover consciousness before his death Saturday. Physicians said the shock brought on apoplexy.

ADAM BALLENGER

SPARTANBURG, S. C., July 29.—V. R. Grant, Federal prohibition officer, is to-day under $10,000 bond in connection with the death of Adam Ballenger, nephew of E. C. Ballenger and brother of Paul Ballenger, merchants of this city, whose body was found in a decomposed state near Saluda, N. C., late Monday with a bullet wound in the back.

Grant stated at the inquest that he and Federal Prohibition Agent Will Owen were looking for rum runners and when Ballenger was asked to halt, put on more speed, and later fired at him (Grant), and that he returned the fire.

He said that Ballenger ran into the woods and that when they examined the car they found 7 gallons of whisky, but that a search failed to reveal Ballenger. Upon the finding of the body Grant surrendered to Sheriff William Davis, of Henderson County, N. C.

Grant, the killer, claims he found 7 gallons of whisky in Ballenger's car; he didn't produce it as he said he had thrown it away on the spot.

Our readers will notice that in common with other reported prohibition killings the poor victim was shot in the back.

Grant, if tried at all, will be defended in a Federal court by the United States district attorney. He can not be tried by the State of South Carolina.

LAWTON CARROLL

VALDOSTA, GA., March 7.—Lawton Carroll, a young white man, is at a local hospital seriously wounded, shot in the back, and R. L. Hudson, jr., a young deputy prohibition enforcement officer, is under $5,000 bond, as a result of efforts made by a group of prohibition officers this morning to stop an alleged whisky automobile. Hudson is a son of R. L. Hudson, sr., enforcement officer working out of Valdosta.

According to information given, a posse of officers about 7 o'clock this morning saw Lawton Carroll coming into the city and attempted to search his car but he refused to stop. Hudson pursued in another car, and fired at the tires.

The first shot evidently missed the car. He claims that as he fired the second shot the car struck a bump and the bullet entered Carroll's left shoulder, just under the shoulder blade and came out in front.

When Carroll's car was stopped it was searched and no whisky was found in it.

CECIL M'CLURE

"I have been informed that the shooting was almost without provocation," said Solicitor Grover C. Davis with regard to the killing of Cecil McClure, 17-year-old Cherokee County youth, by Prohibition Officer Joshua Crisp.

The facts in the case as reported are as follows:

Crisp and two other Federal agents, armed with legal warrant, went to the McClure home to search for whisky. They found a half gallon, and with it in possession sat down on the front steps of the house.

Young McClure, returning home, came up to the officers, saw the liquor, claimed it as his property and walked away with it without any action on the part of the three officers.

McClure entered the house, secured a shotgun which his mother took away from him. Regaining possession of the weapon, he started for the front door, his mother holding on to him and the gun.

McClure reached the doorway, his mother still struggling with him. Crisp fired a volley from his revolver into the boy, and he fell, mortally wounded, in his mother's arms.

The question whether it was necessary, when McClure appeared in the doorway, for Officer Crisp to shoot in defense of his life should not be answered without the most thorough investigation of all the facts and circumstances. It is for this that jury trials are provided.

But it is immediately apparent that this homicide could have been prevented had the three officers, all armed, placed McClure under arrest when he claimed the whisky. If the liquor was seizable, its owner was liable to arrest and should then and there have been taken into custody and held for trial.

Having made at least a criminally neglected botch of the task of law enforcement at the McClure home, leaving a stripling boy bleeding to death in his mother's arms, Federal Officer Crisp took to his heels, says the narrative, and disappeared around the side of the McClure barn. His brother officers also left the premises.

Feeling runs high in Cherokee County against the slayer of this young man, it is said. And resentment, righteous wrath, should run high, unless a half gallon of blockade liquor is worth more than a human life.

The unlawful liquor should, of course, have been taken; but the life of a boy could have been and should have been saved.

It is a serious undertaking to criticize officers for their efforts to enforce the laws. But it is the duty of citizens not only to stand for law and order but to protest against any enforcement policy, State or Federal, which has as its slogen "Shoot first and investigate afterwards." And that is the practice of Federal prohibition agents on land and sea.

HENRY A. M'CRACKEN

ATHENS, July 16.—Body of Henry Alec McCracken, 22, who died in a Chattanooga hospital Thursday afternoon from gunshot wounds received from officers in a raid made in the outskirts of this city June 15, was brought to Athens this afternoon on Southern train No. 42, and burial was made in Cedar Grove Cemetery.

Officers making the raid were D. C. Duggan, sheriff of McMinn County; J. S. Payne, deputy sheriff; Will Brown, constable of Etowah; and Cain Burnette, prohibition officer of Chattanooga.

It is alleged that the shot that wounded young McCracken and later caused his death was fired by Burnette. It has been stated that McCracken made a dying statement to that effect.

Deputy D. H. Stephenson, of Athens, who is also jailer of McMinn County, stated that three other boys were in the car with McCracken when apprehended, but all escaped except McCracken. Homer and Roy Swofford, who were later arrested and placed under $1,000 bond, and Cicero Henry, who is still at large, are alleged to have been the occupants of the machine.

IDA WALDMAN

Frightened at the appearance of four members of unit No. 1, who entered her home shortly after 4 p. m. yesterday and announced they were going to search the house for liquor, Mrs. Ida Waldman, 42 years old, wife of Louis Waldman, wealthy coal dealer, of 304 Carpenter Street, fell unconscious, and died a half hour later in the Mount Sinai Hospital from what physicians said was a dilated heart induced by fright or grief.

Mrs. Waldman was in the kitchen of her home with her two sons, Samuel, 21 years old, and Harry, 18, when the raiders entered and read her a "John Doe" warrant issued by Magistrate Violet E. Fahnestock on complaint of Policeman Mueller.

The woman was rendered speechless, her sons said later, and when both boys escorted the raiders to various parts of the house and cellar she fell unconscious, mumbling words about the disgrace to her family.

Abraham Waldman, a brother-in-law of the dead woman, who entered the house while the unit members were making their search, took her to the hospital in the automobile of a neighbor, while Harry, the younger son, ran for a physician in the vicinity.

The members of the searching party made no effort to interfere, while the frenzied sons rushed around in behalf of their mother.

They completed an exhaustive search of the dwelling and cellar and found no traces of liquor or other violations of the law and left empty handed.

Doctors at the hospital applied stethoscopes to Mrs. Waldman's chest when she was wheeled into the institution, and immediately diagnosed her illness as dilation of the heart, induced by a severe mental strain.

Neighbors of the dead woman said last night the family has lived in the Carpenter Street house for many years, and that Mrs. Waldman and her husband were widely known in the section as old-time residents of unquestioned good character.

PERLE S. THOMAS

Perle S. Thomas, of Fort Pierce, Fla., was a traveling salesman for the Loose-Wiles Biscuit Co. He was a peaceful, inoffensive citizen, living with his wife and children and supporting them out of the wages he received as a traveling salesman. On the night of the 4th of February, 1927, he was driving home in his car to spend the following day—Sunday—with his family in Fort Pierce. About 4 miles south of Fort Pierce, in a lonely spot on the road, he was commanded to halt. A short time prior to that, while traveling over this same road and returning to his family at the end of his week's work, he was stopped at about this same point on the road and assaulted by two drunken men. When the order came to him to halt he speeded up his car, thinking that he was again to be assaulted. The men who commanded him to halt were United States immigration officers employed by the Bureau of Immigration at Washington. When he failed to stop the officers got in a high-powered car which they had parked by the roadside and quickly overtook him and passed him. They stopped the car ahead of him, blocking the road, and he was compelled to stop. Without any explanation to him as to the reasons for their attempt to stop him, they fired into his car and killed him. Soon afterwards these officials—six of them in number—were indicted by the grand jury of that county in Florida and were tried. Two of them were convicted of the crime of murder in the second degree and were sentenced to the penitentiary in the State of Florida for life. One of them was found guilty of murder in the first degree and was sentenced to death by electrocution. The case was dismissed as to two of them, and the case against the remaining officer has not yet been finally disposed of. The Department of Justice, under the direction of the Attorney General of the United States, without any examination into the merits of the case, sent an Assistant Attorney General to Florida to defend the murderers. Under the direction of the Attorney General of the United States a local attorney was employed for a very large fee to defend the murderers.

FRANK AIELLO

Two peace officers, hiding in the dark by a highway near Fresno, Calif., Saturday night, turned their flashlights on the face of Frank Aiello as he sped by. Aiello did what any other person would have done under similar circumstances; he refused to halt. The officers opened fire and killed him.

It makes little difference that contraband liquor was found in Aiello's home or even that he was reputed to be a bootlegger.

Bootlegging is not yet a capital crime in this country. Nor are peace officers empowered to inflict the death penalty without judge or jury. No liquor was found in Aiello's car.

The other instance was in Yazoo County, Miss., Sunday night. A car occupied by a man, two women, and two children was fired upon by two county and two Federal officers when it failed to stop. The car shows bullet marks, and two bullets pierced the metal and entered the cushion of the rear seat, in which one of the women and her two children were riding. The officers are said to have had a tip that a booze car was to travel that way, and the car on which they fired fit the description.

FRED POWELL

JACKSONVILLE, N. C., June 18, 1928.—Charley Buckmaster, Coast Guard man, admitted to a coroner's jury late to-day that he fired the shot that killed Fred Powell, Carteret County young man, Saturday, as a Coast Guard boat, commanded by Capt. W. F. Piner and with Buckmaster and another Coast Guard man aboard, attempted to halt a gasoline launch they believed to be carrying liquor.

Buckmaster was given a preliminary hearing and bound over to the October term of Onslow County Superior Court under bond of $2,000. Buckmaster said he fired at the water merely as a warning to the occupants of the boat, and that he believed Powell was struck after the ball from his rifle had ricocheted off the water. He absolved Captain Piner of any connection with the killing, saying he fired without orders.

A warrant charging second degree murder was sworn out against Captain Piner yesterday, but had not been served to-day, and Coroner G. W. Jones said he expected it to be withdrawn.

Officers said Buckmaster probably would be tried only on a manslaughter charge.

CAPTAIN OF THE "ELENA" AND A MAN

SAN JUAN, PORTO RICO, July 26, 1927.—The prohibition enforcement unit here reports receiving advices from Curacao, Dutch West Indies, that the captain and one member of the crew of the Dutch schooner Elena have died from wounds received last week during a fight between the ship and prohibition officers.

A message states that the Elena refused to permit the prohibition officers to board her while she was in Porto Rican waters.

HARRY BOOTH

MIAMI, FLA., August 13.—Miami Beach police announced to-day that Harry Booth, 32, of Miami, whose body was found floating off Biscayne Point, Normandy Beach, yesterday, was shot and killed Thursday night by customs men who fired upon Booth and James Willis, also of Miami, when they passed the point in a boat en route to the Bahamas rum row for a cargo of liquor. Willis, who is now in custody, was shot through the cheek.

Customs officials informed Miami Beach police shortly before 11 o'clock this morning that the two officers who participated in the firing on the rum boat would be surrendered to municipal authorities.

Eighteen shots were fired at the rum boat, according to Willis, one of them hitting Booth behind the ear and knocking him overboard. Willis believes his companion died almost instantly.

Police say they corroborated Willis's story by obtaining a signed statement from Harry Smith, a witness to the shooting, who told police customs men threatened him with their guns and drove him from the beach. Smith's statement alleges that the customs men opened fire on the boat as soon as it came into sight without commanding a halt. There was no liquor in the boat.

MARCUS STONER

(Special to the Tennessean)

TRACY CITY, TENN., July 13.—Deputy Sheriffs Carroll Woodlee and Hugh Griswold are under bond here to answer a charge of murder growing out of the killing of Marcus Stoner, 24, driver of an automobile, who was fatally shot in the main street here in front of Louis Fults's drug store when he failed to heed the order of officers to halt for a search of his automobile.

A search after the shooting failed to reveal any liquor in the machine. Stoner, his brother, and a companion were in the machine at the time, and said they were returning from a trip to Collins River, where they gathered blackberries.

Woodlee, who is said by Jeff D. Fults, defense attorney, to have fired the only shots, claims that he sighted the three men in the automobile when they were leaving the Collins River section, that he ordered them to stop there, but that they escaped then, although he shot to puncture the tires of the machine.

When the three in the automobile arrived in Tracy City, they were lost in some back streets and a short while later were seen coming down the main street.

Griswold and Woodlee again ordered them to stop, it is claimed, and again the driver refused to heed their warning. Woodlee reopened fire, but instead of striking the tire at which he aimed one bullet went through Stoner's back. He died Tuesday morning.

Stoner is survived by his widow and three children. Funeral services were conducted to-day at his home.

MRS. A. D. MAY

Mrs. A. D. May, of Nellis, Boone County, died at 11 o'clock this morning in the McMillan Hospital of a bullet wound inflicted Sunday night when officers served a liquor warrant upon Fleming Ramsey, a boarder at the May home.

The officers, Sam Morrow, State prohibition agent, and Constable Clinton Carnes, of Peytona district, were arrested by order of the Boone County sheriff and placed in the county jail at Madison for hearing to-morrow afternoon before Magistrate C. F. Hager, of Scott district.

Last night Mrs. May signed a statement declaring that Sam Morrow fired the shot that hit her. This statement was mailed to the sheriff's office at Madison last night. Dr. W. A. McMillan telephoned there yesterday after Mr. May had told the story and the men were arrested upon that information. The officers were held without bail until the hearing.

Sunday night the officers appeared at the May residence and, producing a warrant, demanded the surrender of Ramsey. The man attempted to run from the house and escape. The officers then, according to Mr. May, fired several times. Ramsey stopped and he was taken at once to a district justice of the peace and arraigned for being drunk. May obtained medical aid for his wife and brought her to Charleston, arriving here early yesterday morning.

When arrested yesterday the officers said they did not know that Mrs. May had been shot during the raid.

Mrs. May was to become a mother soon, it was said at the hospital to-day.

OSCAR BROOKS

BRANTLEY, ALA., January 5, 1927.—Oscar Brooks, 45, farmer, was shot and instantly killed this afternoon when Town Marshal John Lord and a deputy attempted to raid his home in search of liquor and were resisted.

After firing the fatal shot officers proceeded to search the home and found one gallon of whisky. Brooks leaves a wife and four children.

JAMES LEE AND DAUGHTER

DETROIT, MICH., May 13, 1927 (by A. P.).—Taking his motor launch out for a trial trip on the Detroit River early to-night, James Lee and a 6-year-old daughter were killed when an unidentified Federal prohibition patrol boat crashed into it amidships while traveling at a high rate of speed.

Police of the harbor masters' division said the Government boat failed to stop after the accident.

FLORENCE DE PRIEST

A subscriber sends us the following from the Hinton Daily News, which quotes it from the West Virginia News:

"Acting on a reckless statement of an irresponsible roustabout we learn from newspaper and other well-supported reports that another outrage was perpetrated in the name of prohibition enforcement near Alderson. On Wednesday before Christmas, 1926, a snooper working under or with Federal Prohibition Agent Boggs, of Hinton, it is said, appeared in Alderson to see what he could find, and using the public's money to bribe youth into crime, a gross immorality recommended or rather dictated by those who govern the alleged great moral forces of the Nation, met one Howard Adkins, a youth, and initiated a deal with him for the sum of $2.50 whereby Adkins was to secure for this agent of the Government some moonshine liquor. Adkins is reported to have told his seducer that he would get the liquor from Hazel Adkins, who was staying at the home of a poor but respectable family.

"Howard Adkins failed to return with any liquor and the snooper reported to his chief in Hinton the circumstances. Agent Boggs immediately dispatched himself to Alderson and gathering a gang of State police, as is customary, so that the largest possible number of officers may claim their separate fees for making an arrest, and all attacked the house of Alex De Priest, the alleged abode of the man from whom some liquor was to be obtained. A minute search of the De Priest home was instituted in a thoroughly indecent and, it was believed, entirely lawless manner without warrant.

"In this poor home at the time were two critical cases of typhoid fever. Notwithstanding that a daughter of the family, Florence, aged 18 years, was desperately ill at the time, her bed was searched, both pillows and the mattress under her being ransacked over the protest of a public-health nurse who was in charge at the time. The man being hunted was not found in the home. No evidence that the De Priests were criminals was found.

"The youth with whom the immoral deal of the alleged agent of good morals was made was then hunted up. He was found in bed, and when roused admitted he had lied to obtain the money from the agent for Christmas spending.

"The young girl whose bed was violated in this lawless and indecent manner died later.

"These details come to us as facts."

CHARLEY SINGLETON

Written by his wife

GEM, W. VA., January 23, 1927.

EDITORS OF THE CHRONICLE: Will you please give me just a little space of your paper so as I can correct the horrible mistakes that are circulated in regards to the cruel and horrible way my husband was shot down and murdered before my eyes, and I was not even able to get up and go to him, for my little baby was only 3 days old. The officers reported they emerged from the woods to the house. They did not do so. They came up the road past my husband's father's that just lives a little distance below my home, and came all the way up the road to my home; and another report that was a mistake—my husband did not come from the barn. He was at his shop shoeing a horse for his uncle. He saw the officers coming and came to the house to inform me of it, so as I would not be frightened. I will tell you just as I saw it with my own eyes. Two officers entered the door by the front way, just facing my bed, and two came in the back way. My husband met the two at the front way and they commanded a search; and he asked them to read him the warrant, and one of them came from the kitchen way and took some papers out of his pocket. Him and my husband were talking. The warrant was not as much as opened until one of the officers that was standing just on the front steps pushed the other officer back a little and drawed his gun and fired. I screamed and cried for him not to shoot my husband, and he did, and so that was the first shot; and then there were several shots fired. I did not see my husband as much as draw his gun. They shot him down and my little children all standing around him screaming and crying. When the smoke went out of the house so as I could see, my husband was lying with his head almost in the fire just in facing of my bed. The officer never much as came back to see about me or my little children, to see if we were all right. Oh, if every officer only knew how it hurts me to know that my husband was shot down for an unjust cause, they would not be too hasty and there would not be so much heartache and sorrow. If they had just went ahead and searched, so as they would have been convinced that they took his life for nothing that day, for there was nothing to be found. There were several shots fired right past my face and my bed from the door that opens from the kitchen. The shots all went in his back, except the one that went in from his left side. Mr. Humphries reported that they could get no immediate assistance in this community in caring for the wounded. That is all false reports, for my husband's own uncle took them into his house and gave them a good cot to lay on and also sent team with them to Burnsville, and that was more than they done for me. I am left with 10 small children, the oldest one a cripple one, to make my way. Mr. Skidmore went as far as to say before my husband's cousin that if the other officers had not been too hasty that would not happened.

EDDIE SIMMONS

(Special to the Tennessean)

FAYETTEVILLE, TENN., January 26.—Eddie Simmons, 22, of Smithland, died this morning as the result of a gunshot received in the back when he is alleged to have attempted to flee from officers who sought to arrest him near his home yesterday afternoon on charges of operating a still. Simmons's 16-year-old wife and his sister-in-law, Mrs. John Simmons, witnessed the shooting.

Conatser and Ashburn were members of a raiding party which further consisted of Sheriff O'Neal; his son, Robert O'Neal; and Deputy Knox Moore, all of the adjoining county of Franklin. According to reports the Federal man had asked the Franklin County officers to accompany him on the raid in the adjoining county.

A report issued from the office of Sheriff O'Neal this morning declared that Conatser and Ashburn, having discovered a still on Simmons's place, had separated themselves from the rest of the party to apprehend Simmons, whom they saw approaching his house at some distance. Twice they called to him to halt, and on the second order he paused. Then, the report goes, he ran, putting his house between himself and the officers.

A bullet was fired and the report from Sheriff O'Neal's office said it accidentally found its way into Simmons's back. He was brought to Lincoln County Hospital, and died this morning.

Later the raiding party declared two of the largest still worms that had come to their notice were found in the Simmons's home.

Simmons's 16-year-old wife and his sister-in-law, Mrs. John Simmons, declared, in a brief report, they had witnessed the shooting from the Simmons's home, and were pronounced in their statements that Ashburn fired the fatal bullet.

FAYETTEVILLE, TENN., January 31.—Brutus Ashburn, deputy sheriff of Franklin County, accused of murdering Ed. Simmons last Wednesday when he and a Federal officer rushed to the Simmons's home in Lincoln County in search of fugitives from a near-by still raid, was denied bail and bound over to circuit court by Magistrate J. R. Hancock, after preliminary hearing to-day.

Dr. R. E. McCown, physician, testified that the Springfield rifle bullet that killed Simmons entered the middle of his back and came out the breast, piercing the liver. Mrs. Ed. Simmons, 16, widow, and Mrs. Jim Simmons, sister-in-law of the victim, described the shooting.

The defense offered no evidence whatever.

United States District Attorney A. V. McLane, Assistant District Attorney Milton Davenport, and Prohibition Administrator W. B. Shofner were present, but took no part in the trial. Clay Conatser, Federal prohibition agent, was with Ashburn at the time of the shooting.

They said the officers made no statement of their business and did not show badges. Instead, they said, Ashburn, when he saw Simmons leaving the house, threw his gun to his shoulder and loaded it. Simmons saw the movement and started to run, according to the women, and was downed by a bullet in the back, fired by Ashburn, who was standing 150 yards away.

The two Mrs. Simmons denied Ed. Simmons had ever been engaged in making liquor, and said that he had been at the home a long time prior to the arrival of the two officers. He left his own house to go to the home of his brother, 300 yards away, they testified, to see a sick child, and then encountered the officers.

[From the Chicago Tribune Press Service, 1927]

E. P. W. INGMIRE

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 30—(Special).—Fifteen citizens slain by dry agents, and not one of the killers punished, thus far, is the record of the last 10 months under a prohibition-enforcement policy which invokes Federal court protection to balk State court prosecutions.

During the approximately eight years of prohibition the civilian death list chargeable to "hair trigger" liquor sleuths, has mounted to nearly 200. No estimate can be made, it is admitted by the Treasury Department, of the hundreds wounded or permanently disabled.

Although State courts have indicted dry agents for murder or manslaughter in many cases, the slayers, without exception, have found refuge in the Federal courts, where Federal district attorneys have acted under the revenue law, which gives the Federal courts sole jurisdiction in cases where revenue agents kill in line of duty.

Within the last week a Los Angeles (Calif.) Federal district judge, on the petition of the Government attorney, intervened to halt the State court trial of Frank Farley and George Hudson, Federal dry agents, charged with the murder of E. P. W. Ingmire, an oil company official.

Farley and Hudson, drunk and driving recklessly through the city streets, it is charged, collided with a car in which Ingmire was riding and the latter was killed. Although supposedly on the lookout for liquor violators, the dry agents were not actually pursuing a bootlegger when the fatal collision occurred.

F. M. FERGUSON

Another similar instance is disclosed in the 10 months' report, made public to-day. On October 25, 1926, Mack B. Lilly, a prohibition agent, assigned to the Huntington (W. Va.) district, was driving at high speed in pursuit of a suspected bootlegger, when he ran down and killed F. M. Ferguson, of Huntington. Lilly was arrested and charged with manslaughter. The district attorney is prepared to ask for a writ of habeas corpus transferring the case to the Federal court, according to the report.

THREE AT A TIME

On August 5, 1926, Agents W. M. Simmons, C. F. Standau, A. C. Givhan, and J. H. Shirley, returning to Miami, Fla., after a series of raids, engaged in a gun battle with several men and three of the latter were killed. A coroner's jury exonerated the agents, who declared they were attacked and opened fire in self-defense.

WILLIAM NIEDERMEIER

On December 3, 1926, Agents E. L. Benway and G. B. Pratt, assigned to patrol work near Huron River, Mich., observed what appeared to be a liquor smuggler's boat approaching the shore. No attention was paid to their hails and the agents fired three shots at the boat and the two men operating it declared they would surrender. One of the men, William Niedermeier, was ordered to hand their guns, and when he hesitated the dry agents opened fire simultaneously, killing Niedermeier.

Benway and Pratt were arrested, charged with manslaughter in the case of Neidermeier and assault in the case of his companion. Both were found not guilty on the manslaughter charge, but Benway was convicted on the assault charge and the district attorney, who appeared to defend the two agents, is now preparing to appeal from the verdict.

WADE HAMPTON

Agents A. G. Sutterfield and P. T. Graves on September 25, 1926, entered a negro dance hall at Chestang, Ala., to search for liquor. One of the negroes, Wade Hampton, refused to be searched, drew a revolver, and fired at Sutterfield, who returned the fire, killing the negro instantly. A grand jury exonerated Sutterfield.

JEFF PITTS

On September 23, 1926, Jeff Pitts, of Wesson, Miss., was surprised by Agent W. S. Newman near a still and fled at the command to surrender. Newman fired once, killing Pitts, and thus far no prosecution has been instituted.

LEWIS GREGORY

In another case Agent W. B. Stone, operating near Graveltown, Ky., raided the home of Lewis Gregory, and finding a small quantity of liquor sought to arrest the latter. Gregory, unarmed, threw stones at the agent, who drew a revolver and fired once. Gregory died from loss of blood a few hours later, and Stone was released from custody on his assertion that he was forced to kill in self-defense.

THOMAS A. JOHNSON

On March 4, 1927, Agent E. S. Forsythe raided a still near Eleven-Mile Creek, Fla., Thomas A. Johnson fled as Forsythe approached and plunged into a creek. Forsythe called for Johnson to return, and fired several shots into the air, he declared. Johnson was apparently overcome by the cold water and drowned. Forsythe was charged with manslaughter on complaint of Johnson's father and released on bond pending a preliminary hearing, which has not yet been had.

In three other cases prohibition agents who pleaded self-defense were exonerated by coroners' juries or grand juries which investigated the killings.

JOHN H. ZOLLERS

On May 14, 1926, John H. Zollers was out riding with a schoolteacher, Miss Goldie Robb, and was automobiling in the country near North Platte in the evening. Two prohibition men, G. H. Runyon and Harry Johnson, of Omaha and North Platte, respectively, called on Zollers to halt. He didn't, and Johnson fired a shot which passed through Zollers's neck. Zollers continued driving, thinking the men were bandits; took Miss Robb home; drove to a hospital and died within an hour.

ANDERSON GREEN

Rev. G. W. Gant, of Knoxville, was, in 1921, superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League for east Tennessee and the executive secretaryship of the Knox County Enforcement League. On September 5, 1923, he was notified by Mayor Ellis, of Jefferson City, to rid the place of illicit liquor. He assumed the name of Mr. Shoot.

On September 28 of the same year he arranged to purchase some liquor from Sam Bailey, Anderson Green, and the latter's son, Claude Green. An argument arose. Green, the father, becoming finally exasperated, started to leave with the liquor on his shoulder when Reverend Gant drew a pistol and shouted to the three men to hold up their hands, at the same time firing a shot toward Green's feet. Green dropped the liquor and started to run, Gant running after him and firing several shots. A prohibition agent who had been hiding near by joined the chase and began firing as the other two men started to run. Green was shot in the back and died several days later. He made a deathbed statement saying that Gant was the man who killed him.

CHALMERS M'ALPINE

Sheriff Benton Adams and Federal Officers Hiram Allen, John Draper, Joe Stanford, and Robert P. Ferguson visited the township of Muscadine, Cleburne County, Ala., October 31, 1921, in search of a still. The officers said they found a still and were informed that Chalmers McAlpine, aged 20, had a partnership in it. They proceeded to McAlpine's place of employment and found the youth fixing an automobile. McAlpine started to run. Ferguson, using his left arm for a rest, fired three times, a bullet entering McAlpine's back and killing him instantly.

The Treasury report of this case states that McAlpine turned upon the officers with a pistol in his hand, but the facts remain that no pistol was found and that McAlpine was shot in the back.

FROM SHOT IN THE BACK—PLAIN TALK, DECEMBER, 1927, BY SENATOR EDWARD I. EDWARDS

We print an additional list of 13 killings taken from the Senator's article. Comments therein are those of Senator EDWARDS.

Turn to a very few of the camouflaging reports from the United States Treasury Department. Please note the phrases quoted:

JESS COFFEY—FACTS OF THE CASE

On March 28, 1923, Prohibition Agent Benjamin H. Crumption, accompanied by some sheriffs, raided an illicit distillery near Muscadine, Ala., operated by Jess Coffey. Coffey attempted to escape and Crumption "fired to his right trying to stop him. His foot slipped, causing the gun to swerve to the left, and as a result Coffey was shot and later died."

CARL THERNES—FACTS OF THE CASE

On March 26, 1925, Prohibition Agent Tucker, accompanied by two local officers, went to a farm where it was believed a still was being operated 6 miles from Britton, Okla. Upon arrival at the place the officers found one Albert Berry and one Carl Thernes operating two stills. After the moonshiners were placed under arrest Thernes started "to run away, at the same time, stooping over to pick up what was believed to be a weapon. Agent Tucker, believing that Thernes intended to fire at him from near-by bushes, shot and killed him."

MARCUS FARRELL—FACTS OF THE CASE

On the night of May 10, 1925, Prohibition Agents Mathew and Raney, accompanied by a citizen, went to a point 2½ miles from Raywick, Ky., where four men were found operating a still. The agents and man accompanying them surrounded the still. While Agent Mathew was attempting to take into custody one Evard Mattingley and one Marcus Farrell "his revolver was accidentally discharged," killing Farrel instantly.

There are a number of cases in prohibition killings in which the victim met his death by "accidental discharge" of weapons.

LESLIE BRITT—FACTS OF THE CASE

Agent J. G. Griffin while on a raid in Southampton County, Va., came upon a man by the name of Leslie Britt, "whom [sic] the agent believed was about to wound him." In self-defense Agent Griffin shot him and he died later in the hospital.

BEE LILLY—FACTS OF THE CASE

On April 1, 1925, Prohibition Agent Simmons, accompanied by three State officers surrounded a still on the headwaters of Beaver Creek, near Beckley, W. Va. Two men were seen operating the still. Upon these men ascertaining the persons of the officers they started to run. One of them carried in his hand "what appeared to be a rifle" and it was apparent he was seeking the shelter of a tree. The officers "believed he was about to fire upon them" from ambush and shot at him. He was instantly killed.

HARRY CARLTON

On March 11, 1920, Stewart McMullin, deputy revenue collector, accompanied by two other agents, shot and killed Harry Carlton in an East Side New York flat. In court McMullin testified that Carlton attacked him and his two companions with a knife. That a man armed with a knife should attack three burly agents all armed with guns seems most improbable, and, of course, no knife was ever produced as evidence, and witnesses said that Carlton was shot while his hands were above his head. But this is not the half of it. McMullin, who did the shooting, had served four years in prison for passing bad checks in Fort Worth, Tex.; was sentenced to eight years for doing the same thing in Indianapolis, and was sentenced from five to nine years in New York for highway robbery.

Do you know how and when he got this job? He actually landed himself in the United States Department of Justice by "squealing" while he was incarcerated in Dannemora. His next step was to get himself into the narcotic squad and then into the Prohibition Unit. At this last work he received a salary of $125 a month and lived at the Hotel Claridge in New York City!

When he was 14 years old he killed a man by hitting him with a rock and was fined $50 and costs for involuntary manslaughter. McMullin had lived under various names: Stuart Nelson, John H. Ramsey, John Conway, and John Murphy.

A few days preceding the murder McMullin had arrested a man for taking $2,500 "protection" money from a bootlegger.

WILLIAM TILGHMAN

Over the main street of Cromwell, Okla., on the night of November 2, 1924, rattled a Ford touring car, carrying two men and two women. The driver of the machine parked in front of the Marie Murphy dance hall, got out, and, feeling gay and kittenish, fired a shot from his revolver. William Tilghman, peace officer, hastened out, and rushing over to the gun artist, grappled with him. A bystander came to the assistance of Tilghman and snatched the gun away from the owner of the Ford. Tilghman, thinking the man was now unarmed, was about to leave, when the gunman drew a second revolver and fired three shots into the body of Tilghman, who sank to the street as his assailant leaped into the car and sped away. The fallen officer died 15 minutes later.

Tilghman came to Cromwell in September, 1924, to act as city marshal. He also bore a commission from the governor. He was a prime mover in the breaking up of the Dalton gang, the Doolin gang, and the Al Jennings gang. The most daring act credited to Tilghman was the capture alive of Bill Doolin at Eureka Springs, after the outlaw had said he would never be taken while he breathed. It is said of Tilghman that he never in his life shot a man unless it was absolutely necessary. He was chief of police of Oklahoma City, and as late of 1915 he gave up his private affairs to the planning and capture of the notorious Henry Starr bank-robber gang.

Who was this skilled desperado who had slain him? None other than Wyley Lynn, member of the Federal prohibition forces.

W. F. DEMENT

In Washington, D. C., William Frank Dement, driver of an alleged rum-running Cadillac automobile, was shot down by Washington's flying police squadron on April 13, 1927, Policeman G. C. Deyoe, Motor Cycle Policeman William A. Schotter, and Sergeant Little participating. There was no gun in Dement's car. Sergeant Little's excuse was that the car threw up a smoke screen, but the car failed to reveal a device so costly that only navies and military airplanes can afford them.

Fifteen shots were fired by the police. The companion of Dement, Austin F. Jarboe, was not struck by bullets, but the police hauled him out of the car, then smashing him in the face, and knocking him unconscious to the ground. The police, when they turned in their report, failed to mention any shooting whatever.

LAWRENCE WENGER

On November 19, 1925, Federal Prohibition Agents John M. Barton, Robert D. Ford, Wilton L. Stevens, and E. Franklin Ely, accompanied by William Trabing, who acted as chauffeur, proceeded from Baltimore to Madonna in Upper Harford County, Md. They discovered what appeared to be, in the words of the Treasury Department, "a still in the process of construction," and secreted themselves to await the supposed owner. In a short time three men approached—Abraham Woods, James Patterson, and Lawrence Weger—all farmers. The prohibition agents jumped from their hiding place, and shots were fired. Patterson narrowly escaped death with a bullet through his coat. The agents decided to leave, apparently being satisfied with their day's labor. On their way to their machine they "discovered" Lawrence Wenger mortally wounded—shot in the back—under some bushes. He died within a few hours.

CHARLES B. GUNDLACH

Charles B. Gundlach, 67-year-old St. Marys County, Md., farmer, was shot and killed, 1927, by prohibition agents who raided his farm without a warrant and found no still. Prohibition Agents Randolph Brewer, Robert F. Cornet, Dano Jackley, and John T. Fisher say that the farmer fired on them as they came on his property. A man whose property is being invaded without a warrant is permitted under the law to use as much force as may be reasonably necessary to repel the invaders. "Reasonably necessary" may be interpreted in various ways. Actually, it means enough force under the circumstances of each case to evict the invader.

Gundlach warned the officers off the place before the shooting began and the officers did not heed the warning. Gundlach did not leave his porch, but stood on the threshold of his house, which, under the circumstances, he had a right to protect. After the shooting began Gundlach fell down wounded. His wife rushed out and took away his weapons, a shotgun and a pistol, and tried to drag him back into the house, but the rain of bullets was so sustained that she was forced to retreat. After this, while her husband lay prostrate, Brewer came up to the house, put his pistol to the head of the man and put a bullet through his brain, she said. Brewer entered the house. Facing only a woman, he apparently no longer needed a warrant. A physician testified that the bullet through the brain of Gundlach was the only one of four wounds which would have caused instant death. This from Dr. F. F. Greenwell, of Leonardtown, Md.

MURDEROUS ASSAULTS AND OUTRAGES BY OFFICERS

An enforcement agent, a married man, courted a 19-year-old girl and proposed marriage to her, with the object of entrapping her in a violation of the prohibition laws.

There is no question of the facts in the case, for they were brought out at a hearing before United States Commissioner Supplee in Baltimore on August 24, 1925. The agent in question was John T. Williams, working directly under Harry M. Luckett, chief of Washington dry agents, and almost directly under Gen. Lincoln C. Andrews, head of the dry enforcement department. Williams stated that Luckett ordered him to "go the limit" to secure the arrest and conviction of Miss Sallie Canada, daughter of Mrs. Sadie Canada, storekeeper and postmistress at Glen Echo, Md. Williams obeyed. He spent a month courting the girl, who had no idea of his identity as a "dry" sleuth. "I told her I loved her and asked her to marry me," he testified before the commissioner. Prior to that, according to the girl, he called her up four or five times a day, took her to hotels for dinner, brought her many boxes of candy, and told her he was a single man. Later on he "admitted" he was a widower with two children, but at length she discovered that he was married and told him "it was all off between them."

The evidence on which Williams had the girl arrested, after having wooed her up to the point of a marriage proposal, is given by the Washington News of August 28, as follows:

"One evening the couple were out driving in the agent's car. He said he wanted a drink and knew where to get it. Stopping the car at a certain point, he said he was afraid to leave it, and asked the girl to 'run down to the river' and get him a pint of whisky. She consented, and he gave her $4 for the purchase price. She came back with the liquor; he offered her some, which she refused, and then he drank most of it on the spot. A week or so later, on the pretext that he wanted half a gallon of gin 'for a party,' he asked her to get it at the same source of supply and to keep it for him until he called. The girl got the liquor and concealed it in the yard back of her mother's store.

"When Williams called he had a woman with him who, the girl learned afterwards, was his wife. He had brought his wife for a witness, although the trustful and, no doubt, somewhat enamored youngster, knew nothing about that and had no suspicion of her impending betrayal. She delivered the gin to Williams, who thereupon placed her under arrest and then proceeded to raid her mother's store. Not a drop of liquor was found on the premises."

To the credit of Commissioner Supplee, when the facts were presented to him, he threw the case out of court. He dismissed charges against Miss Canada of "possession and sale of liquor." "If all liquor cases were as hard as this to make," he observed, "there would be no need for employment of Federal agents to enforce the law."

The case created such a scandal in Washington and Baltimore that the Prohibition Department had to do something to clean its skirts. What did it do? Only a few days ago it dismissed Agent Williams from the service. Agent Williams, who was carrying out the order of his superior, Luckett, who is one of the chief of staff of Gen. Lincoln C. Andrews.

HARRY BROWN

CHARLESTON, April 20, 1925.—Harry Brown, 20 a school-teacher in the Flat Mountain School, a few miles from here, lies in a local hospital at the point of death as a result of being fired upon by prohibition agents as a result of his failure to heed their command to stop while driving an automobile from Pence Springs to Alderson about 10 o'clock last night. According to information obtained to-day by local authorities, six bullets were fired at Brown after he declined to stop, one hitting him, and became lodged in the base of his spine. Officials were told that he continued to drive his car for 3 miles after having been shot, when his injury rendered him unconscious. He has not since regained consciousness, and hospital authorities to-night held little hope for his recovery.

Brown is believed by officials to have taken the prohibition officers for hold-up men. His father is a prominent farmer at Dropping Lick, near Union, and is one of the best-known families in Greenbrier Valley. (Editorial from Wheeling Register, Wheeling, W. Va., April 21, 1925.)

The Charleston (W. Va.) Daily Mail of April 30 states that physicians have little hope for his recovery. He lies paralyzed in a hospital at Alderson.

[From the Louisville (Ky.) Post, June 20, 1927]

The shooting of three children near Olive Hill, Ky., by a constable and three deputies looking for bootleggers should again remind us that there are other laws than the Volstead Act, other rights than those of constables, and other dangers than those of moonshine. The Volstead law is the law and should be enforced. But, like every other law, it must be enforced lawfully.

The officers were looking for a bootlegger in a Ford. Imagine it, looking for a Ford. The children, 12 and 13 years of age, had been swimming. Driving home singing, they were told to halt, were fired upon, and all of whom were wounded.

The children were singing and could not hear the command to halt.

The fact is that the coming of the automobile and the bandit have altered the whole situation in which the law of warrant and search operates. Formerly persons were seldom stopped by officers at night, and when they were, when walking or driving a buggy, they could see that those who accosted them were officers of the law.

Now, it is impossible to distinguish a badge from a car at night, and the man who stops because some unknown orders him, is taking big chances. The Volstead law should be enforced, but not at all costs. If the Volstead law were the only law; if the right not to have liquor sold were the only right; if being shot were not quite as unpleasant as being half shot, we could put up with these fanatics with guns. It is bad enough when enforcement officers deliberately throw flashlights into the eyes of passing motorists, as was done one night this week on the Preston Street Road, with the result that a serious accident was narrowly avoided. But when enforcement of one law requires the shooting of singing children returning from the swimming hole it is time to call a halt.

Senator James W. Wadsworth, jr., on November 18, 1921, in a speech in the Senate told how a farmer, William E. Weisheit, and his son, of Glenmont, were held up by three ununiformed armed men at night, and because they did not halt when ordered, were fired at and the father was shot in the leg. They were returning from market, having disposed of their produce and having no liquor on their motor truck.

They believed they were held up by highwaymen. (See CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 61, 67th Cong., pp. 7886 and 7887.)

R. E. Ganter, chief Federal agent, is reported by the Albany Evening Journal to have said:

"That while the 'accident' was unfortunate, his men were justified in what they did, and he saw no way to avoid similar 'accidents' in the future unless every citizen ordered to halt by a prohibition enforcement agent obeyed promptly."

In December, 1921, Green Miller, a Federal agent, while conducting a raid on the premises of S. L. Dowd, 281 Watchung Avenue, West Orange, shot two young men, by name William Stanton, of West Orange, and James McFarland, of East Orange. Gustave G. Wolber, of G. Wolber & Co., Newark, N. J., states that he saw two young men running away when the shots were fired and he saw one fall.

Other witnesses state that the second man was hit in the back when fully 50 feet away. Both men were taken to the hospital, and for a while their lives were despaired of.

Miller was indicted by the Essex County grand jury, but was never tried, as the United States authorities took the case from the hands of the State of New Jersey, and there to this day the matter rests.

Was Green Miller prosecuted by the Federal authorities? He was not, but instead he was promoted to the office of chief prohibition officer of Kentucky, his native State. The Couzens committee can obtain complete data in this case from the prosecutor of the pleas, Newark, N. J.

The Newport News (Va.) Press, of September 18, 1923, in an editorial comments as follows upon an outrage committed by Federal agents in Warwick County, Va., shortly before that date:

Recently in Warwick County Federal prohibition officers shot up a law-abiding citizen while on his way to Newport News with a load of innocent farm products, and it was only by good luck that he was not killed by the bullets of his assailants. These officers were indicted by a Warwick County grand jury, but the case was arbitrarily taken out of the circuit court by a peremptory order of the judge of the United States District Court in Norfolk. This infamous assault was made upon a citizen of Warwick while traveling along the road in his own county. But the trial of his assailants is to be held in a Federal court beyond the confines of Warwick.

The other night two young women who are connected with the Y. W. C. A. of Asheville, N. C., were driving along the Greenville-Henderson pike. Suddenly two men sprang from the roadside and commanded them to halt. The young women, thinking they were about to be held up by robbers, put on speed in an attempt to escape, whereupon one or both of the men fired several shots at the rapidly moving car. One bullet punctured a tire, and the car came to a standstill. The men came forward and revealed their identity as prohibition agents. They thought the car containing the young women was being driven by them and that it contained whisky. With profuse apologies, the ladies were allowed to proceed. It is not stated whether the prohibition officers helped them repair their punctured tire. (Petersburg (Va.) Index, April 13, 1923.)

MRS. PETER SANDERS

GLENS FALLS, N. Y., January 7 (A. P.).—State Troopers W. G. Dashley and J. R. Cannon, of Troop B, Malone Barracks, were arrested to-day charged with first-degree assault for the shooting of Mrs. Peter Sanders, of Chestertown, on the highway near Loon Lake on the night of December 29. Dashley and Cannon waived examination and were held for the grand jury. They furnished bail of $5,000 each.

A warrant has been issued for the arrest of Hubert Holliwell, a deputy sheriff of Essex County, on the same charge. Holliwell was with the troopers when Mrs. Sanders was shot.

The woman, with her husband and two children, was driving their automobile when she was accosted by the troopers, who said they thought the car was transporting liquor. Mrs. Sanders, thinking the men were bandits, sped away. A shot was fired, and Mrs. Sanders suffered buckshot wounds in the head and neck. It is believed that she will recover.

[Authority: The Newark Evening News, June 7, 1923]

On the Whippany Road, near Columbia Road, a funeral party, returning from New Haven, Conn., was stopped and the vehicles (the hearse and an automobile) and the passengers were searched by State Trooper Smith for liquor—none was found. There were two women and two men in the automobile—they were searched.

MILFORD, CONN., October 17, 1923.—The local police, directed by Chief of Police Maher, held up the funeral cortege of James Fuller, a garage proprietor, of 526 Park Avenue, Weehawken, N. J., as it was passing through their town on its way to a cemetery in Litchfield to-day and hunted through the hearse and cars for liquor. None was found, but Mrs. May Fuller, the widow, fainted as the flowers and wreaths were taken from the coffin. The procession was delayed more than an hour by the searchers.

Chief Maher told members of the funeral party that a resident of Devon, through which the cortege had passed, had informed him that the casket and carriages contained thousands of dollars' worth of liquor being smuggled into the State. After the coffin had been rearranged and the flowers replaced Chief Maher apologized and the carriages were permitted to continue toward Litchfield. (New York Herald, October 17, 1923.)

[From the Norfolk (Nebr.) Daily News, July 8, 1925]

JAMES JONES

NELIGH, NEBR., July 8 (special to the News).—Under charges of shooting with intent to kill, Ernest Gallaway, special officer at Oakdale, who Monday night at Oakdale shot and severely wounded James Jones, a young Tilden man, was taken by Sheriff J. A. Sutton and Deputy Sheriff W. C. Finicle to the Dodge County jail for safe-keeping.

Gallaway fired several shots at the automobile which Jones was driving after ordering the car to stop. One bullet took effect, striking Jones in the breast, glancing upward, and passed through the upper portion of the lung and came out after passing through the arm. The bullet was found in the car.

The young man is in the employ of Will Harris, of Tilden, in the clothing store, is about 22 years of age, and an orphan. It is said that since his residence in Tilden he has gained an excellent reputation and is admired by many people of that place.

For the past two months or more Mr. Gallaway has been a special officer of Oakdale. He has gained quite a reputation during this time in causing the arrest of many liquor violators and making life a burden for alleged bootleggers, who in the past have caused endless grief at the community dances.

According to Mr. Gallaway, he surmised that liquor was in hiding in the vicinity of the Oakdale mill, where the officer was at the time the automobile drove along. In consequence, he ordered it stopped.

In case Jones dies, the charge against Gallaway will be changed to murder, it is said.

Jones, who was driving the car which was fired upon by Gallaway, said he stopped the car as soon as he could after hearing the officer's command.

The two boys, both of whom are highly respected in Tilden, were driving down a side street in Oakdale when Gallaway jumped out from a clump of bushes and ordered them to stop. Jones, he said, reached down to pull up the emergency brake in an effort to stop the car, but Gallaway fired two shots, which went wild. Then, according to the story, Gallaway leaped upon the running board of the car and fired directly at Jones, the bullet entering his breast between the second and third shirt button and passed out in the armpit. Alva Saxton, the other boy in the car, was not struck by the bullets.

[From the Columbus (Ga.) Enquirer-Sun, June 16, 1926]

Harrison B. Collins, a Delaware farmer with his wife and children, was riding in his automobile along a highway on the night of May 25. He had no liquor in his car and he was violating no traffic law. Men on the side of the highway called to him to halt. Frightened by the unexpected demand, instead of obeying and risking a hold-up, he drove more rapidly. The men who had tried to halt him opened fire upon the car and its occupants, one of the bullets striking the shoe of Collins's young daughter. The men pursued the fleeing car and eventually overtook it, and, being prohibition enforcement officers, they searched it. There was no liquor in it.

[From the Akron (Ohio) Journal, 1926]

Such a tragedy as has come to Steubenville was certain sooner or later to occur under the present haphazard and varying method of enforcing the prohibition laws. Frank Risler, foreman in one of the large tin-plate mills of that section of the Ohio Valley, returned to his home to find his family in alarm over the invasion of the house by three enforcement agents, had a gun in his hand while he was chief of the party what he was doing there, the answer was returned: "None of your damned business." A bullet through the heart killed the officer, and his assistants fled before the invitation of Mr. Risler to "come out of the cellar and get their medicine."

After surrendering to the police, Mr. Risler said that the enforcement agent had a gun in his hand while he was in the house, and that no warrant was read nor information given as to who he was. "I am not going to lie about it," he continued. "I shot him, and I suppose I would have done the same thing to the others had they not hidden in the cellar. I didn't know who they were and they wouldn't tell me."

[From the Meadville (Pa.) Tribune Republican, September 9, 1926]

Four county and city police, laying in wait for a rum-running car, have been revealed as the supposed "bandits" who fired upon Lloyd Kastor, driver of a Chevrolet sedan, and his party of two women and one man Tuesday evening.

Kastor had turned his machine from the improved road on to the old Franklin Pike and had progressed only a few hundred feet before he drew up alongside the road and extinguished the lights on his machine. A hundred feet farther along the road the four officers—County Detective John L. Laley, Sheriff Charles H. Jones, Chief of Police L. M. Hays, and Patrolman Edward C. Gibson—were hiding in the bushes at the edge of the road, waiting for the appearance of a liquor-transporting automobile regarding which they had been "tipped" was to arrive at about 9 o'clock.

The officers' conclusion was that Kastor's machine was the rum runner, while Kastor, when he was approached by one of the four men, was just as thoroughly convinced that it was an attempted holdup. None of the officers wore uniforms, it was said, and the driver of the machine started up and raced down the road, unknowing that three other men were hiding in the bushes 100 feet from the spot where he had parked. As he went past the officers opened fire, puncturing the tires and then firing at the machine when it failed to halt.

All four tires of the machine were sniped by the gunmen, who were evidently experienced marksmen, while other shots took effect about the rear of the sedan. Holes, apparently caused by a revolver of .38 caliber, were shot through the body of the machine, while there was also evidence that a shotgun had been employed by the bandits.

That none of the four persons in the machine were killed, or at least seriously wounded, is marveled at by the many people who have inspected the sedan, as the machine was literally peppered with bullet holes.

DOROTHY CARRINGTON

NORFOLK, VA., December 16, 1926.—The State is aroused over the use of bullets by O. A. Hanby, State prohibition agent, which resulted in the wounding of Miss Dorothy Carrington, daughter of the Rev. J. W. Carrington, of Cape Charles. The shooting occurred in Northampton County, on the eastern shore of Virginia. The officer opened fire, it is charged, because the car was not stopped at his order to halt.

Owners of at least 10 other cars have complained that their automobiles were peppered by the dry agent because they refused to stop on dark roads at the command to halt.

Virginia newspapers are demanding the prosecution of the officer. Miss Carrington is in a hospital at Cape Charles suffering from two bullet wounds. The officer has been suspended from duty, and legal authorities are considering presenting his case to the grand jury.

Miss Carrington was in the automobile with a friend and when some person, whom they did not see, sprang out in the darkness and commanded that the car be stopped, her companion refused to obey. Then the officer fired four shots at the car, two bullets striking the young woman.

[Special dispatch to the World]

ATLANTIC CITY, July 18, 1927.—Starting for a fishing trip off this resort in a 26-foot motor boat at dawn Friday, Alfred C. Reed, boardwalk rolling chair concessionnaire and banker, and John Ordille, secretary and treasurer of the Renault Wine Co., Egg Harbor, N. J., were fired upon nine times by three Coast Guard men, one bullet striking their boat, they charged to-day.

They were taken into custody and were handcuffed and shackled for two hours, they said, but were released, with apologies, after being taken to Coast Guard Base No. 1, here. They lodged formal protests to-day with Commander John Boedecker, in charge of the base, and with United States Senator EDGE and Representative ALBERT BACHARACH.

"The shooting and arrest," Mr. Reed said to-day, "occurred at 4.45 o'clock Friday morning, when we were leaving on a fishing trip. It was dawn. We heard no command to halt, but when the first shot crossed our bow we stopped the engine immediately. Eight other shots—one of them striking our vessel—were fired before the cutter came alongside.

"We were handcuffed and our feet tied for two hours while being taken to base headquarters. Lieut. Commander Henry G. Hemmingway, in charge at the time, ordered our release and expressed his regrets.

"The occurrence was an outrage. The Coast Guard men said we were running without lights, although it was daylight, and that we failed to answer commands to halt. No such commands were heard, possibly because of the strong wind. In any event, our boat could make only 12 miles an hour, while the cutter could do 22. They could easily have caught up to us without firing. We revealed our identities and made no remonstrance. There was absolutely no need for the humiliation of handcuffs and shackles."

In Washington, D. C., on July 4, 1927, the police arrested a man whose auto had accidentally collided with one driven by a local detective. The citizen, whose injuries were such that he could not walk or even stand, was examined by an Emergency Hospital doctor, who reported his condition due to intoxication. He was locked up, charged with that offense and with reckless driving. After he had laid four hours on the floor of a cell in the police station unable to move, the doctor was again summoned and again could find nothing wrong except to allege intoxication. In order "to play safe," as the report goes, the victim was removed to another hospital, where he died. An autopsy revealed that death had resulted from "twisted vertebræ of the neck." The report of the case also stated: "There was no evidence of alcoholism." Further information is contained in press headlines, which state: "Coroner's Jury Exonerates Hospital Doctor and Police."

WOMAN FACES LIFE SENTENCE

CHICAGO, May 18 (A. P.).—Home-brew found in the house of Mrs. Mary Tokarz, Muskegon, Mich., may, like Fred Palm's pint of whisky, write prohibition history in Michigan.

Mrs. Tokarz, 40 years old and a mother, was arrested here last night for Muskegon authorities. The brew had been found in her home following her daughter's wedding. At liberty under bond, she came to Chicago, where she has been working in a laundry.

The still from which the officers had come was a mile away in Warren's Hollow, which is about 6 miles from the Franklin County line.

Michigan's habitual criminal law provides that three previous felony convictions make a life sentence mandatory.

Mrs. Tokarz, Chicago police were told, was found guilty on three former occasions, each case involving a liquor-law violation, a felony in Michigan. It was fear of the life penalty, she said, that prompted her to flee her bond and come here.

Telephone calls from her husband in Muskegon were traced, resulting in Mrs. Tokarz's arrest. She sobbed her story to detectives and pleaded for mercy.

Fred Palm, of Lansing, Mich., is now serving a life sentence under similar circumstances. When arrested for possession of a pint of whisky, Palm was found to have had previous convictions on felony charges, leaving the court no alternative but to impose a life sentence. Palm has appealed to the State supreme court, attacking the constitutionality of the law.

NEW ALBANY, IND., August 10, 1928 (A. P.).—Claude Smith, 16 years old, was shot in the left arm early to-day when prohibition agents, under W. O. Holman, of Indianapolis, raided the home of James Smith, 53, 3 miles north of Hardinsburg. The youth's arm later was amputated.

Five other persons were arrested in the raid and the agents said they found a 150-gallon still, 13 barrels of mash, and 2 quarts of whisky. The condition of the wounded youth, due to shock and loss of blood, was said to be critical.

TOLEDO, August 14, 1928.—The sixth of a series of attacks on peaceful pleasure yachts on Lake Erie was reported yesterday when it was learned that two boats owned by influential Toledo men had been fired on Monday by a Coast Guard unit near Catawba Cliffs, fashionable summer colony.

One investigation had previously been made of the Toledo situation by Washington officials, in which it was disclosed Coast Guard gunners were firing live shells because they had run out of blank charges.

Socially prominent women in the parties fired on Monday were in hysterics after the yachts had been stopped by Coast Guard bullets and then boarded by guardsmen in search of liquor. The yachts were permitted to proceed.

Girls in a girl scout camp near Catawba Cliffs were among those endangered by Coast Guard gunfire.

The yachts which were the subjects of Monday's firing were owned by Carlton Baumgardner, wholesale dry-goods merchant, and Lloyd Hixon, lumber dealer. Among the passengers was Mrs. Webb Haye, wife of a lieutenant commander of the United States Navy.

Toledo indignation over gunfire from coast patrols first arose when on July 5 the Priscilla, a yacht owned by Thomas H. Devilbiss, manufacturer, returned from an inspection of his Canadian branch factories at Windsor, Ontario. A patrol boat without lights fired across the Priscilla's bow and proceeded in the dark without making any explanation.

The yacht of Walter S. Hayes, grandson of the late President Hayes, was twice fired on by Coast Guard patrols. Hayes addressed a complaint to Secretary Mellon, who promised an investigation.

Mellon informed Hayes the shots fired were "probably blanks." But on the second attack on his boat Coast Guard men admitted they were live shells. Hayes again protested to Mellon, who to date has not replied.

CLINTON, ILL., September 28, 1928.—John G. Berliew, a dry agent, was arraigned in the circuit court to-day charged with kidnaping and contributing to the delinquency of Mildred Brown, 14, of Weldon Springs. The evidence showed that when Berliew met the child he was employed by the State's attorney of De Witt County to run down Volstead law violators.

Berliew, it is charged, lured the girl away from her home and used her in his efforts to trap Volstead violators. Last Sunday he registered her in a Taylorville hotel under an assumed name as his wife. They remained in the hotel three days.

Berliew learned that De Witt County authorities were sending notices over the State offering a reward of $100 for his arrest. Fearing a penitentiary sentence, he took the girl before a police magistrate and they were married. Berliew was arrested. The child was held until her mother arrived and took her home.

He is now held under $11,000 bonds on the kidnaping charge and the delinquency charge. He also is held on three charges of perjury for filing allegedly false affidavits while he was procuring liquor evidence and another charge of violating the prohibition laws.

MERLE ADAMS

CHICAGO, August 21, 1928.—"Hard-boiled" George Golding's special prohibition squad "got their man" to-day in the City Hall Square Building, across the street from the courthouse. They shot him and blackjacked him and kept him for half an hour while they questioned him, and then finally learned that his name was Merle Adams, an insurance agent, of 1348 Hood Avenue. To-night he was reported near death at St. Luke's Hospital.

For a half hour after the shooting occupants of the building were terrorized by brandished revolvers and curt commands to "get back in your office; we're Government men."

When the police came they were told, "Stay out; we don't need you."

Finally Miss Ann Carey, a lawyer with offices in the building, decided some one ought to call a doctor, and she did so. The wounded man, who was shot above the heart, was then taken out of the offices which the Government men suspected of being the headquarters of a liquor syndicate.

The shooting startled the loop building, and it was hours before quiet was restored. Adams was shot on the eighth floor, pursued to the second floor and beaten, then forced to go back up to the eighth floor.

A guard stood over the wounded man at the hospital when newspaper men sought to obtain the facts concerning the shooting. A special enforcer of Golding's squad, Robert Coyne, had given the hospital attachés orders to permit no one to see him but his wife. She denied that Adams was a bootlegger.

Golding came here last spring from New York City, where he had been a policeman. He has led a squad of dry agents in numerous raids armed with sawed-off shotguns and pistols, but was reported to be out of the city during to-day's raid. His assistant, E. Avis, assumed charge at the City Hall Square Building and threatened to smash cameras or faces if any pictures were taken.

Capt. John Horan, of the police department, obtained the names of the three agents who conducted the raid. The one who fired the shots was said to be Arthur Franklin, and his companions were James Evans and Edward P. Gill.

Asked if the Government raiders had a warrant, Captain Horan said he understood they had not. Asked if any liquor was found in the rooms, he said he understood there was none.

[From the South Bend (Ind.) News, June 6, 1928]

Two Federal prohibition officers gathered up two girls, one 20 years old and the other 16, and took them to a cabin near Clinton, Mo., on a balmy night in April. They took plenty of liquor along and spent the night in drinking and carousing.

The State of Missouri indicted the two men for transportation of liquor and for giving it to the girls.

The Federal authorities stepped into the case, as usual, dragged the two officers out of the State courts through the accustomed habeas corpus proceedings and now sends an assistant United States attorney to act as chief of their defense counsel.

"It is sometimes necessary," say the authorities in defense of their position, "to use women decoys to obtain evidence of prohibition violations. In this case there were no specific instructions issued by my office to do so. However, the agents may have found it necessary to create an atmosphere in order to work with any authority."

This "creation of an atmosphere" is interesting and amusing. The atmosphere created in Missouri is not, to speak frankly, highly aromatic. In fact, it smells to high heaven.

One wonders what the purpose of the high jinks in that lonely cabin may have been. Were the agents testing their decoys—if they were decoys? And if they must use decoys, how does this square with the civil-service rules? Who empowered the agents to conduct such an examination? Furthermore, how does it square with the oft-repeated instructions of the department that provocative agents are not to be used?

A government that persuades men to commit crime in order to convict them afterwards is as guilty as the men themselves. An agent who sets up a speak-easy or lures men into disobedience to law is a criminal.

The public, moreover, has never had a satisfactory answer to the question of how the Government may legally take away from the States the right to try offenses against their own laws. It does so. The Federal Government has usurped all of the State's sovereignty, and it has done so in behalf of criminals, crooks, and murderers.

These are the things that disgust many temperate men with the present method of liquor-law enforcement.

AROUSED IN GIRL'S DEATH—HENRY COUNTY BELIEVES DEPUTY WAS HASTY IN SHOOTING INTO CAR—BUT NO CRIMINAL LIABILITY IS PLACED ON F. G. HALL, WHO FIRED THE SHOT WHICH KILLED ELEANOR HARIGAN

CLINTON, Mo., January 23.—Just why a deputy constable and his posse couldn't halt a motor car without firing at its occupants and killing a 6-year-old girl, many Henry County citizens to-day are unable to understand.

Little Eleanor Harigan was killed late yesterday near Windsor, Mo., 20 miles northeast of here, when her father, William Harigan, of Montrose, Mo., wouldn't stop his car when ordered to do so by T. G. Hall, a deputy constable of Windsor. Mr. Harigan says he believed Hall and his posse were hold-up men.

FARMER STARTS THE CHASE

Word had gone out from a farmer south of Windsor that he had seen two motor cars which aroused his suspicions near his farm. "I knew he was shot worse than he thought he was," the farmer thought he heard one of the occupants say.

The farmer notified the authorities at Windsor. Hall formed a posse and went in pursuit. The farmer believed he had seen one of the men place a sack in a pasture near by.

"Ah, bootleggers," thought the posse, as the trail was followed south 7 miles to Calhoun, Mo. Returning to Windsor, the men saw an old Buick car. In it rode Eleanor, her father, her mother, and her aunt, Mrs. Roza Luebbering, also of Montrose.

When Harigan refused to stop his car a shot was fired into the car by Hall or a member of his posse. The little girl slumped to her seat, dead.

SOME BLAME THE DEPUTY

Commenting here to-day on the case, several persons have said Harigan's motor car could have been stopped if the deputy or his men had fired into the tires.

Of course, there are those who believe the deputy or his men fired accidentally into the car, the bullet being aimed at the tires. Over at Windsor there is little excitement. It was just a regrettable accident, persons there are saying.

In the meantime a coroner's jury has found no criminal liability, holding the girl was killed by a bullet fired by Hall or a member of his posse. Windsor is about 89 miles northeast of Kansas City, in the extreme eastern part of Henry County.

COLORADO RIVER POWER PERMITS

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I report favorably with an amendment from the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 201) restricting the Federal Power Commission from issuing or approving any permits or licenses affecting the Colorado River or any of its tributaries, except the Gila River, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

This joint resolution is the same that has been adopted practically at every session since we started with the Boulder Dam legislation. The Boulder Dam legislation contains a similar paragraph. It is to protect the situation pending the ratification or refusal of ratification of that measure. I therefore ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

There being no objection the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution had been reported from the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation with an amendment, on page 1, line 8, after the word "River," to insert the words "and its tributaries," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the Federal Power Commission is hereby directed not to issue or approve any permits or licenses under the provision of the act of Congress approved June 10, 1920 (41 Stat. 1063, known as the Federal water power act), upon or affecting the Colorado River or any of its tributaries, except the Gila River and its tributaries, in the States of Colorado, Wyoming, Utah, New Mexico, Nevada, Arizona, and California, unless and until the act approved December 21, 1928, known as the Boulder Canyon project act, becomes effective as therein provided.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the amendment provides that the embargo shall not apply to the Gila River or its tributaries. Am I right?

Mr. PITTMAN. That is correct. A bill was passed the other day authorizing the granting of licenses on the Gila.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHICAGO WORLD'S FAIR

Mr. DENEEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of House Joint Resolution 365, authorizing the President, under certain conditions, to invite the participation of other nations in the Chicago World's Fair, providing for the admission of their exhibits, and for other purposes. The joint resolution was passed unanimously by the House, sent to the Senate, referred to the Committee on Finance, and was reported unanimously by that committee, with a request for immediate consideration.

The joint resolution relates to a world's fair in Chicago in 1933. It is proposed to celebrate the centennial of the organization of Chicago as a municipality in that year. All that is asked in the matter is to have the President, by a proclamation or otherwise, invite the nations of the world to send exhibits to the fair. A provision has been made in the resolution itself whereby the city of Chicago will not ask for any appropriation from the Government, and that the Government hereafter shall be under no obligation whatever to make an appropriation.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I see that the resolution provides that the invitations shall not be extended by the President for foreign governments to participate until the World's Fair Corporation has itself raised the sum of $5,000,000.

Mr. DENEEN. That is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have no objection to the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NICARAGUA CANAL

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I desire to ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order No. 785, Senate Joint Resolution 117, authorizing an investigation and survey for a Nicaraguan canal.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President——

Mr. EDGE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRATTON. I suggest to the Senator from New Jersey that before we do that, we take up the calendar for the consideration of unobjected bills, at the point where we discontinued a few days ago, and finish the call of the calendar for the consideration of unobjected bills, and then proceed to the consideration of the resolution to which the Senator is now addressing himself.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I had intended to make that request after this matter had been acted upon. The Senator from New Jersey assures me that it will take but a few minutes, and if he sees that it is going to lead to debate, that he will withdraw the request.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator that it would take the rest of the time between now and 2 o'clock for the discussion of the joint resolution.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, with the statement of the Senator from Washington that he would discuss the measure until the termination of the morning hour, of course I will not press my request; I would very much prefer to have the calendar called. But I will say to the Senator from Washington that, as far as I can ascertain, there is very little, if any, opposition to the resolution, and I would like to have an hour sometime in order to hear what the opposition may be.

Mr. DILL. I can not give unanimous consent to the enlargement of American interests in Nicaragua while the American marines are being kept there. It will give the administration one more reason for keeping the marines down there interfering with the peaceful pursuits of those people.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that we proceed to the consideration of unobjected bills on the calendar, beginning where we left off at the last call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BINGHAM in the chair). Is there objection?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator from Kansas that we have proceeded with the call of the calendar thus far without restricting the call to the consideration of unobjected bills. Could we not complete the call of the rest of the bills on the calendar under the same arrangement we have followed thus far?

Mr. CURTIS. I have no objection to that, but on Monday that order will be reached automatically, and I thought if we could dispose of the unobjected bills we could make more progress.

Mr. NORRIS. That would be perfectly agreeable if the Senator intended to ask for an adjournment to-night and not a recess.

Mr. CURTIS. It was my intention to ask the Senate to adjourn at the conclusion of its business to-day, because several Senators have notified me that they will want to bring up bills on Monday.

Mr. NORRIS. Then I have no objection.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I have no intention of objecting, because I think we should proceed with the call of the calendar and complete it, but in view of the statement of the Senator from Kansas that he will ask for an adjournment this evening, I give notice that at the conclusion of the morning business on Monday I will ask for the consideration of my joint resolution for the purpose of finding out what the opposition to the adoption of the joint resolution is, if there is opposition; at least, we can discuss it up to the end of the morning hour.

THE CALENDAR

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Kansas the nature of his request in reference to the calendar and an adjournment?

Mr. CURTIS. My request was that we begin with the call of the calendar where we left off at the last call, to consider unobjected bills on the remainder of the calendar.

Mr. SMITH. Does the Senator intend to ask for an adjournment when we conclude our business to-day?

Mr. CURTIS. I have not talked with the Senator in charge of the unfinished business, but several Senators have said that they have matters they want to take up on Monday, and it was my intention to ask for an adjournment at the conclusion of business to-day.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, would that interfere with the consideration of the naval bill as the unfinished business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that it would not.

Mr. BRUCE. The proposal is to take up the calendar at what point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Order of Business 1475, where we left off at the last call, and proceed with unobjected bills on the calendar. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered, and the clerk will proceed with the call of the calendar.

The bill (H. R. 12695) to authorize the licensing of patents owned by the United States was announced as first in order on the calendar.

Mr. BRATTON. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 15386) making appropriation for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. NORRIS. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 340) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to cooperate with the other relief creditor Governments in making it possible for Austria to float a loan in order to obtain funds for the furtherance of its reconstruction program, and to conclude an agreement for the settlement of the indebtedness of Austria to the United States, was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let that go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be passed over.

AMENDMENT TO FEDERAL RESERVE ACT

The bill (S. 5349) to amend section 9 of the Federal reserve act and section 5240 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will not some one explain this measure?

Mr. REED of Missouri. I want to know what it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the bill.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the seventh paragraph of section 9 of the Federal reserve act, as amended (sec. 326, title 12, U. S. C.), is further amended by striking out the last sentence thereof and inserting the following:

"The expenses of all examinations, other than those made by State authorities, may, in the discretion of the Federal Reserve Board, be assessed against the banks examined and, when so assessed, shall be paid by the banks examined. Copies of the reports of such examinations may, in the discretion of the Federal Reserve Board, be furnished to the State authorities having supervision of such banks, to officers, directors, or receivers of such banks, and to any other proper persons."

SEC. 2. That section 5240, United States Revised Statutes, as amended by section 21 of the Federal reserve act, is further amended in the third paragraph thereof (sec. 483, title 12, U. S. C.) by striking out the second sentence of such paragraph and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"The expense of such examinations may, in the discretion of the Federal Reserve Board, be assessed against the banks examined, and, when so assessed, shall be paid by the banks examined."

Mr. REED of Missouri. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the sponsor for the bill to give an explanation of it.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I was about to suggest that the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency [Mr. NORBECK] is not in the Chamber. I had intended to make the same request. I think the bill should go over.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. EDGE. Very well.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The purpose of the bill is perfectly plain. A great many of the State banks have not wanted to join the Federal reserve system for the sole reason that it exposes them to a double examination. The purpose of the bill is to provide that one examination may be made by the Federal examiner and a copy of that examination may be furnished to the State bank-examining authorities, with the result that the one examination shall answer both purposes. It also enables the Federal bank examiner to charge the expense of the examination against the particular bank in question.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. With pleasure.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. There is nothing in the language of the bill to sustain the statement that the result of the Federal examination is to be certified to the State examining authorities. The bill merely provides that the expense of examinations other than those made by State authorities may, in the discretion of the Federal Reserve Board, be assessed against the banks examined. What is the provision of existing law on that point?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The Senator is perhaps looking at the wrong bill. If he will look at the top of page 2 of Calendar 1479, he will see the provision I spoke of.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; I am looking at the bill the Senator refers to. It provides that in the discretion of the Federal Reserve Board there may be furnished to the State authorities having supervision of such bank a copy of such examination.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. That is correct.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. There is no requirement?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Oh, no.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I ask that the bill may go over. I do not know anything about it. I do not know whether the Committee on Banking and Currency considered it or not. I have missed but one meeting of the committee, and I know it was not considered at any meeting at which I was present. Moreover, I will say to the Senator from Pennsylvania, that my recollection of existing law is that there is no unnecessary duplication in examinations because the Federal board is authorized to accept examinations made by the State banking authorities.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Under the present law there is no authority for furnishing a copy of the report of the Federal examination to the State authorities. This merely permits it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Is that the only change in the law?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. As I understand it, it is the only change.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator from Virginia that this matter was considered by the Committee on Banking and Currency at the last meeting, when the Senator was not present. The action of the committee was based mainly on the report of the Federal Reserve Board, and the reason for the legislation is set out in the report very briefly. Let me read just one brief paragraph with reference to it:

An amendment making it discretionary with the Federal Reserve Board to assess the costs of examining member banks against the banks examined. The Federal Reserve Board has been handicapped in its efforts "to establish a more effective supervision of banking" by the fact that the present law requires the expenses of all examinations of member banks made by the Federal Reserve Board or by the Federal reserve banks to be assessed against the banks examined. The State banks object to bearing the expenses of such examinations on the ground that it subjects them to the expenses of double examinations; since they are also required, either directly or indirectly, to bear the expenses of examinations made by the State authorities. Examinations made by State authorities frequently are inadequate for the board's purpose, since the State authorities are not charged with the duty of enforcing the provisions of the Federal reserve act and do not always consider it necessary to broaden the scope of their examinations so as to disclose violations of the Federal reserve act.

That leaves it discretionary with the board. Where the State examinations are complete, then the Federal board does not require a Federal examination.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that, objection having been made by the Senator from Virginia, the bill will be passed over.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I was about to ask that it go over until I get a chance to look into it. The statement of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] throws considerable light on it, but I would like to look into the measure further.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill has been passed over, and the clerk will state the next bill on the calendar.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 5302) to amend the second paragraph of section 4 of the Federal farm loan act, as amended, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRUCE. Over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

LIGHTHOUSE SERVICE

The bill (S. 5179) to improve the efficiency of the Lighthouse Service, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. WHEELER. Over.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold his objection for a brief explanation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator withdraw his objection temporarily?

Mr. WHEELER. Very well.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The bill deals with three very minor matters in the Lighthouse Service, first, permitting the reimbursement of lighthouse keepers at far-distant points, who have to go long distances for medical attention; second, to provide the Government's share, I think $2,100, in a street tax in front of their Detroit depot; and third, to provide two necessary lights at the Pacific entrance of the Panama Canal. That is the extent of the measure, and it has the unanimous indorsement of all concerned in that branch of the service.

Mr. WHEELER. I withdraw my objection.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter the appropriation, "General expenses, Lighthouse Service," shall be available, under rules prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce, for paying the actual and necessary traveling expenses of lighthouse keepers at isolated stations to obtain medical attention.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of Commerce is authorized to pay not exceeding 50 per cent of the cost of paving Mount Elliott Avenue from Wight Street to the Detroit River, Detroit, Mich., said portion being directly in front of the lighthouse depot at Detroit. The appropriation, "General expenses, Lighthouse Service," of the fiscal year in which the work is undertaken shall be available therefor.

SEC. 3. The Secretary of Commerce is authorized, subject to the consent of the Republic of Panama and suitable diplomatic arrangements for protecting the interests of the United States, to establish and maintain aids to navigation, including the purchase of sites, if necessary, on Jicarita Island and on Morro Puercos in the approaches to the Panama Canal from the Pacific Ocean, said sites belonging to the Republic of Panama.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 7010) to amend the organic act of Porto Rico, approved March 2, 1917, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRATTON (and other Senators). Over.

Mr. KEYES. Mr. President, will the Senator who objected kindly withhold his objection for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There were several objections.

Mr. KEYES. I did not suppose there would be any objection to the bill.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I do not care to state my reasons this morning for objecting to the bill, because it would involve some discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, objection having been made, the bill will be passed over.

Mr. BLAINE subsequently said: I ask permission to return to Order of Business 1485, House bill 13929, for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the bill will be recurred to, and the amendment will be received.

Mr. BLAINE. Now I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the amendment, which is as follows:

The Secretary of Labor is hereby authorized and directed to provide for the construction, equipment, maintenance, repair, and operation of Government dormitories for women employees of the United States in the District of Columbia, and of such refectories, laundries, power houses, infirmaries, and other structures as, in the opinion of the Secretary of Labor, are suitable and necessary for use in connection with such dormitories. Such dormitories and other buildings may, in the discretion of the Secretary of Labor, be erected either upon the present sites of the Government hotels or dormitories, known as the Capitol group and the Plaza group, between Delaware Avenue and New Jersey Avenue, or upon lands which may be acquired for this purpose in the District of Columbia within a radius of not more than 1 mile from the Treasury Building. The dormitories shall be capable of accommodating not less than 1,500 nor more than 2,500 persons, and they may be constructed in separate units to accommodate 500 persons or any multiple of such number.

SEC. 2. That in order to carry out the purposes of this act the Secretary of Labor is hereby authorized and empowered—

(a) To sell for the purpose of removal the existing Government hotels or dormitories referred to in section 1 of this act, or to remove the same and sell or otherwise dispose of the materials used in their construction;

(b) To exercise exclusive direction and control over all matters pertaining to the dormitories and other buildings herein authorized to be constructed and over the Government dormitories fund hereinafter established, through such agency or agencies as he may create or designate;

(c) To make such agreements, contracts, and regulations as he may deem necessary and appropriate;

(d) To appoint, in accordance with the civil service laws, such officers and employees as are necessary for executing the functions vested in him by this act, and, in accordance with the classification act of 1923, to fix the salaries of such officers and employees; and

(e) To acquire by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise such lands as may be necessary.

SEC. 3. (a) There is hereby established a special fund, to be known as the Government dormitories fund (hereinafter referred to as the fund). All amounts received in carrying out the provisions of this act shall be covered into the fund, and are reserved, set aside, and appropriated to be available for use by the Secretary of Labor in accordance with the provisions of subdivision (b) of this section.

(b) The amounts derived from the sale of the bonds hereinafter authorized shall be available only for the payment of the costs of construction and equipment of the dormitories and other buildings herein authorized and for the payment of interest on such bonds during the period of construction. The receipts derived from rentals shall be available for the payment of the principal and interest on such bonds and for defraying the expenses of maintenance, repair, and operation of such dormitories and other buildings. After the payments of the principal and interest on such bonds have been completed, so much of the receipts derived from rentals as are not necessary for defraying such expenses of maintenance, repair, and operation shall be annually covered into the Treasury to the credit of miscellaneous receipts.

SEC. 4. That in order to provide funds for the payment of the costs of construction and equipment of such dormitories and other buildings the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, upon request of the Secretary of Labor, to issue bonds of the United States Government of such denominations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall determine and of an aggregate amount not to exceed the sum of $5,000,000. Each such bond (1) shall contain a provision for the payment of the principal of the bond and the interest thereon upon an amortization plan, by means of a fixed number of quarterly installments sufficient to cover the interest upon the unpaid principal and such amounts, to be applied on the principal, as will extinguish the indebtedness within a period of 50 years from the date of issue of the bonds; (2) shall bear interest at a rate not to exceed 5 per cent per annum; and (3) shall be subject to such other terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

SEC. 5. That the right to occupy such dormitories shall be restricted to women employees of the United States in the District of Columbia. Each such occupant shall be required to pay a weekly charge or rental in an amount determined by the Secretary of Labor to be just and reasonable as between such occupant and the Government. In making such determination the Secretary of Labor shall take into consideration among other factors (1) the total amount necessary for each quarterly period for the payment of the principal and interest on the bonds herein authorized and for defraying the estimated expenses of maintenance, repair, and operation of such dormitories and other buildings, (2) the total number of persons that such dormitories are capable of accommodating, and (3) the relative rental values of the rooms in such dormitories. Upon the completion of the payments of the principal and interest on such bonds the Secretary of Labor may readjust such weekly charges or rentals.

During the reading—

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I waive any further reading of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

GOVERNMENT-OWNED PATENTS

Mr. WATERMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate may revert to Calendar No. 1475, the bill (H. R. 12695) to authorize the licensing of patents owned by the United States, and that the bill be taken up for consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I should like to have some explanation of the bill.

Mr. WATERMAN. If the Senator will allow me, I will explain it now.

Mr. BRUCE. That is my object in asking for an explanation.

Mr. WATERMAN. Does the Senator object to taking the bill up for consideration?

Mr. BRUCE. I am not objecting, but will the Senator let me ask a question? Is this the bill which proposes to exclude everybody except patent attorneys from any work of any description connected with the administration of the Patent Office?

Mr. WATERMAN. It has no relation to any such thing. The bill is merely one providing that where the Government of the United States owns patents, the Government may be permitted, through the President, to authorize the licensing of the use of those patents. That is all there is to it. It is to be done under such terms and conditions as the President may prescribe.

Mr. McKELLAR. What patents?

Mr. WATERMAN. Any patents owned by the Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, I object to that. I can not consent to the consideration of that bill now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made, and the bill will be passed over.

SEC. 2. That any lands conveyed to the United States under the provisions of this act shall, upon acceptance of the conveyance thereof, become and be a part of such Lincoln National Forest.

SEC. 3. That before any exchange of lands as above provided is effected notice of such exchange proposal describing the lands involved therein shall be published once each week for four consecutive weeks in some newspaper of general circulation in the county in which such lands so to be conveyed to the United States are situated.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let us have the bill read. Let us see what it is going to cost the Government.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, what is the nature of the bill? May we have it read? Does anyone know anything about the facts in the case?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read again.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, in the first place, we have a general compensation act. Why should we make an exception to it? I would like to have some further explanation of the bill.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. The report explans it. It states that this man had actually been adopted in boyhood, but there had never been a legal adoption.

Mr. BRUCE. Does it meet with the approval of the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I know nothing about it except what I am reading from the report.

Mr. BRUCE. If it does meet with his approval, I will be glad to waive any objection, but I do want to know whether the matter has been actually considered by any committee of the Senate.

Mr. FESS. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On objection of the Senator from Ohio, the bill will be passed over.

MICHAEL J. FRAHER

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 940) for the relief of Michael J. Fraher.

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATIONS OF SUNDRY STREAMS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 13484) authorizing preliminary examinations of sundry streams with a view to the control of their floods, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the bill. I do not object to its consideration, but I want to offer an amendment to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator object to the consideration of the committee amendment?

Mr. BRATTON. I do not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment reported by the committee will be stated.

The amendment of the Committee on Commerce was, in section 1, page 2, line 8, before the words "Salmon River," to strike out the word "and," and in line 8, after the word "Alaska," to insert the words "Choctawhatchee River and its tributaries, Florida and Alabama; Brazos and Colorado Rivers, Tex., and their tributaries; and Rough River, Ky.," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause preliminary examinations to be made of the following streams with a view to the control of their floods in accordance with the provisions of section 3 of an act entitled "An act to provide for control of the floods of the Mississippi River, and of the Sacramento River, Calif., and for other purposes," approved March 1, 1917, the cost thereof to be paid from appropriations heretofore or hereafter made for such purposes:

West branch of the Susquehanna River, Pa.; Auglaize, Blanchard, and Ottawa Rivers, Ohio, and their tributaries, St. Marys River, Ohio; Kootenai River, Idaho; Mouse River, N. Dak.; Black River, Ark.; Mud River, Ky.; Lumber and Little Pee Dee Rivers, S. C.; Lynchs River, S. C.; Mayfield Creek, Ky.; Missouri River, near Elk Point, S. Dak.; Salmon River, Alaska; Choctawhatchee River and its tributaries, Florida and Alabama; Brazos and Colorado Rivers, Tex., and their tributaries; and Rough River, Ky.

SEC. 2. The reports of the preliminary examinations of the west branch of the Susquehanna River, Pa., and the Auglaize, Blanchard, and Ottawa Rivers, Ohio, shall also contain data relative to devising methods whereby the sources of pollution of said streams may be removed.

Mr. BRATTON. I wish to propose an amendment to the committee amendment. On page 2, line 10, following the semicolon, after the word "tributaries," I move to insert "Canadian River and its tributaries, New Mexico."

Mr. JONES. I have no objection to that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to come in immediately after the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON]. I move to insert at that point the words "Staunton, Roanoke, Dan, and James Rivers, Va."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, after the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE] I move to insert "Yellowstone River, Mont."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

WABASH RIVER DAM AT GRAND RAPIDS, ILL. AND IND.

The bill (S. 4736) for the repeal of the provisions in section 2 of the river and harbor act approved March 3, 1925, for the removal of a dam at Grand Rapids, on the Wabash River, Ill. and Ind., was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may we have an explanation of that bill?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, in brief, the explanation is this: There was a dam built across this stream, and we passed an act a few years ago authorizing the breaking of the dam and putting a passageway through it, but the department now reports that there are changed conditions and they think that it is wise to leave the dam just as it is.

Mr. McKELLAR. Are the Insull interests involved in this dam in any way?

Mr. JONES. Not that I know of. There was not any suggestion of their interest when the measure was considered by the committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. There might not have been any suggestion of it, and yet they might be very greatly interested in it.

Mr. JONES. I do not think they are. It is a very small dam anyway, so far as that is concerned; but I can not say that they are not. I merely say there was no indication that they were interested. The Senator from Indiana might, of course, give more definite information, but he is not here.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let the bill go over for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

PROTECTION OF FISHERIES OF ALASKA

The bill (S. 5073) to amend the act of Congress of June 26, 1906, entitled "An act for the protection of the fisheries of Alaska, and for other purposes," was announced as next in order.

Mr. WHEELER. I should like an explanation of that bill.

Mr. JONES. I will say that the Delegate from Alaska and the people of Alaska are very much interested in having this measure passed. The section which it is proposed to amend reads in this way:

That it shall be unlawful to can or salt for sale for food any salmon more than 48 hours after it has been killed.

This act was passed some twenty-odd years ago. Storage conditions and various other conditions with reference to handling salmon are very much changed to-day, and as it is proposed to amend the section it will read:

It shall be unlawful to preserve for sale as food for human consumption any salmon, unless it shall have been canned, salted, iced, frozen, smoked, or dried within 48 hours after being killed.

The words added to the section are "iced, frozen, smoked, or dried." The change in the language is necessary to meet the conditions as they have changed during the last twenty-odd years.

Mr. WHEELER. I have no objection to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 7 of the act of June 26, 1906, entitled "An act for the protection of the fisheries of Alaska, and for other purposes," is amended so that it will read as follows:

"SEC. 7. It shall be unlawful to preserve for sale as food for human consumption any salmon unless it shall have been canned, salted, iced, frozen, smoked, or dried within 48 hours after being killed."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I suggest to the Senator from Washington that the language is likely to give rise to much confusion if not litigation. The bill reads:

It shall be unlawful to preserve for sale as food for human consumption any salmon unless it shall have been canned, salted, iced, frozen, smoked, or dried within 48 hours after being killed.

Of course, the canning, salting, icing, freezing, and so on, operate to preserve the salmon?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Then, it is provided that it shall be unlawful to preserve it unless it is canned within 48 hours.

Mr. FLETCHER. The words "48 hours" refers to the present provision, and as I understand this amendment, this eliminates the 48-hour requirement.

Mr. JONES. It does not eliminate it. The salmon must have been salted, iced, or frozen within 48 hours.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the intention, I take it, is simply to include the more modern methods of handling salmon?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. Heretofore only two methods were used?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The purpose of the measure is perfectly obvious, but I am speaking about its phraseology.

Mr. JONES. The bill was approved by the House committee and recommended by the department, and I take it that the language employed is satisfactory.

Mr. FLETCHER. It was recommended by the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. JONES. Yes; it was recommended by the Secretary of Commerce and by all of those interested.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Very well.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REGULATION OF NAVIGATION ON GREAT LAKES

The bill (S. 5095) to amend section 1, rule 3, subdivision (e), of an act to regulate navigation on the Great Lakes and their connecting and tributary waters, enacted February 8,

1895, as amended May 17, 1928, was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That rule 3, subdivision (e), of an act entitled "An act to regulate navigation on the Great Lakes and their connecting and tributary waters," enacted February 8, 1895, and being chapter 64, Twenty-eighth Statutes at Large, section 645, as amended May 17, 1928, be amended by substituting the letter "a" in parentheses for the second letter "e" in parentheses in the seventh line thereof.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I should like to have an explanation of that bill.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, this bill merely corrects what might be termed the numbering or the designation of a paragraph. The wrong letter was used. Where it should be (a) (e) was used, and this bill merely changes that. That is the only change it makes.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no objection.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

U. S. COAST GUARD CUTTER "BEAR"

The bill (S. 5178) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to donate to the city of Oakland, Calif., the U. S. Coast Guard cutter Bear was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to donate, without expense to the United States, to the city of Oakland, Calif., the historic Coast Guard cutter Bear, now no longer fitted for service after 54 years and replaced by another boat.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TRIBAL FUNDS OF INDIANS ON KLAMATH RESERVATION, OREG.

The bill (S. 4517) appropriating tribal funds of Indians residing on the Klamath Reservation, Oreg., to pay expenses of the general council and business committee, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with an amendment, on page 2, line 6, after the word "Congress," to insert "or any succeeding Congress," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of the tribal funds of the Indians residing on the Klamath Reservation in the State of Oregon, namely, the Klamath and Modoc Tribes and the Yahooskin Band of Snake Indians, is hereby appropriated to pay the expenses of the general council and business committee (or so-called tribal council) of the said Indians, in organizing and holding councils, conducting tribal elections, maintaining their tribal organization, and generally looking after the affairs of the said tribes, including, among other things, the actual and necessary expenses of its delegation, or legislative committee, in visiting Washington during the second session of the Seventieth Congress or any succeeding Congress; also the expenses incurred, and to be incurred, by the tribal delegation of said Indians in procuring evidence and taking testimony to be used in connection with the three suits instituted by the said Indians against the United States and now pending in the Court of Claims; said sum to be immediately available, and said expenses to be approved by the said business committee and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and certified to the Secretary of the Interior, and, if so approved and certified, to be paid.

Mr. OVERMAN. I inquire if the money is to be paid out of tribal funds or out of the Treasury?

Mr. McNARY. It is to come out of the tribal funds and not out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, will the Senator explain why it is necessary that the Secretary of the Interior must assume charge of this disbursement?

Mr. McNARY. I did not understand the Senator's question.

Mr. BAYARD. Why is it necessary to submit a matter involving tribal funds to the Secretary of the Interior? Why can not the Indians determine it for themselves?

Mr. McNARY. Under the practice and policy of the bureau the Secretary of the Interior has certain control. That is based on statute, and it has always been the practice to refer such matters to him for his best judgment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (H. R. 13507) to amend section 3 of Public Act No. 230 (37 Stat. L. p. 194), was announced as next in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. I should like to have an explanation of that bill; otherwise I will have to object to it.

Mr. BRUCE. I ask that the bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

EVERGLADES NATIONAL PARK, FLA.

The bill (S. 4704) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to investigate and report to Congress on the advisability and practicability of establishing a national park to be known as the Everglades National Park in the State of Florida, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys with amendments, on page 1, line 6, before the word "Everglades," to insert the word "Tropic"; in line 7, after the word "of," to strike out "Dade and Monroe" and insert "Dade, Monroe, and Collier"; on page 2, at the beginning of line 3, to insert "other than the salaries of any Government experts who may be assigned for that purpose," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to investigate and report to Congress as to the desirability and practicability of establishing a national park, to be known as the Tropic Everglades National Park, in the everglades of Dade, Monroe, and Collier Counties of the State of Florida, for the benefit and enjoyment of the people of the United States and to preserve said area in its natural state: Provided, That such investigation shall be made without expense to the United States other than the salaries of any Government experts who may be assigned for that purpose.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to investigate and report to Congress on the advisability and practicability of establishing a national park to be known as the Tropic Everglades National Park in the State of Florida, and for other purposes."

TRANSFER OF THE RETURNS OFFICE

The bill (H. R. 9570) to provide for the transfer of the returns office from the Interior Department to the General Accounting Office, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the returns office, together with its activities, personnel, contracts, bids, offers, proposals, advertisements, books, records, documents, furniture, office equipment, and papers and property of whatsoever character, is hereby transferred from the Interior Department to the General Accounting Office; and all powers and duties whatsoever in connection therewith now vested in or required to be performed by or under the Secretary of the Interior are transferred to, vested in, and required to be performed by or under the Comptroller General of the United States.

SEC. 2. That so much of appropriations for the Interior Department as applies to expenditures for the returns office, including personnel therefor, is transferred to and made applicable for expenditure by the General Accounting Office.

SEC. 3. That the Comptroller General of the United States is authorized to perform all acts and make such rules and regulations as necessary to carry the provisions of this act into effect.

SEC. 4. That all laws and parts of laws in so far as inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

SEC. 5. This act shall take effect July 1, 1928.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I should like to have an explanation of that bill; otherwise I shall have to object to it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I am able to explain the bill to the Senator. Under a very old law the so-called returns office was established in the Interior Department, and all the other departments were required to file in that office a copy of any contract which they might enter into. Under the law as it now exists copies of such contracts are required to be filed with the Comptroller General, so that they are duplicated; there is no longer any occasion for the returns office of the Interior Department, and it is simply transferred from the Interior Department to the Comptroller General.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no objection to the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOHN G. D'CAMP

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, considered the bill (H. R. 3268) for the relief of John G. DeCamp, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, their widows, or dependent relatives, John G. DeCamp shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged on December 22, 1898, instead of on October 25, 1898, from Company E, First Ohio United States Volunteer Infantry: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance, except that to which he is entitled under Private Act No. 168, approved June 17, 1926, shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, whether that bill meets with his assent?

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Yes. It merely recognizes the actual date of discharge and corrects an error in the discharge certificate.

Mr. BRUCE. With that statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania, I have no objection to the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BOXING CONTESTS IN THE TERRITORIES

The bill (H. R. 7200) to amend section 321 of the Penal Code was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The bill had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That section 321 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the penal laws of the United States," approved March 4, 1909, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "Nothing in this section or in the preceding section shall be held to prohibit any pugilistic encounter in the Territory of Hawaii or the Territory of Alaska, in conformity with the laws of the respective Territories, if (1) the contestants use gloves not less than 5 ounces each in weight, (2) such encounter is not held on Sunday and does not consist of more than 10 rounds of a duration of more than 3 minutes each with an interval of 1 minute between each round and the succeeding round, and (3) each contestant is over 18 years of age and, one hour prior to such encounter, has been examined by a licensed physician, who shall certify in writing to the referee of such encounter that such contestant is physically fit to engage therein."

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] explain the purpose of that bill?

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, it is not a bill in which I am particularly interested, but I can answer the question of the Senator from Tennessee. This bill is merely intended to amend the law now existing which prohibits boxing encounters in the Territories of the United States. It does not remove the inhibition entirely, but provides that such encounters may be held under certain conditions which are set forth in the amended bill. It leaves to the legislative bodies of the Territories to determine for themselves whether boxing encounters shall be held. The committee favored the bill because it is a measure of self-government and places the Territories of Hawaii and Alaska on at least as good a footing as Porto Rico. We thought under the circumstances they ought to be permitted to determine a matter of this kind for themselves.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 4604) for the relief of James L. McCulloch was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I should like to inquire why the assignment in this case was held invalid?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, at the request of another Member of the Senate who is not now present, I ask that the bill go over for the day without prejudice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the bill will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 16301) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1930, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. WARREN. I ask that that bill go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

GRAND VALLEY RECLAMATION PROJECT, COLORADO

The bill (S. 4710) authorizing the sale of surplus power developed under the Grand Valley reclamation project, Colorado, was announced as next in order.

Mr. WHEELER. I ask that that bill go over.

Mr. PHIPPS. Will the Senator who makes the objection withhold it for a moment in order that I may explain the measure?

Mr. WHEELER. I will withhold the objection for a moment.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, this bill merely authorizes a reclamation project in Colorado to enter into an agreement with a private company or to construct at its own cost and expense a small hydroelectric plant for the project. The output of power will be used partly on the project, and the surplus will be sold. It means that the United States Government will have no interest in the investment in any manner, but it will bring a revenue to the project which will enable the settlers on that project to pay off their construction charges more rapidly than they otherwise would be able to do. It has the full approval of the Department of the Interior; and the original bill was recast in order more nearly to meet the views of the department. It is hoped that this bill may be passed now, so that it can go to the House and avoid a possible one year's delay in the construction of this small plant, which would produce only something like 250 to 500 horsepower, I believe.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. WHEELER. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made by the Senator from Montana. The clerk will state the next bill on the calendar.

FRANCIS L. SEXTON

The bill (H. R. 3893) for the relief of Francis L. Sexton was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This bill is reported adversely.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. I move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion to postpone indefinitely was agreed to.

ATTENDANCE OF WITNESSES UPON FEDERAL COURTS

The bill (S. 5229) to amend section 876 of the Revised Statutes was announced as next in order.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, at the time this bill was reported I sent to the desk an amendment suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] which I had intended to offer.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator state something about the bill?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The law now will permit the calling of witnesses into a Federal court only from the district in which the court sits, or from a distance of 100 miles from that place. That law was passed many years ago when travel was expensive and difficult. It is now hoped that witnesses may be brought from a greater distance. Whenever a desire exists to bring witnesses from a greater distance rather than take their depositions the party desiring to bring the witnesses will make application to the court, and the court may authorize the bringing of the witnesses.

Mr. McKELLAR. The court is vested with discretion?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. With discretion.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I ask that the bill be passed over until I can look into it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over at the request of the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I hope the objection may be withdrawn until I can make a statement with respect to the matter.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to have the bill go over until I can look into it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I will take the liberty to say, under the next bill that the immediate occasion for this legislation is the pending of litigation growing out of the leasing of the naval oil reserves. It is almost imperative that witnesses be brought from distant parts of the country to testify in that litigation.

Mr. WARREN. I think the bill is too general, and I want an opportunity to read it, so I object to its consideration for the time being. I am not assuming that I shall have any objection when I have had an opportunity to examine it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the bill will be passed over.

APPOINTMENT OF ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGES

The bill (S. 5193) to authorize the President of the United States to appoint an additional judge of the District Court of the United States for the Middle District of the State of Pennsylvania was announced as next in order.

Mr. BLEASE. Let that go over.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, who objected to the consideration of this bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection was made by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BLEASE].

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I objected to it because I wish to debate this bill, House bill 8551, House bill 9200, House bill 12811, House bill 8295, and House bill 14659, being Orders of Business 1513, 1514, 1515, 1516, 1517, and 1518. I did not care to take up the time to do that now on account of some bills further down on the calendar.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator desire to enter objections to all those bills?

Mr. BLEASE. All those bills.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from South Carolina will withdraw his objection. New York City is very much interested in House bill 9200 and House bill 14659.

Mr. BLEASE. South Carolina is very much interested in one of these bills, also; and I want to show the Senate how my State has been discriminated against in this matter. I want to show why and how; and I object.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I should like to call the attention of the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made. The clerk will state the next bill on the calendar.

The bill (H. R. 8551) to create an additional judge in the district of South Dakota was announced as next in order.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I appeal to the Senator from South Carolina to withdraw his objection to the consideration of these bills. I think I can convince him in a moment of the dire necessity of the increase in New York, the congested condition of the calendar, and the great miscarriage of justice due to the inability of litigants to secure trials of their cases. I will say to the Senator that, so far as his State is concerned, I shall be with him on anything he may be able to do to relieve that situation; but if the Senator will just examine the condition of the calendar in those two districts it will be most persuasive on this question. I appeal to the Senator's sense of fairness in this matter.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, will the Senator from South Carolina pardon me for reminding him that only a few days ago I brought out the fact that the United States district attorney in the city of New York said it would take 185 more courts to enforce prohibition in his district; so it seems to me we might give them three or four courts.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I have reports here from the two Federal judges in South Carolina, one of them a Woodrow Wilson Democrat and the other one a Calvin Coolidge Republican, showing the same condition in South Carolina that there is in New York. Eight judges are reported here, and the only one turned down is from the Democratic State of South Carolina. I propose to appeal to the fairness of the Senate on that proposition when the time comes; and I object. This is simply being made a personal matter against me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, objection having been made, the clerk will state the next bill on the calendar.

Mr. BLEASE subsequently said: Mr. President, awhile ago I objected to the consideration of Calendar Nos. 1513, 1514, 1515, 1516, 1517, and 1518, being bills providing for additional judges in various States. I desire to state to the Chair that if there is any request made to consider any of those bills during my absence, which I hope will not be very long, I wish to be considered as objecting to the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Caroline objects to the consideration of Orders of Business 1514, 1515, 1516, 1517, and 1518, being House bill 8551, House bill 9200, House bill 12811, House bill 8295, and House bill 14659. The clerk will state the next bill on the calendar.

BLACK HILLS AND HARNEY NATIONAL FORESTS, S. DAK.

The bill (S. 5269) to amend the United States mining laws applicable to the Black Hills and Harney National Forests was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I think some one should explain the purpose of this bill.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, the explanation is simply this: First, the bill is limited to the Black Hills because there might be differences of opinion in other places. Its object is to do away with the fraudulent practice of acquiring forest land by filing mining claims when there is a show of color but the land is not real mining property.

The history of this matter in Black Hills is that about 95 per cent of the land that has been acquired under the mining laws is not mining land. This bill does not in any way interfere with prospecting or mining, but the surface remains with the Government. The Government will make such lease of the surface as is necessary to do the mining.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That hereafter mining locations made under the United States mining laws upon lands within the Black Hills and Harney National Forests shall confer on the locator no right to the surface of the land covered by the location other than the right to occupy, under the rules and regulations relating to the national forests, so much thereof as may be reasonably necessary to carry on prospecting and mining, and shall not authorize the taking of any resources other than the mineral deposits, or the occupancy of the land for any purpose other than prospecting and mining.

SEC. 2. That all patents issued hereafter under the United States mining laws affecting lands within the Black Hills and Harney National Forests shall convey title to the mineral deposits within the claim and the right, subject to rules and regulations governing such national forests, to occupy so much of the surface of the claim as may be required for extracting and removing the mineral deposits. Every such patent shall expressly reserve to the United States title to the surface of the land included in the claim or claims.

SEC. 3. That valid mining claims within the Black Hills or Harney National Forests existing on the date of enactment of this act, and thereafter maintained in compliance with the law under which they were initiated, may be perfected under this act, or under the law under which they were initiated, as the claimant may desire.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILL PASSED OVER

The bill (S. 3001) to revise the boundary of the Yellowstone National Park in the States of Montana and Wyoming, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I have written for some information concerning the attitude of our people with respect to that bill, and I ask that it go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

ETTA B. LEACH JOHNSON

The bill (H. R. 12995) for the relief of Etta B. Leach Johnson was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLARENCE ULERY

The bill (H. R. 8341) to provide for appointing Clarence Ulery a warrant officer, United States Army, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FORFEITURE OF PATENT RIGHTS

The bill (S. 2783) to provide for the forfeiture of patent rights in case of conviction under laws prohibiting monopoly was announced as next in order.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I should like to hear an explanation of that bill.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, this bill as originally introduced provided for the forfeiture of patents when those holding them were found guilty of violating the Sherman law and the Clayton law. We held exhaustive hearings on the bill, and it appeared that its terms were too drastic; that it might involve the loss of millions of dollars on the part of those who had invested money in the patents, and it was thought that that was not a fair measure.

The bill was, therefore, amended to provide that the patentee who brought a suit for infringement must come into court with clean hands. That is, if the person who was sued for infringement could show that the patentee was guilty of violating these laws in restraint of trade, the patent rights would be suspended until the person guilty of violating them had ceased the violation. In other words, until he reorganized his business the patent rights would be suspended.

Mr. BRUCE. I have no objection to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, if we picture to ourselves just how that will work out in practice, it means that any complainant in a patent suit will have to be faced with the defense not only of noninfringement or invalidity of the patent but the accusation by the defendant that the complainant is a party to some sort of an antitrust agreement, some kind of a combination violating the monopoly laws.

If the complainant is guilty of that, of course, we have not much sympathy for him; but certainly we ought to be able to try a patent suit without having to try the collateral issue of guilt under the antitrust laws. It means two trials in every patent case.

I think the bill ought to go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over.

DAN A. MORRISON

The bill (H. R. 4589) for the relief of Dan A. Morrison was announced as next in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Dan A. Morrison, of Whitehall, Mont., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000, being in full reimbursement of and remuneration for all expenses incurred and services performed in all matters touching the discovery, exploration, and development of the cavern known as the Lewis and Clark Cavern National Monument, embracing lot 12 of section 17, township 1 north, range 2 west, Montana principal meridian, containing 160 acres of land, which said cavern was set aside by proclamation of the President of the United States on May 11, 1908, in conformity with an act of Congress approved June 8, 1906, entitled "An act for the preservation of American antiquities."

Mr. OVERMAN. May we have an explanation, Mr. President?

Mr. BRUCE. I would like to hear an explanation of that bill.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, near the junction of three rivers in the State of Montana, that river cutting through a great canyon with precipitous walls, this man Dan Morrison many years ago discovered a very remarkable cave. It is one of the great natural wonders of the country. He endeavored to secure title to it under the mining laws, and in his endeavor to do so it was disclosed that the property really belonged to the Northern Pacific Railroad Co. under its grant. The Northern Pacific Railroad Co., however, ceded all of its interest in the matter to the General Government, and the cave has now been made a national monument. But while Morrison was endeavoring to secure title to the land, assuming he could do so under the laws of the United States, he really opened up the cave, constructed approaches to it, and all that kind of thing, and now the Government has become the owner of all that property. Morrison spent, I think, about $15,000 or $20,000, and this provides for the appropriation of $5,000 to reimburse him for what he has spent.

Mr. BRUCE. I have no objection, Mr. President.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. How is the amount arrived at?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It is not arrived at in any way.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is just an arbitrary sum?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. He actually showed that he spent two or three times this amount.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PURCHASERS OF LOTS IN BOWDOIN, MONT.

The bill (H. R. 14925) to authorize repayment of certain excess amounts paid by purchasers of lots in the town site of Bowdoin, Mont., and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Montana to give us an idea of what this bill means. It would seem that certain people made purchases of land, and paid certain prices, and then afterwards there was a reappraisal, the land was valued at a lower price than formerly, and now they are to be refunded the amounts they paid over and above the reappraisal. I do not know exactly what principle is involved, but if people who purchase from the Government at any time in reservations lands at public sale, and pay a great deal higher price than the lands are worth, will they have the right to come to Congress to have the lands reappraised, and then be allowed the excess above the reappraisal price? I do not know how far we are going in that direction. It may be equity to do this, but if the principle is once adopted it may be that it ought to be applied in other cases. I know of a good many cases where purchasers of land in military reservations can not to-day obtain anything approaching the price they paid, and the lands are not worth what they paid. Would they have a right to come to the Government and ask to be reimbursed?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the Senator from Florida has not inaccurately stated the nature of this proposed legislation. The town of Bowdoin was one of those towns of large expectations which were never realized. It is within the Milk River irrigation project, and at the time it was laid out it was expected that it would develop into a town of very considerable proportions. The lands in that section were estimated as of a very high value. On the Fort Peck Reservation, immediately adjacent to this, land was valued and sold to settlers, and the prices were so exorbitant that the settlers were unable to pay them and were about to abandon the land, when the court authorized the reappraisement of the land and they were permitted to pay at the reappraised price.

In the case of these town lots at Bowdoin exactly the same situation arose. Enormous prices were bid for the lots, and the town never developed. The Congress provided for the reappraisal of the town lots and authorized payment to be made at the reappraised price; and that has been done. But the law expired by limitation at the close of the fiscal year 1927, and some of the purchasers of the lots, not learning of the act, did not come in under its provisions.

Mr. McKELLAR. This is just to extend the time?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It would just extend legislation already in existence.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have no objection.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PATENT TO BOZEMAN, MONT., OF PUBLIC LAND

The bill (S. 5014) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue to the city of Bozeman, Mont., a patent to certain public lands was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys with an amendment, on page 1, line 7, after the word "acre" and before the period, to insert a comma and the words "subject to valid existing rights: Provided, That there shall be reserved to the United States all oil, coal, or other mineral deposits, and the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same under such rules, regulations, and conditions as the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to issue to the city of Bozeman, Mont., a patent in fee to lots 9, 10, 11, and 12, section 21, township 1 south, range 6 east, Montana principal meridian, upon payment therefor by the city at the rate of $1.25 an acre subject to valid existing rights: Provided, That there shall be reserved to the United States all oil, coal, or other mineral deposits, and the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same under such rules, regulations, and conditions as the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HERMAN O. KRUSCHKE

The bill (S. 575) for the relief of Herman O. Kruschke, was announced as next in order. The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs adversely.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I do not desire to have the Senate act on this measure. I ask that it may go over under Rule IX.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be passed over, under Rule IX.

JOHN JAKES

The bill (H. R. 2482) for the relief of John Jakes was announced as next in order. The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs adversely.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I move the indefinite postponement of this bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was indefinitely postponed.

SEIZURES UNDER THE ESPIONAGE ACT

The bill (S. 5181) to amend section 4 of the act of June 15, 1917 (40 Stat. 224; sec. 241, title 22, U. S. Code), was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4 of Title VI of the act of June 15, 1917, chapter 30, entitled "An act to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes" (sec. 241, title 22, U. S. C.), be, and it is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4. Whenever the person making any seizure under this title (secs. 238 to 245, inclusive, of ch. 5, title 22, U. S. C.) applies for and obtains a warrant for the detention of the property, and (a) upon the hearing and determination of the petition of the owner or claimant restoration is denied, or (b) the owner or claimant fails to file a petition for restoration within 30 days after the seizure, the United States attorney for the district wherein it was seized, upon direction of the Attorney General, shall institute libel proceedings in the United States district court or the district court of the Canal Zone or the court of first instance of the Philippine Islands having jurisdiction over the place wherein the seizure was made, against the property for condemnation; and if, after trial and hearing of the issues involved, the property is condemned, it shall be disposed of by sale, and the proceeds thereof, less the legal costs and charges, paid into the Treasury: Provided, That the court shall order any arms and munitions of war so condemned delivered to the War Department of the United States."

Mr. McKELLAR. Let us have an explanation of the bill.

Mr. WATERMAN. Mr. President, this bill is merely an amendment to section 4 of an act "to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States," by adding to the existing law the following provision, that wherever property is taken in the shape of arms or munitions of war and condemned, the proviso which it is proposed to attach to the bill will take effect and be as follows:

Provided, That the court shall order any arms and munitions of war so condemned delivered to the War Department of the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SERVICE UPON JURORS BY REGISTERED MAIL

The bill (H. R. 14150) to amend section 279 of the Judicial Code was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What is the purpose and effect of this bill?

Mr. WATERMAN. The purpose of it is to direct the marshal, wherever a juror to be summoned lives outside of the place where the court is to be held, to send him a registered letter and get a receipt, and that is a substituted service this amendment provides. That is all.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NATURALIZATION LAWS

The bill (H. R. 349) to supplement the naturalization laws, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. HEFLIN. Let that go over.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, if the Senator will withhold his objection, I would like to make a statement. This bill has received the very serious attention of the Committee on Immigration and received the unanimous approval of that committee. It does not contemplate the admission of any person to the United States who is not now here, and it has no bearing at all upon the deportation of any person, because under the law nobody can be deported after having been here five years, and this would take effect five years after the application of the law of 1924.

It would permit the naturalization of worthy persons who were in the United States at the time of the passage of the restriction law of July 1, 1924. They may appear before the proper naturalization authorities, where it is to be determined that they have been here continuously, that they are persons of good moral character, and are not subject to deportation. The other parts of the bill are administrative, very much desired by the naturalization authorities, and I trust that the bill may be given immediate consideration because of its importance.

We have a great many persons in the United States like this case, for instance, of a young woman who came as an infant in arms from Scotland to Canada. As a very young child she came to the United States. Her parents died when she was an infant. She has no knowledge of when she came or where she entered the United States, and, under our laws, could not be deported, but she can never be a citizen unless relief of this sort is had.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What is the approximate number of persons who would be affected by the legislation?

Mr. COPELAND. I wonder if the Senator from Pennsylvania could answer the question as to the approximate number of persons who would be affected.

Mr. REED of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I have never heard that it was undertaken to give an estimate. I do not think anybody knows. This, in effect, would grant amnesty to those persons of good moral character who came here prior to the adoption of the present immigration law. At present, unless they can show that they entered in accordance with all the formalities, they can never be naturalized, and they can never get a reentry permit so that they can take a trip abroad. Practically, this is a statute of limitations. It does not condone any violation of the present immigration law whatever.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the objection withdrawn?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I would like to have a chance to look into this bill very thoroughly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will not the Senator yield just for a moment? The senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] was a member of the subcommittee and served with us in the consideration of this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Several objections have been made to the unanimous-consent consideration of the bill and it will go over.

Mr. COPELAND. I will speak on the next bill then.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. I think the Senator from Alabama will agree that the bill is a very just one. It is a bad thing for us to have persons in the country year after year who are not eligible to our citizenship. The bill requires that every evidence of good moral character must be presented, as well as desirability for citizenship, and it certainly would tend to the promotion of the welfare of the country, in my judgment. I hope the Senator from Alabama will not persist in his objection.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. COPELAND. Of course.

Mr. BLAINE. I would like to inquire of the Senator if a situation I would like to describe would be taken care of. For instance, along in 1910 or 1912 a great many farmers living in the Northwest States, Wisconsin, Minnesota, the Dakotas, perhaps Kansas and Nebraska—States along the northern boundary—were induced to go to Canada by the representation that they could get cheap land there. In order to file an entry upon the land they made a declaration of their intention to become citizens of Canada, but never completed their so-called applications for citizenship. They then became disappointed and afterwards returned to the United States. There was no place of entry, there was no one to visa their return, they purchased railroad tickets and came back home, or they might have come by automobile. At any rate, there is no way by which they can prove the place or time of their reentry.

Mr. COPELAND. They would be taken care of by this bill.

Mr. BLAINE. Would the bill take care of them?

Mr. COPELAND. It would. If they were here on the 1st of July, 1924, and are persons of good moral character, they would be permitted to receive citizenship in this country in due time.

Mr. BLAINE. I thank the Senator.

CONSTRUCTION OF CRUISERS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 11526, to authorize the construction of certain naval vessels, and for other purposes.

AMENDMENT OF TRADING WITH THE ENEMY ACT

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have been instructed by the Finance Committee to report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (S. 5452) to amend the trading with the enemy act so as to extend the time within which claims may be filed with the Alien Property Custodian.

It is a unanimous report from the committee. The bill must be passed by the House and become a law before March 10 next, or else the German claimants, and there are some 4,300 of them coming under the trading with the enemy act, will be entirely deprived of any right to the funds held now by the trustee, and if they do not get the funds they will go right back to the German Government.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may we have the bill read?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Utah if the bill will lead to any debate?

Mr. SMOOT. If it leads to any discussion at all I shall not ask for its present consideration. I only wanted to tell the Senate the importance of its passage and of getting it to the House so that it may be passed there.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That subsection (d) of section 25 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended, is hereby amended by striking out the term "one year" in clause (1) of said subsection and inserting in lieu thereof the term "two years."

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, does that mean two additional years or only one additional year?

Mr. SMOOT. Just one additional year.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDIAN TRUST ESTATES

Mr. PINE. Mr. President, on April 27, 1928, the Senate passed the bill (S. 4222) to authorize the creation of Indian trust estates, and for other purposes. The bill has not yet been acted on by the House of Representatives. It refers only to Indians in the State of Oklahoma. I ask unanimous consent to recall the bill and have it referred back to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent the Senator may enter his motion to reconsider the votes by which the bill was read the third time and passed, and then may ask that the House be requested to return the bill to the Senate.

Mr. PINE. I ask that the House be requested to return the bill and that it be referred back to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Oklahoma when the bill was passed?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The only motion in order is that the Senate shall request the House to return the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I wondered whether the time had expired within which that might be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time for a reconsideration has expired long since.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to the course proposed if it can be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that the House be requested to return Senate bill 4222. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. NYE obtained the floor.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator whether he is going to address the Senate on the subject matter of the bill which is the unfinished business?

Mr. NYE. Not directly.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senator will not prevent us from getting some action on the bill this afternoon.

Mr. NYE. For the information of the Senator I will say that what I have to present in this connection will not require over 15 or 20 minutes and concerns a matter which I think deserves the attention of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. The Senator, of course, has a right to talk on whatever subject he sees fit.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum having been suggested, the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is unavoidably absent on account of illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. GERRY. I wish to announce the necessary absence of the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] because of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GLENN in the chair). Seventy-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

COL. ROBERT W. STEWART

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I have no desire to break into these hours, set aside for exclusive consideration of H. R. 11526, the bill for the relief of the shipbuilders, but the papers of yesterday brought out a subject which is deserving of at least the few moments I shall devote to it at this time.

I am not a stockholder in the Standard Oil Co. I have no notion of aiding either the bulls or the bears who are interested in the stocks of that company at this particular time. I am without relationship to either Mr. Rockefeller or Mr. Stewart, and am not inviting any job as referee of the most interesting conflict in which these business kings are engaged at this time. To cause my remarks to be entitled to consideration in connection with the present Senate debate, I may suggest that the war now being fought between these men is in all probability going to be finished before any of the proposed new cruisers can be completed, just as I believe all commercial and industrial wars—and what wars have not been just that—can be fought and ended without the aid of the investment of billions in cruisers.

What I wish here to say is occasioned by stories which the press has carried with relation to the Rockefeller effort to oust from his commanding position in the Standard Oil organization one Robert Stewart, who defied the Senate, misled the Senate, lied to the Senate, and then proceeded to explain, successfully, his record to the satisfaction of District of Columbia juries, an accomplishment, be it noted, not monopolized by Stewart alone. Indeed, Stewart had the benefit of the experiences of brother dealers in oil and Liberty loan bonds, like Harry F. Sinclair and Albert B. Fall, with these juries.

Not often are business battles accorded such liberal publicity as is now being accorded the Rockefeller-Stewart tilt. Watching it from day to day, my conviction grows that if Mr. Stewart's press agents remain at their game long enough we will yet gain that desired complete story of the Continental Trading Co. and its affairs. In all the opportunities afforded him by the Senate Committee on Public Lands to tell this full story, he has never volunteered a small part of the information he was willing to give to the press yesterday. However, he is still insisting that—and here I quote him from his statement of yesterday—he "never had any connection with the Continental Trading Co." Apparently his receiving three-quarters of a million dollars in Liberty bonds from the pool of profits of this company is not, in his mind, to be considered a "connection."

Colonel Stewart says he "never"—and I quote his press release verbatim—he "never personally made a dollar out of the transaction," meaning, of course, the Continental Trading transaction, which delivered into his own hands this great total of Liberty bonds.

But to me the most interesting feature of Colonel Stewart's latest press release is the revelation of how his share of the millions of dollars in profits of the Continental Trading Co. transaction "were partly the source from which the steady stream of cash dividends has been paid to the stockholders of the Indiana company every quarter during recent years."

Then he goes on to tell how the Liberty bonds he received from the Continental Trading Co. were turned into a trust, which he created with a pencil and paper, but he fails to tell how his trustee never "trusteed"—I create, I believe, a new word—and how the bonds stayed in his continuous possession even under the Stewart-created trust.

But the main point in Mr. Stewart's press contention for the continued favor of Standard Oil stockholders is this—that had it not been for his little affair with the shady Continental Trading Co. and the like there would have been no dividend checks for Standard Oil stockholders.

How proud Standard Oil stockholders must be in this assurance from their giant leader, Colonel Stewart! How they must prize the shares which bring them profits through such secret, obnoxious deals as was that one involving the Continental Trading Co., which company Stewart knew enough about to permit him to guarantee that company's end of a $50,000,000 contract! Standard Oil stockholders must hold their heads high when they realize that their profits came from such deals!

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand Colonel Stewart's statement, it is that where profits were derived from this transaction it went to the stockholders?

Mr. NYE. That is my understanding.

Mr. BORAH. Is not Mr. Rockefeller one of the stockholders?

Mr. NYE. Mr. Rockefeller is one of the stockholders.

Mr. BORAH. If Colonel Stewart be correct, the benefit of this transaction accrued to Mr. Rockefeller and others and not to himself.

Mr. NYE. To Mr. Rockefeller and all other stockholders of the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana.

Mr. BORAH. Has there been any movement, so far as the Senator is aware, on the part of the stockholders themselves to turn this money back?

Mr. NYE. I know of none.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, has there been any movement on the part of the stockholders to find out what was the purpose of those profits, how they came about, and what they were for originally?

Mr. NYE. I think Mr. Rockefeller and other leading stockholders of the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana have endeavored in their own way to convey to the stockholders the relationship which existed, very much to the embarrassment of the Standard Oil Co.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. Rockefeller appeared before the committee, I believe, and condemned the transaction; but I mean, what investigation have they made, as the committee did, to solve that mystery.

Mr. NYE. Of course, the investigations conducted by the committee have been made available to stockholders such as desired the information.

Mr. BROOKHART. Does the committee know as yet what was the real purpose of that transaction?

Mr. NYE. I am afraid I shall have to confess that the committee is still wanting information concerning the Continental Trading Co. transaction before it can definitely determine what the purpose of it was.

Mr. BROOKHART. Of course, the committee was hampered by refusals to testify and by court decisions against the committee, was it not?

Mr. NYE. It was.

Mr. BROOKHART. Has the committee made its final report? Has it finished its investigation?

Mr. NYE. In so far as the Continental Trading Co. is concerned, I think the committee has finished, unless new developments should arise which would give us further opportunity to extend our inquiry.

Mr. BROOKHART. Really, then, the investigation had to be abandoned without fully and finally solving the question?

Mr. NYE. According to present appearances, that will be the unfortunate circumstance; yes.

Mr. BROOKHART. It seems to me that is a regretable condition in which to leave the whole question.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, abandoning all semblance of sarcasm, to believe that Standard Oil stockholders are proud of what Stewart now tells them has for years been the source of their dividend checks is to insult the intelligence of the great majority of these stockholders. No wonder there is keen desire to be rid of the official influence of Stewart in Standard Oil. No wonder Mr. Rockefeller holds his nose and urges the removal of that which creates the stench.

Mr. President, let the true record of these Stewart deals be kept clearly in mind, lest we awake to find Stewart as successful with the public as he has been successful with District of Columbia juries.

Col. Robert W. Stewart was tried twice during the year 1928 in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, the first indictment being for contempt occasioned by refusing to answer certain material questions propounded by the Public Lands Committee of the United States Senate on the occasion of his appearance there as a witness on February 2 and 3, 1928; on the second occasion for perjury growing out of charges that he willfully testified in an untruthful manner on February 2 and 3, 1928, in stating that he had never received or never had had any knowledge of certain Liberty loan bonds the Continental Trading Co. of Canada is known to have dealt it.

In the contempt case the charge that he had willfully refused to answer certain questions was borne out by sworn testimony, including that of Senators, and finally and most conclusively by the petition of habeas corpus signed and sworn to by Colonel Stewart himself, in which petition he admitted a great part of what the indictment charged.

The second trial, beginning on November 12, 1928, on a charge of perjury, developed from Senators, from newspaper men in attendance at the hearings, and in part from the same petition of habeas corpus signed and sworn to by Col. Robert W. Stewart, that on February 2 and 3 he had testified that he never received any of the Continental bonds nor had he any knowledge concerning them. The testimony further revealed at the time Colonel Stewart so testified in February that there were in the vault of his office in Chicago Liberty bonds in the amount of $759,000, plus accumulated interest, that had been given Colonel Stewart on various occasions by H. M. Osler, of Toronto, one of the founders of the Continental Trading Co.

The testimony further included a statement on the part of Roy J. Barnett, tax commissioner of the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana, that in 1921 he, Barnett, was made a trustee for these bonds by virtue of a declaration of trust written by Stewart in his own handwriting at that time. Although under this declaration of trust Barnett was responsible for these bonds, they remained in the safe or vault in Stewart's office until shortly before the second appearance of Stewart in April before the Senate committee.

Stewart was acquitted in both cases.

Within the last few days there has appeared in the public press a statement signed by the jurors in the perjury case to the effect that Stewart was acquitted not because of any technicality or because of the alleged lack of quorum of the committee meeting in question but because it was felt that on the facts Stewart was not guilty.

This response by members of a jury is not usual. The Senate might with some degree of propriety and dignity instigate an inquiry into the occasion for continued service by a jury even after it has been discharged. This practice may be found to be only another District of Columbia jury peculiarity.

However, there is no disposition on anyone's part to impugn the motives or the judgment of the jury. In so far as any question of criminal culpability growing out of all this testimony may be concerned, the courts have decided that Stewart need have no apprehension along that line.

However, this statement on the part of the jury to the effect that Stewart was not guilty on the facts, while conclusive as to the courts, is not necessarily so with regard to the people or to this body. And, lest it be thought that the committee of the Senate of the United States or a Senator of the United States might have been guilty of bad faith in causing the matters complained of in the indictments to be transmitted by this body to the courts for appropriate action, it is essential that the Senate be now reminded of the facts on which these prosecutions were predicated.

In the presence of a considerable number of the committee, of shorthand reporters, of newspaper men, and of interested auditors, Stewart refused point blank to answer certain questions propounded by this committee. These questions were held by the courts to be material. A District of Columbia jury said he is not guilty, and that ends that aspect of the situation. However, it does not obviate the fact that he did adopt a most contumacious attitude before the Senate committee. There can be no question but that he refused to answer these questions. But a jury found him not guilty.

Before the same Senate committee Stewart said he had no knowledge or information with regard to these Continental Trading Co. bonds, and further said that he never had received any of them. It was shown that at the time he made these statements three-quarters of a million dollars' worth of these self-same bonds were reposing in the vault in his office in Chicago; and, still further, Stewart testified that he had received these bonds in his own hands from the hands of Osler, the dark-horse official of the dark-horse Continental Trading Co. But a District of Columbia jury said he was not guilty of perjury, and that ends that.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. I did not notice the publication of the jury's statement. Was it a formal statement published in the newspapers explaining their verdict?

Mr. NYE. It was; and endeavoring to show that the acquittal of Mr. Stewart and the failure of the jury to find him guilty was not determined upon any technical ground at all, but that, in a general way, they did not consider that Mr. Stewart was guilty in any respect as charged.

Mr. BROOKHART. What was the occasion for the jury coming forward with that kind of an explanation?

Mr. NYE. I should hardly desire to draw any conclusion on that point.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota if it is not fair to presume that the occasion of issuing the statement by the jury was to help Colonel Stewart to secure control of the stockholders and get the proxies which would be necessary to reelect him to his present position?

Mr. NYE. In the face of the circumstances that we encounter from day to day, I think that is altogether a fair presumption, indeed.

Mr. BROOKHART. Then it would indicate that the jury had been approached and solicited to make this statement?

Mr. NYE. It would.

Mr. BROOKHART. I have noticed in Iowa newspapers full page advertisements from certain stockholders of the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana setting forth in bold, black type, "Colonel Stewart stood by us; let us stand by Colonel Stewart." I saw such advertisements in the Des Moines Register, the largest newspaper in the State. That would indicate that a good deal of money was being spent to spread this idea, and that some of the stockholders at least were sustaining Stewart in his method of obtaining these profits.

Mr. NYE. Yes; the Senator is right. On the other hand, what a certain few stockholders may do ought not to be made to stand as the principle of all stockholders in the Standard Oil Co., for we well know that there are those who are taking just the other side in this controversy and are making the fight to clean up their own organization.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. SACKETT] asks who was spending the money. The advertisement that I read stated that the stockholders themselves were spending it.

Mr. NYE. The individual stockholders?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes. Of course, I do not know myself.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, do the farmers of Iowa own Standard Oil stock?

Mr. BROOKHART. I have not heard of any farmer owning any stock anywhere except in some little banks out in our State that failed.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, going back to the argument I was making, it does not abate one whit the fact that Stewart willfully and deliberately sought to mislead this committee. The explanation offered by Stewart while on trial, that in fact he never had received any of these bonds because he had drawn a declaration of trust in favor of certain oil companies, it seems was accepted by the jury.

These facts are offered, not in dissent from any action taken by either courts or jury, but for the purpose of reminding the Senate of the true character of the statements of Stewart, which, in the first place, impelled this body to invoke the action of the courts, and for a further purpose, I will admit, of refreshing the memories of those who are about to indicate their approval or disapproval of the Stewart type of business man who in self-defense casts a robe of righteousness about those acts which are of a most detestable type.

Speaking only as a member of the Public Lands Committee, and not necessarily for the committee, I desire to say that the extensive inquiries which have been conducted into the oil scandals ought to have won returns of more than one nature. They should serve and do serve to cause departments of Government to proceed with greater care and caution in matters involving leasing of the public domain. They have served, too, to restore vast resources to the Government, resources worth billions, in addition to the direct money returns to the Treasury. But above all else the investigations ought to have created a determination in the circles of the oil people of the land to cleanse the industry of agents and officials who by their methods bring the entire industry into bad repute.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I have on my desk a letter that I have received from one of the stockholders of the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana, and I think, in connection with the question propounded by the Senator from Iowa a while ago as to the object of circulating this statement by the jury, it is very pat.

As we all know, and as the Senator has so well described, there is now going on a contest over the reelection of Colonel Stewart as chairman of the board of directors of the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana. The advertisement to which the Senator refers, published in Iowa by some of the stockholders, would indicate that some of these stockholders favor the reelection of Colonel Stewart to that place, because they, as stockholders, got the benefit of the illegal and fraudulent scheme in which he and the Continental Trading Co. were engaged, by which they made several millions of dollars.

Judging from this letter, the contest going on between Mr. Rockefeller and Colonel Stewart has been, on the part at least of Colonel Stewart, rather out of the ordinary; and, with the permission of the Senator, I should like to read a portion of the letter. I should be glad to read it all were it not for the fact that this man is now an employee of the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana, and, of course, I do not want to identify him or get him into any difficulty.

Mr. NYE. If the Senator will permit me, I might suggest that numerous such letters have come to my desk from stockholders and employees of the Standard Oil Co.

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to read a portion of the letter. He says:

> I am an employee of the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana; and, as you no doubt already know, Col. Robert Stewart, of the Standard Oil Co., and J. D. Rockefeller, jr., of the Standard Oil Co., are fighting among themselves as to who shall be the biggest duck in the puddle.
>
> Most of the employees are stockholders in the Standard Oil Co. through their stock-purchasing plan; and Colonel Stewart is sending some of the bosses, and so forth, around to all stockholders with proxy votes to sign to retain Colonel Stewart as chairman of the board of directors; and these bosses or representatives are using some tactics in getting signers that do not appeal to me. They stand by and argue for Stewart, and want you to sign on the dotted line.
> Usually we get our proxy votes by mail, which is just and proper, and it is nobody's business how a man votes, or if he votes at all. J. D. Rockefeller, jr., is also sending proxy votes to each stockholder through the mail, which is just and proper.

If this is a fair indication, this contest is getting very exciting. There are several other things that this man says in this letter, referring to the methods by which they undertake to compel stockholders to "sign on the dotted line," as he says; but I can not read them without identifying the man who writes the letter, and therefore I will not read further.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senator from Nebraska that those who have supported Mr. Stewart perhaps want to impress upon those who own stock generally that he is the best man to have charge because he has defied the Government. He withheld important testimony from the Government when he was asked for it. The Senate ordered him to give that testimony. He defied the Senate, stood in contempt of the Senate, and then, by tampering with the jury in the District of Columbia, he was acquitted. Perhaps he feels now that he is the man to put at the head of this concern because he can do as he pleases, and the Government can not touch him.

Mr. NYE. It rather looks to me as though some of these stockholders want him elected because he gave them the benefit of the stealing.

CONSTRUCTION OF CRUISERS

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11526) to authorize the construction of certain naval vessels, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the committee amendment.

Mr. HALE, Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fess	McMaster	Shipstead
Barkley	Fletcher	McNary	Shortridge
Bayard	Frazier	Mayfield	Simmons
Bingham	George	Metcalf	Smith
Black	Gerry	Neely	Smoot
Blaine	Gillett	Norbeck	Steiwer

Borah	Glenn	Nye	Swanson
Bratton	Gould	Oddie	Thomas, Idaho
Brookhart	Greene	Overman	Trammell
Bruce	Hale	Phipps	Tydings
Burton	Harris	Pine	Tyson
Capper	Hawes	Pittman	Vandenberg

Curtis	Johnson	Reed, Pa.	Warren
Dale	Jones	Robinson, Ark.	Waterman
Deneen	Kendrick	Sackett	Watson
Dill	Keyes	Schall	Wheeler
Edge	McKellar	Sheppard

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. HOWELL] on account of illness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the pending committee amendment. I will give in just a word an explanation of what this amendment would do, and Senators will understand it when I say that it is a substitute for the Dallinger amendment.

My amendment would put in the bill, in lieu of the Dallinger amendment and the committee amendment, the language which has for a number of years past—some four or five years—been found in the annual appropriation bills as passed by the Congress for the Navy Department. Under that language the Secretary of the Navy has, within the past few years, provided that three of the eight cruisers recently built or building be built in Government yards, and five in private yards. The amendment would require the Secretary to build cruisers in Government yards unless he is convinced that they can be built at decidedly greater advantage to the public in private yards.

The Dallinger amendment requires 8 of the 15 cruisers to be built in Government yards, no matter how much more it may cost the taxpayers of the United States. This amendment which I have offered would prevent extravagant sums being asked for the building of naval vessels, and it provides that they shall be built in navy yards whenever such building would not involve an appreciable increase in their cost.

This has been our recent practice and has worked to the benefit of the taxpayer and the private builder.

It has kept the private contractor from charging exorbitant amounts, and has, at the same time, given the navy yards enough work to keep them busy.

The language which it is proposed to strike out would require the building of eight cruisers in Government yards without regard to their higher cost or to the needs or facilities of the navy yards.

It is important that the decision should be left to the Secretary of the Navy, because the private shipyards and the navy yards are assets of equal national importance, and because at the present time the private shipbuilding industry is seriously depressed. One private shipyard after the other is being closed, and out of 22 shipyards in operation early in 1916, before the United States entered the war, only 11 are now operating. The latest casualty is that of the Los Angeles Shipbuilding & Drydock Co.

The World War proved the importance of the private shipyard to the Nation, as practically all naval construction during the war period was in the private shipyards. The most important of this work was the construction of torpedo-boat destroyers and submarines.

It is well known that private shipyards can build naval vessels more quickly and at a lower cost than can the navy yards. But this will not be true if the navy yards are forced to build a larger number of these cruisers than in the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy will be advantageous to the taxpayers. If the bill goes through in its present form, the navy yards will virtually be obliged to take away from the private yards their present staffs unless the private yards increase their labor costs and the cost of the ships to a point where they can hold their staffs against the competition offered by more attractive conditions in Government navy yards.

Under present arrangements the private shipyards are barely able to keep going. Shipbuilders are in keen competition with the navy yards, and the selection of the builder remains under the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy. It is to continue this practice, which has worked well for Government and for the private shipyards, that the present amendment is offered.

Mr. ODDIE obtained the floor.

Mr. BROOKHART and Mr. McKELLAR addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BROOKHART. I would like to ask the Senator from Connecticut a question.

Mr. ODDIE. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. The theory of the Senator's amendment is to encourage private shipbuilding companies, is it not?

Mr. BINGHAM. The theory of the amendment, which is offered in accordance with existing law, is to secure the building of the ships at the lowest possible cost to the taxpayers of the United States, without regard to where the ships are to be built, because it provides that the Secretary of the Navy shall build them in Government shipyards unless they can be built cheaper elsewhere.

Mr. BROOKHART. I want to ask the Senator if he believes in the theory of war profiteering, believes that is a sound policy on which to act, or is he in favor of preventing war profiteering?

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator's question answers itself. I never heard of anyone being in favor of profiteering.

Mr. BROOKHART. Then why should we not oppose profiteering in preparing for war?

Mr. BINGHAM. That is exactly what this amendment would prevent. Under the bill it is provided that private shipyards must build seven of the cruisers. Under my amendment the Secretary of the Navy must build all the cruisers unless the private shipyards can do it cheaper than the Government can.

Mr. BROOKHART. If the private shipyards build them, they build them at a profit, and they build them because they make a profit. If the Government yards build them, they can make no profit. The Government desires to build them at cost. Suppose they do cost more in the Government yards. It stops profiteering. That is one of the most potent causes of war.

Mr. BINGHAM. It costs the taxpayer more, however.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield to me to ask a question?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator's proposed amendment affect in any way the so-called Dallinger amendment, or does it apply solely to the amendment of the committee?

Mr. BINGHAM. It moves to strike out the whole Dallinger amendment and the amendment of the committee, and is a substitute for the committee amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President——

Mr. ODDIE. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. May I suggest to the Senator from Tennessee that the effect of the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut is to eliminate entirely the Dallinger amendment, and to put the construction of these cruisers in the discretion, in reality, of the Navy Department.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am much obliged to the Senator from California. The amendment of the Senator from Connecticut was not read, and I did not know what it was. Of course, I am very much opposed to any such discretion being left with the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, may I suggest that experience has taught that, if that discretion be accorded, then there probably will be no construction of these cruisers in the yards where they ought to be constructed, the yards that are owned by the United States Government, maintained, conducted, and operated by the United States Government.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, we are constructing now eight cruisers, and three of them are being constructed in Government yards.

Mr. JOHNSON. And five otherwise. It would be a very easy step to put one in a Government yard and seven otherwise, or eight all together.

Mr. HALE. Or eight all together in the Government yards.

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, yes; or eight all together in the Government yards.

Mr. McKELLAR. But that is not going to be done.

Mr. JOHNSON. There is nothing to indicate that there will be eight built in the Government yards.

Mr. HALE. Three out of eight is a fair proportion.

Mr. JOHNSON. I quite disagree with the Senator about three out of eight being a fair proportion.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, does the Senator from Maine consent to this amendment? As the chairman of the committee he was directed to stand by the Dallinger amendment.

Mr. HALE. I object very seriously to it.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator is simply defending the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut, not accepting it.

Mr. HALE. I am not defending it in any way. I am defending the committee amendment, which we put in. We provided that half the cruisers should be built in Government yards, and that I stand for.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then there is no difference between the Senator from Maine and myself in regard to the matter.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I think there is. I think unquestionably the Senator will be opposed to the committee amendment when he examines into the effect of it. The committee amendment virtually gives to the Secretary of the Navy discretion to build these ships where he likes, and merely makes of the Government yards assembling plants, and I am wholly unwilling to make those Government yards assembling plants.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. JOHNSON. Just a moment. I am speaking of the construction of the cruisers themselves and not referring to the subsequent amendment found in lines 12 to 14. That we will reach subsequently, or very shortly, in the debate; but under the Dallinger amendment, by which the chairman of the committee stands, the construction of the cruisers themselves is put eight in the Government yards for construction and the construction of seven subsequently to be determined.

Mr. HALE. That is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I was interested in what was said about the real object of this substitute, namely, to save the taxpayers' money by building the ships in private yards. The Senator said nothing about the various navy yards that we have and which the taxpayers have to pay to keep up anyway, whether they build ships or not.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is a mere bagatelle, of course. I fear that I have occupied too much of the time of the Senator from Nevada on this subject.

Mr. ODDIE. I am glad to have the Senator speak.

Mr. JOHNSON. I shall subsequently speak further of this, because I have the figures from one navy yard at least, the Mare Island Navy Yard, which is situated in the State of California, showing that the construction there of ships, in comparison with the construction in private yards, has been infinitely cheaper, and that the saving has been extraordinarily great to the Government because of construction in the Government yards.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the record so shows.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield to me to propound a question to the Senator from California?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. If that be correct—and there is no question, of course, about its correctness if the Senator from California states it—would not the effect of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut be to compel the Secretary of the Navy to give the Mare Island yard a contract for a ship?

Mr. JOHNSON. Perhaps, and perhaps not. I assume from the question that the Senator from New Jersey is in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. EDGE. I am.

Mr. JOHNSON. And he would be in favor of it, because, like me, he is in favor of construction in the Government yard, I take it.

Mr. EDGE. If the Government bids and specifications demonstrate that they can construct the ships as cheaply as they can be constructed in private yards.

Mr. JOHNSON. My position is that I want to take no chances on where the construction will be, and with the knowledge I have of the cheapness of the construction in the Mare Island Navy Yard, at least, I want to see that the Government gets the benefit of that construction.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, if I understand the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut correctly—and I think I do—it makes it absolutely compulsory, does it not, on the Secretary of the Navy to award the contract to a Government yard if the ships could be built cheaper therein?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes; I would like to make the computation, if we are going to select the yards, instead of leaving the computation to be made by somebody else. I realize how delicate a thing such a computation may be ultimately in awarding a contract of that sort, and I want to leave nothing of doubt to the future at all.

Mr. EDGE. I might suggest that in analyzing the estimates we must trust some one, and if we can not trust the head of one of the departments of the Government, together with the engineers and the others associated with him, I do not know just to what authority the Senator would prefer to refer such bids or specifications.

Mr. JOHNSON. The authority of the Congress that prescribes where they shall be built. That is the authority.

Mr. EDGE. In other words, the Senator—and I think I understand his position, and it is one taken by a great many others—simply wants an arbitrary provision that, irrespective of cost, irrespective of the conditions, the Secretary of the Navy shall be compelled to award a contract for so many ships, irrespective of price, to the navy yards, and the other number to private yards.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator may put it that broadly if he wishes.

Mr. EDGE. Is not that the exact situation?

Mr. JOHNSON. The result, however, would be a saving to the Nation, and that has been demonstrated in the past.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield?

Mr. JOHNSON. I am occupying the time of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. ODDIE. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SWANSON. The committee of the Senate, after hearing all sides on the question, reached the conclusion that half of the ships ought to be constructed in Government navy yards and half in private yards, in order to keep them both running and busy, in order to keep both available in the country for business, as competitors. Now, an amendment is offered which would make it impossible to give the construction of any of these vessels to the navy yards.

A private yard can bid a specific sum for the construction of a cruiser, but a navy yard can only make an estimate, and if it underestimates then the Government pays the difference. The Navy Department is hired to reach a real definite conclusion on the estimates and to determine which is cheaper. In navy-yard construction all of the overhead is included which occurs there regardless of whether we build the ships or not. A great many supporters of the plan to build all ships in the navy yards say they are built more cheaply in the navy yards. The private yards say they are constructed more cheaply in the private yards. But here is the test. By means of the plan proposed, we will be able to determine which is the cheaper, because the Government yards will have constructed every other one of a number of vessels of the same character and kind, and at the same time and under the same conditions.

During the 20 years that I have been here there has been a debate on the matter of bookkeeping, on the theory that it costs the Government more money to build a vessel than it would to construct it in a private yard. The Government has employees who have been with it 20 or 25 years, who have built homes near the navy yards, and who will have to move away and find some other employment if work is not given the navy yards to keep them busy. Does any Senator mean to say that it is the policy of the Government in this day that we shall turn all our shipbuilding work over to the private yards and in effect tell these employees to scatter throughout the country at other employment and lose their homes near the Government navy yards?

We have in the State of Virginia one of the largest private yards in the United States and one of the best navy yards. I thought it just and fair to the Government yard and just and fair to the private yard to divide the work between them.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield to me to reply to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. ODDIE. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator from Virginia will recognize that it requires no wizardry of figures and that it requires no stretch of the imagination to understand that if comparisons can be made under the circumstances detailed by the Senator, an individual who does not want to go to the Government yards for the construction of a cruiser can always take it into a private yard.

Mr. SWANSON. I think the time has come to make the test.

Mr. JOHNSON. Let us make it.

Mr. SWANSON. I believe we will save money by doing it, because it will be a contest between the private yards and the navy yards to determine which can give us the best work for the most reasonable price.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield to me to ask the Senator from Virginia a question?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. We have been building ships a long time. Have there been no figures made available to show by the average during all these years which is the best plan for the Government, which furnishes the cheapest and still the best work, whether the private yards or the Government yards?

Mr. SWANSON. It is claimed by the navy-yard advocates that the vessels constructed at the Norfolk Navy Yard were splendid pieces of work and at a great saving. It is a question of what expense will be distributed as overhead to the respective ships. If we distribute too much of the overhead, which the people who want to build in the navy yards say ought not to be distributed, then we make the ships cost more. If we distribute less, of course, they cost less. The question occurs as to the amount of overhead in the navy yards that is to be charged to the individual ships.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. EDGE. I would like to ask the Senator from Virginia a further question and then, I assure the Senator from Nevada, I shall not interrupt further. Under the amendment approved by the committee, as I understand it, it is then arbitrary that eight of the vessels go to private yards?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes; and then we have two aircraft carriers on which there is no limitation.

Mr. EDGE. In other words, the distribution is fixed?

Mr. SWANSON. Yes.

Mr. EDGE. I do not for a moment say that it will happen, but all these contingencies must be considered when we are establishing a policy. In that event, what is to prevent the private yards, realizing that under the terms of the bill they must be awarded a contract for eight ships, holding up their prices to whatever figure they choose?

Mr. SWANSON. The bill simply says that every other cruiser shall be built in the navy yards, and it is left discretionary as to the others, with permission to build in private yards unless they ask too great a price. The Government can reject any bid it sees fit.

Mr. EDGE. They have the power to reject bids?

Mr. SWANSON. They have the power to reject any bid.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have an amendment to the amendment of the committee. Will that come ahead of the substitute that is offered by the Senator from Connecticut?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will.

Mr. McKELLAR. I now offer my amendment and ask that it may be read—with the permission of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. ODDIE. I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. Amend the committee amendment, on page 2, line 12, following the comma and after the words "United States," by striking out the remaining language and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

Except such incidental parts as can not be manufactured in such Government plants.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

Mr. ODDIE. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BROOKHART. I would like to ask a question of the Senator from Virginia. With regard to overhead, is it not true there will be a large overhead expense in the navy yards even if they stand idle?

Mr. SWANSON. Some of them are standing idle, more or less, while some of them do a great deal of work. The Government-owned ships have to be overhauled there. It has been a very difficult question as to what overhead should be applied to the building of additional cruisers, and to each particular one. The Navy people who want to build them in the navy yards insist that they ought not to charge any of the overhead except such as is occasioned from the fact that the cruisers have been assigned there to be built. Those who advocate the building of the cruisers in the private yards would like to charge a larger part of the entire overhead to the construction of the cruisers. It is a very difficult matter to determine what part of the overhead should be and should not be assigned to the construction of each cruiser.

Mr. BROOKHART. If all the ships were built in private yards there would still be a big overhead to-day in the navy yards?

Mr. SWANSON. To a large extent there would be some overhead there. The greatest dispute has mostly been in connection with the distribution of overhead.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield to me to make a brief statement?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield.

Mr. HALE. I think perhaps it would be well for me to explain why the committee took the action it did take.

During the war a number of ways were constructed in the navy yards of the country capable of taking cruisers. There was 1 way in the Boston yard, 2 in the New York yard, 2 in the Philadelphia yard, 1 at Norfolk, 1 at Mare Island, and a ship dock, which is capable of taking two ships, at Puget Sound. On those ways substantially $10,000,000 was expended. At the same time that those ways were built a very great amount of money was expended in the navy yards of the country to enable them to build ships and to put the yards in condition both to build and repair ships. These yards are now used almost exclusively for the repairing of the ships of the Navy. All of the repairing of the ships of the Navy is done in the navy yards. These yards, except in the case of the yard at Mare Island, the yard at Puget Sound, and the yard at New York, are not now being used for the construction of ships. The yards are well able to take care of the construction of ships such as the cruisers. The committee on looking over the matter decided that in their opinion it would be for the benefit of the country to have the ways put to use, and they felt that it would be economical to the country and useful to the organizations in the navy yards to do construction work as well as repair work.

The question has been asked as to whether it is more expensive or less expensive to build in the private yards or the navy yards. The committee held very extensive hearings on the matter and we were not able to determine definitely from the evidence that was given us whether a ship can be built more cheaply in a navy yard or in a private yard. From the hearings and the evidence that was given, we came to the conclusion that the cost is pretty nearly the same—that is, the actual cost to the Government. The cost of building a ship in the navy yards is made up of the material, the direct labor, the variable overhead, which depends on the actual work being done on the particular ship in question, and the fixed overhead, which goes on all the time.

In all probability if we take the direct labor and the material and the variable overhead, which are all items that come under the appropriation for increase of the Navy, the ships can be built slightly cheaper in the navy yards of the country. If, on the other hand, we add to that the fixed overhead which with the variable makes up the statistical charge for the entire ship, in all probability it would cost a little more. But the net charge to the Government is very nearly the same as far as the committee could ascertain.

On that account and believing that it would be for the best interests of the country that ships be built in the navy yards of the country, we were willing to accept the House amendment, the so-called Dallinger amendment, with certain modifications. This matter does not deal alone with the construction of the hulls and the machinery of the ships. It also deals with the armor and armament on the ships. Had we not amended the Dallinger amendment and had we left the House bill as it was, everything that is used in the construction of these ships, including armor and armament, would have had to be constructed in the navy yards of the country. There are certain things that are never constructed in the navy yards of the country and that could not be constructed in the navy yards with their present facilities.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield so I may ask the Senator from Maine a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that without the amendment offered by the committee the fire-control apparatus, the range finders——

Mr. HALE. I am just going to speak of those matters if the Senator will give me a chance.

For instance, the fire-control instruments in use on the ships are instruments of very intricate construction. It would be absolutely impossible with the present facilities to manufacture them in the navy yards of the country. Certain parts of the fire-control instruments are now manufactured by the Government, but other parts are patented, and the Government has not the use of the patents. The Government also has not the facilities for the extremely fine work required in the manufacture of certain of these fire-control instruments. Fire-control, I may explain, has to do with the firing of the guns on the ships of the Navy. It is a very technical and scientific mechanism which it would be difficult to explain to the Senate, but this work can not now be done in the navy yards of the country.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maine yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the junior Senator from Maryland?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada has yielded to the junior Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. I should like to point out to the Senator from Maine that it was shown by the experts who appeared before our committee that even in some cases where the material could be manufactured in Government yards the price would be two or three times what the same article could be procured for from private concerns.

Mr. HALE. That is quite true.

Mr. TYDINGS. And it was not only the inability of the Government to handle the entire equipment but the item of saving which caused the committee to insert the particular language which is in the amendment.

Mr. HALE. And the Government can not construct these various instruments without an expenditure of a very great amount of money to provide for their manufacture. Nobody wants to see that done. What we want to see is a fair proposition that will save as much to the Government as possible.

Other things which are not made in Government navy yards include chronometers, watches, and certain auxiliary equipment; also the heavy deck and side plating for the ships.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Would it not be possible to have many of these articles made by private concerns and then taken over to the navy yards?

Mr. HALE. Certainly it would be possible, and that is what is done now. Where the Government itself can not manufacture articles it purchases them outside, and then reassembles them in the navy yards.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. I want to ask if private yards make all of these different articles which the Senator from Maine has mentioned, such as chronometers?

Mr. HALE. No, Mr. President, they do not.

Mr. FRAZIER. Then what is the difference?

Mr. HALE. Private yards buy them, and that is what we want to be able to do in Government navy yards.

Mr. FRAZIER. Of course, the Government yards, I take it, would have to buy the things they do not themselves manufacture?

Mr. HALE. Precisely. That is what we want to arrange for in the amendment which is now being discussed. If the Dallinger amendment were left in the bill unamended every article of equipment would have to be made in Government yards, and that we want to get away from.

Mr. FRAZIER. I do not see it in that way at all.

Mr. HALE. That is the purpose of the committee amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why not permit the Government plants——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator permit me to conclude?

Mr. McKELLAR. I should like to ask a question right on that point. Why can not the Government plants which may be awarded the construction of any of these ships be authorized to buy the necessary parts which the yards themselves do not manufacture? That would be the way to do it.

Mr. HALE. That is what the amendment which was inserted by the committee provides.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; the amendment provides for making the Government yards assembling plants.

Mr. HALE. That was not the intention of the committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. It may not have been the intention of the committee, but that is the effect of the language used.

Mr. HALE. I do not think that is the effect of the language.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I should like to finish my statement in a connected manner.

I have referred to the question of armor and armament. We have in this country a large armor and forging plant at Charleston, W. Va. That plant was built to take care of the great ships that were provided for in the 1916 program. It is a Government plant, and it cost a great amount of money; about $24,000,000 was expended on it. That plant can make armor of all kinds and can make gun forgings. It can not, however, complete the guns as there are no shrinkage pits which are used in connection with such work, and none have been provided for that plant. It can also make projectiles for use on the ships of the Navy.

Mr. McKELLAR. Would it cost much to equip the plant so that it could make the guns and the armor to which the Senator has referred?

Mr. HALE. It would cost a great deal to operate the plant to make guns, forgings, and projectiles. There will be no armor on the cruisers provided for by this bill; so that the Senate need not be concerned as to that feature.

Mr. McKELLAR. How about the forgings of which the Senator spoke?

Mr. HALE. To rehabilitate the plant so that it could operate would cost between $225,000 and $250,000. But, Mr. President, the plant is a tremendous one; the overhead expense of running it is absolutely prohibitive unless it is being operated at full force, and the work that will be done on these cruisers would not warrant the opening of the plant and spending the tremendous amount for overhead.

Mr. McKELLAR. What is it costing the Government to keep that plant in its present condition? Is there anything being done with it?

Mr. HALE. It is simply being kept up. I can give the Senator the figures, although I have not them at hand at the moment.

Mr. McKELLAR. Has the Senator any idea how much the cost of maintaining the plant now is?

Mr. HALE. My impression is that it costs about $100,000 a year merely to keep it up.

Mr. McKELLAR. Are there many men employed there now?

Mr. HALE. No; merely a sufficient number to watch the buildings and keep them up.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the cost of using what that plant might manufacture is prohibitive, why should not the Government sell the plant and get rid of it; and also get rid of the enormous expense every year?

Mr. HALE. Because later on, when we are beginning to build battleships to take the place of those which will be replaced under the provisions of the Washington treaty, which grew out of the Conference on the Limitation of Armament, we shall need that plant.

Mr. McKELLAR. When will that be?

Mr. HALE. The Senator recalls the provisions of the Washington treaty. The first ship is to be laid down in 1931.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Washington Conference on Limitation of Armament ought to be remembered by everybody, because that was the greatest naval victory that Great Britain ever won in her history, and she has won many naval victories.

Mr. HALE. I will not undertake to argue that with the Senator.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE] has the floor.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator from Nevada will permit me, I simply wish to say that we have to protect the Government; that in order to protect the Government we can not take the House bill as it came over to us, and the committee, in order to take care of the situation, added the following words to the provisions of the bill:

> Except such material or parts thereof as the Secretary of the Navy may find procurable by contract or purchase at an appreciable saving in cost to the Government.

The Senator from Tennessee objects to that, as he thinks it will make the Government yards simply assembling plants. That was not, I say, the intention of the committee in any way.

Mr. McKELLAR. Whether or not it was the intention of the committee—that, in my judgment, is the result of the phraseology employed by the committee.

Mr. HALE. I think there need be little fear that anything of the kind will happen.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator says that the ships could not be built under the language of the Dallinger amendment. I want to ask the Senator if it is not true that the appropriation act of March 4, 1913, in authorizing the construction of one first-class battleship, used this language:

Provided, That the battleship herein authorized shall be built in a Government navy yard.

It was built in a Government navy yard; it was fully equipped; everything that ought to have gone on that battleship was put on it; and there was not any loss about it. If that could be done in that case, why could not these cruisers be built under the Dallinger amendment as it stands? Of course, there may be lamps or there may be chronometers or there may be clocks that the Government will have to buy on the outside, but as practical men I think we should realize that if the vessels were constructed in Government yards they would be equipped with everything necessary. To my mind the real object of the amendment of the committee is to throw the Dallinger amendment into conference, and I do not think it ought to be thrown into conference. I think the Dallinger amendment ought to be allowed to stand just as it is. There ought to be a fair division in the construction of these cruisers between private shipbuilders or private yards and Government yards. Everybody seems to agree to that. So why not stand by the Dallinger amendment, which provides for that in every proper way? Every safeguard is thrown around the construction, and the amendment ought not to be interfered with; it ought not to be put into conference, but, I repeat, ought to stand as it is.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I will state that I would never consent to vote for the so-called Dallinger amendment as it appears in the House bill, and I do not think that the other members of the committee would do so. They are in favor—and the committee has so reported—of constructing eight of the proposed cruisers in Government yards; but they want to have such provision made as will make sure that the Government is not going to be put to the extraordinary expense of going into businesses in which it is not engaged at the present time in order to provide all the material and parts used on these vessels. That is the purpose of the amendment the committee has added to the bill.

Mr. President, those who want the ships built in the Government yards ought all to be in favor of the committee amendment or something similar to it. If it is going to cost a prohibitive price to build these ships in the navy yards of the country, the country is never going to stand for it; Congress in the future will never allow ships to be built in the navy yards if it is going to cost very much more to do so than it costs to build them in the private yards. All that the committee wants to do is to bring about conditions where the Government yards will be on the same basis as private yards. Private yards do not manufacture all the various parts that are used in the construction of such ships, and neither should the Government yards be forced to do so. They should be put on an equal footing, and that is the reason for the amendment which the committee has recommended.

Mr. WHEELER. Does not the Senator from Maine think that the Government could purchase the necessary parts if the Dallinger amendment were allowed to remain in the bill?

Mr. HALE. No, sir; I do not think so, for under that amendment all the parts used in the construction of the vessels would have to be made in Government yards.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President——

Mr. ODDIE. I think I still have the floor; but I am anxious to see this discussion continued, for it is very pertinent. So, while I have the floor, I will yield.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I offer as a substitute for the amendment reported by the committee the amendment which I send to the desk and which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the committee, it is proposed to insert the following:

except such material or parts as are not customarily manufactured in such Government plants.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator to the fact——

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I can not yield to the Senator until I explain my amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to say that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia is almost in the exact words of the amendment which I offered a few moments ago and which takes precedence, I should think, because otherwise the amendment of the Senator from Virginia will be in the third degree. There is only a difference of two words between the Senator's amendment and the one I have offered.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator has taken this amendment of mine and has butchered it. That is what he has done. I showed the amendment to him, and he butchered it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think it is butchered in the right direction.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I am in favor of constructing half of the vessels which it is proposed to build in Government navy yards, because I think they can be constructed as cheaply in Government yards as they can in private yards. I am not willing to hamper their construction in Government yards.

Mr. WHEELER. Which navy yard?

Mr. SWANSON. Not one on Salt Creek or the Great Lakes or the St. Lawrence River.

Mr. WHEELER. Not the St. Lawrence River.

Mr. SWANSON. I presume the Senator and others will never be in favor of a big navy until the ships shall be constructed in that region, and not until then.

Mr. WHEELER. I think the Senator is judging me by himself.

Mr. SWANSON. No; I am not judging the Senator in that way; but he meant to imply that because there was a navy yard in Virginia I was in favor of this provision. The Senator knows that that has nothing to do with my attitude.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I inquire what is the language of the amendment.

Mr. SWANSON. I will ask that it be read again.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a suggestion?

Mr. SWANSON. No; let me explain the matter.

My position is this: These ships are being constructed in navy yards. The navy yards constructed them during the war. People know what it is customary to construct in navy yards and what it is customary to obtain outside. It is clear. It is a custom of years and years. People know what it is customary for a private yard to buy outside and what it is customary for it to construct in the yard.

This amendment puts a Government navy yard on an exact parity with a private yard, at no advantage or disadvantage; and such things as have been named by the Senator, not being customarily constructed in a navy yard, can be purchased outside.

The trouble with this amendment as reported, however, is that it goes further. I favored it in the committee, but a reexamination shows that they could make a navy yard merely an assembling plant and get all the parts wherever they wanted to and take them to the navy yard and assemble them there.

It seems to me that this amendment gets rid of the trouble that is in the mind of the Senator from Tennessee, gets rid of the trouble that is in the mind of the Senator from Maine, puts the private yards and the navy yards on an equality, and compels them to construct in the navy yards everything except such things as are not customarily constructed or produced in navy yards. It seems to me that ought to satisfy everybody. If a man wants things constructed in a navy yard he would not want them to cost too much, because if that were the case no more would be built there.

I am satisfied that under this amendment substantially everything that ought to be produced in a navy yard will be produced there.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, I want to say that the amendment now offered by the Senator from Virginia differs only in two words from the one that I have offered, and I have no doubt we could iron out that difference very easily. I want to say to the Senator in all good faith, however, that in my judgment whenever any amendment is offered to the Dallinger amendment it puts the entire Dallinger amendment in conference; and I am not sure that it is to the best interest of the people to put that amendment in conference again and endanger it.

I think these ships ought to be built one-half in Government yards and one-half in private yards. I think the arrangement that the committee have brought out here is a very excellent one. I think it takes care of them all. I do not think there ought to be any amendment at all, and I hope there will not be an amendment; but if we do have to have an amendment, the one that is now offered by the Senator from Virginia, which is substantially the same as the one I suggested awhile ago, is the least objectionable one that I have seen.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr President, if the Senator will permit me, I expect to be on the conference committee. I presume I shall be on it. I am the ranking Democrat on the committee, and I have been on every conference committee since I have been so situated.

Mr. McKELLAR. We all hope the Senator will be on the committee, anyway.

Mr. SWANSON. So far as I am concerned, I will never agree that the part of the Dallinger amendment that is adopted shall be gotten rid of in conference.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope we can have the same assurance from the chairman of the committee

Mr. HALE. I certainly will not consent to cut out the provisions of the Dallinger amendment which provide that certain ships shall be built in the navy yards of the country, and I do not believe we would have a right to do so if we wanted to, if this amendment is adopted.

Mr. SWANSON. And it is not in conference.

Mr. McKELLAR. At all events, the Senator is not in favor of changing that language?

Mr. HALE. Not at all.

Mr. SWANSON. No; it is not in conference. The reason why we did not change the Dallinger amendment was because, if we did, it would be in conference. All that would be in conference here would be this amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. O Mr. President——

Mr. SWANSON. That is what we shall insist.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am quite sure that if part of a proviso is amended, the whole proviso is in conference.

Mr SWANSON. I hope the Senator from Maine will accept that amendment.

Mr. HALE. I am willing to accept the amendment, because I think it provides what the committee intended to do with its amendment.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator from Nevada, may I ask the chairman of the committee a question?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. Has the committee ascertained whether there is a lack of facilities on the part of our naval stations and navy yards throughout the country, an inability on their part to furnish all that is necessary for the construction and equipment of one of these cruisers?

Mr. HALE. I have already said that there are certain material and articles that can not be furnished in the navy yards. There are certain patented articles, pumps, parts of the machinery, and so forth, certain equipment that is used on the ships that can not be furnished by the navy yards with their existing facilities.

Mr. SMITH. Then, does the Senator construe the language of the Dallinger amendment in such a way that without this proviso the navy yard that has the construction of a vessel would not be authorized to purchase those things outside?

Mr. HALE. Yes; I do so construe it. I consider that the navy yards would have to go into the business of producing these various articles that they do not now produce.

Mr. SMITH. Unless it was the right of the Government to utilize private patents, how would we go about furnishing our yards with this equipment? How could we do that unless we were to infringe a patent, or have the patent right released, or construct a plant to do it?

Mr. HALE. The patents could not be used, Mr. President, unless the rights were purchased or conceded; we would have to manage without them as best we could.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nevada will permit me, we must remember that the Comptroller General will have to pass on these appropriations and certify them before they are available. If this language is left there, and we do not insert "such as are customarily bought outside," and there are certain things that it is just as customary to purchase outside in private yards as in others, he could fail to certify the appropriation, and order the construction stopped.

Mr. SMITH. It seems to me to be an absurd position for us to take to consign to a certain navy yard the construction of a vessel and then have the whole business held up because there might be some minor part or essential part that they themselves could not construct and did not have in stock, and they would be absolutely helpless to go on unless we provide that they could go out and buy such things as they did not have in stock.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator from South Carolina that I am sure no such construction as was contended for by the Senator from Maine could possibly be placed on the Dallinger amendment. It says:

And provided further, That the first and each succeeding alternate cruiser upon which work is undertaken—

Then it says:

together with the main engines, armor, and armament for such light cruisers, the construction and manufacture of which is authorized by this act, shall be constructed or manufactured in the Government navy yards—

And so forth. It seems to me that stating specifically there "together with the main engines, armor, and armament for such light cruisers" expressly implies in this amendment itself that those things that can not be made in the navy yards should be purchased outside. Otherwise there would not have been any necessity at all for putting it there—together with the main engines, armor, and armament for such light cruisers.

Mr. SMITH. It seemed to me to be a monstrous proposition to equip navy yards for the purpose of constructing vessels and then to put a proviso in whatever enabling act we may pass saying to them, "Now, we must give you a right to go outside or else you can not construct the ships."

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator from South Carolina that, in my opinion, there is really no necessity at all for the amendment that has been put in the bill by the Naval Affairs Committee?

You will observe that in the public yards certain construction is to be done. The implication by the bill is that in private yards certain construction is to be done. Now, respecting the construction in the public yards is attached this amendment: That if there are some things that can not be legitimately and appropriately made by the yard, then the Secretary may get those outside. There is no suggestion at all in relation to the private yards; and I assume that the private yards no more than the public yards manufacture, possibly, some of the things that may be necessary upon the cruisers. Therefore, not mentioning anything in respect to the private yards and those things not obtainable there, no necessity arises for mentioning anything in respect to the public yards and those things not obtainable there.

Mr. GLASS. The difference, Mr. President, is that the Government owns the public yards and can determine what may be manufactured there and what may not; but the Government does not own the private yards, and the Government would have no right whatsoever to determine what the private yards might do.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator has missed the point of what I was saying. That is not what I was endeavoring to suggest, perhaps quite inaptly.

Of course the Government owns the Government yards; but is it conceivable that if we direct a cruiser to be built in a Government yard, and a chronometer is required for that cruiser, therefore we are going to have the chronometer manufactured in the public yard?

Mr. GLASS. It is not only conceivable, but the Committee on Naval Affairs has conceived it.

Mr. JOHNSON. And it is exactly that that I say is wholly unnecessary. I do not care a rap, and the amendment that is suggested by the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from Virginia is perfectly satisfactory to me; but I think that no amendment at all, in the language either of the original bill or as they suggest, is necessary.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, I will read this language:

That the first and each succeeding alternate cruiser upon which work is undertaken * * * shall be constructed or manufactured in the Government navy yards.

Now, by putting in "together with the main engines, armor, and armament," that left it subject to the construction that everything should be done there that we chose to do there. Now, if the Navy were disposed not to do these things in the navy yards—which is what I am afraid of—they would say, "Well, we have to manufacture everything there, and it is utterly impossible to do it." What is the harm in putting in an amendment to make that clear, so that the Comptroller General will not have to pass on it, compelling them to manufacture and produce in the navy yards everything that is customarily obtained there?

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, we might just as well put on a proviso also to the effect that private owners, when we let a contract to build a ship, could go outside somewhere and buy what they did not manufacture themselves.

Mr. SWANSON. But the Senator will remember that the navy yards would be very glad to take his contention and be given the free hand which the Senate amendment gives them, which I think would simply make the navy yards assembling plants if it were carried out. This compels them to manufacture in the navy yards what it is customary to produce in the navy yards—customary in the case of the ships that are built, customary with the cruisers now being built, customary during the war—and does not compel them to create new plants and new products. There is a doubt as to whether that is not necessary.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing to agree to what the Senator says; but as a matter of simple accuracy, I do not want to subscribe to the doctrine that if we permit a Government yard to manufacture a cruiser, and a watch is required upon that cruiser, we have to put the Government yard into the manufacture of watches. That is exactly what has been contended for here, however.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield further?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Further, in regard to what the Senator from California has just said, let us look at the matter as a practical matter.

Here we are authorizing the building of eight ships in Government navy yards, without anything more. After these ships have been laid down, and they are proceeding with them, and it takes years to build them—we all know that it does take years to build them—suppose the Secretary of the Navy makes a report—and he is required to make a report every year, and can make one whenever he desires—suppose he should make a report saying, "There are certain articles that it will cost a great deal to manufacture if they are going to be manufactured in Government plants. It would be cheaper to buy them on the outside," why can we not wait and dispose of those matters then? Why mix up this arrangement contained in the Dallinger amendment with doubtful provisions which may be construed in any way by a Secretary of the Navy?

It looks to me as if we ought to go ahead and make the division equally between the private yards and the public yards, and settle these little insignificant matters afterwards. Surely the Secretary of the Navy has sense enough, if he finds it costs more for the Government to build in the navy yards than in private yards, or if he finds that he can buy them cheaper, to report that to the Congress.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I think I can make some explanation as to why this particular language was adopted in connection with the Dallinger amendment that might clear up some of the misunderstanding. At first the act provided that "the first and each succeeding alternate cruiser upon which work is undertaken." That is the way the amendment originally stood. But it was feared that perhaps all of the work which the Government could do would not be done in the Government yards. So, in order to make sure that all of the work which the navy yards could turn out would be done by the navy yards, these words were added, "together with the main engine, armor, and armament for such light cruisers."

Having specified those three qualifying phrases, it was then thought that the Government might be compelled, under a ruling of the comptroller, to build everything that would go into the cruiser, because it had attempted to specify an intention so to do. Therefore the committee drafted an amendment having for its purpose only the procuring of such things as could not be built in the Government yards. That was the reason the committee amendment was put in.

If the words "together with the main engine, armor, and armament" had not been used, then the qualifying committee amendment would not have been needed. But inasmuch as they were specified, the committee was afraid that work might be held up under a ruling of the comptroller, and that was the reason for the committee amendment.

I would just like to bring out this thought also. The ships that are to be built in the private yards will be built under a lump-sum contract. It is immaterial to the Government whether everything or nothing is built in the private yards. All the Government wants is a completed battleship in accordance with the specifications, and at the price bid. But when the Government attempts to build a ship, the way it is to be built is written into the act itself, and unless there is enough elasticity in the act, technical complications may prevent the completion of the ship in the time specified.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator says it was the intention of the committee to except only such articles as could not be manufactured by the navy yards. But this language is "except such material or parts." Will the Senator name a single part of a ship that is not excepted?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes. The fire-control apparatus can not be manufactured in the Government yards economically, because the Government has neither the patents nor the machinery necessary for that purpose.

Mr. BROOKHART. How much would a fire-control apparatus cost?

Mr. TYDINGS. It is a very expensive and delicate apparatus.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President——

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me conclude my statement.

Mr. BROOKHART. How much cheaper would it be——

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator has asked me a question. Now, just let me answer it. How about the range finders?

Mr. BROOKHART. That is a small item in building a ship.

Mr. TYDINGS. How about the telephones?

Mr. BROOKHART. That is another small item.

Mr. TYDINGS. But all these little items put together make a battleship.

Mr. WHEELER. What about the nails and the bolts and the screws?

Mr. HALE. The parts of the fire-control apparatus that they have to buy outside cost about $250,000.

Mr. BROOKHART. What does the whole cruiser cost?

Mr. HALE. Seventeen million dollars.

Mr. BROOKHART. What do the parts cost which we can not build, the whole number, the watches——

Mr. WHEELER. And the nails and the bolts?

Mr. NEELY. And the screws?

Mr. BROOKHART. How about gun forgings?

Mr. HALE. The Government does not manufacture gun forgings. The only place where it could make them would be at the Charleston armor plant, which can not be operated without a tremendous overhead expense. If we opened that plant it would cost us nearly twice as much for gun forgings as if we bought the forgings outside, and surely the Senator does not want to put the Government to that expense. The cost of the gun forgings is a very large item.

Mr. BROOKHART. So far as I am concerned, I am not willing to consent that any private company shall profiteer out of war preparations, either in time of peace or in time of war. I am opposed to war profiteering from beginning to end. I just voted for a treaty for the universal outlawry of war because I believed that way. So I am ready to have all this work, regardless of the cost, done in the Government yards, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. HALE. Regardless of the cost? The Senator and I would differ about that. I think it is our duty to look out for the expenditure of Government money.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I desire to make a few remarks on the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will not the Senator let the amendment be settled first?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). Does the Senator yield?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will not the Senator yield until this amendment can be disposed of? I suggest to the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from Tennessee that I think the Senate is ready to settle this particular amendment now, and if it is satisfactory to the Senate, I suggest that we proceed to do so.

Mr. SWANSON. I hope the Senator from Maine will accept it.

Mr. HALE. I think it carries out the intention of the committee.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I intend to speak just a few minutes on the bill itself, also on this amendment. I desire to put some important material in the RECORD that bears on the amendment, as well as on the whole bill, and if the Senators will bear with me for a few minutes, I will do so.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, may I make my apologies to the Senator from Nevada? I thought he had made a very excellent speech thus far.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment has not yet been adopted.

Mr. ODDIE. There are several very strong indorsements of this bill, including indorsements of the Dallinger amendment, which I desire to place in the RECORD.

In the first place, regarding the bill itself as it is before the Senate, and as it came from the House, I desire to place in the RECORD a statement by the Navy League of the United States giving a summary of the editorial comment on this bill from papers all over the country. It shows the ratio for and against the bill to be 7.8 to 1.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? Who composes the Navy League, and where do they get these figures?

Mr. ODDIE. The Navy League is headed by William Howard Gardiner, and is composed of a large number of able men in the United States who have been taking an active interest in the Navy, making a careful study regarding it, and who are well posted on Navy matters.

Mr. WHEELER. And largely spreading propaganda in favor of a larger Navy, and in behalf of the shipbuilders of the country.

Mr. ODDIE. They are spreading propaganda for Americanism and adequate national defense.

Mr. WHEELER. But largely for the shipbuilders of the country.

Mr. ODDIE. I resent that, because these men are good Americans. They are looking to the defense of our country, and are spreading what I believe, and a majority of the people believe, to be good and necessary information.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ODDIE. For a question; yes.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, everybody else in the Chamber has transgressed upon the time of the able Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE]. Therefore I beg him to forgive me for making unanimous the interruptions which he is so very patiently enduring.

I inquire of the Senator from Maine just what is included in the meaning of the term "armor" in line 7, on page 2, of the bill?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the word "armor" is included in the bill, but there is no armor of any sort whatever used on these cruisers. The ships have protective decks, with 3-inch steel plates, but that is rolled steel, not forged steel, and all armor is forged. These plates go into the construction of the ships, and are taken care of, not under the appropriation for "armor and armament," but by the Bureau of Construction and Repair under "hull and machinery."

Mr. NEELY. Am I correct in believing that no armor plate will be used in the construction of the 15 cruisers described in the bill?

Mr. HALE. There are, further, turrets for the guns, which are also not considered as armor.

Mr. NEELY. The Government has built an armor-plate plant in South Charleston, W. Va., at a cost of about $24,000,000. This plant is idle. It ought to be utilized, if possible. Consequently, if armor plate is to be used in the construction of anything authorized by the pending measure, I desire to offer an amendment that will provide for the making of such armor plate by the Charleston factory.

Mr. HALE. There is no armor provided for these vessels.

Mr. NEELY. That was my understanding.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I ask leave also to place in the RECORD a letter from John Thomas Taylor, of the national legislative committee of the American Legion, indorsing this bill.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NAVY LEAGUE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., January 7, 1929.

Editorials in the daily newspapers from all parts of the country continue to support the 15-cruiser replacement program now before the Senate; and this with increasing emphasis, for during November the favorable ratio was 6.1 to 1, whereas since then it has increased to 7.8 to 1.

On December 7, 1928, the Navy League of the United States issued a statement in which it said that year after year it has received from a well-known and wholly disinterested clipping bureau the editorial comment of the Nation's press on naval matters.

Classification of all editorials commenting on the 15-cruiser program, and received between Armistice Day and December 7, then gave a ratio, by newspaper circulation, of 6.1 in favor to 1 against.

Similar classification of all such editorials received since December 7 has yielded the still more interesting result summarized below:

Newspaper circulation:
For	5,179,940
Against	665,408
Ratio:
For	7.8
Against	1

While the relative increase from 6.1 to 7.8 (to 1) favoring the 15-cruiser program is significant, it is noteworthy that this increase is due, in part, to one of the very few metropolitan papers long opposed to American armaments having reversed its position.

NAVY LEAGUE OF THE UNITED STATES,
By WILLIAM HOWARD GARDINER, President.

THE AMERICAN LEGION NATIONAL LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE,
Washington, D. C., December 17, 1928.

Hon. TASKER L. ODDIE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: On March 17, 1928, the cruiser construction bill, calling for 15 fast scout cruisers and 1 airplane carrier, passed the House by a vote of 287 to 58 and was immediately forwarded to the Senate. This was a reduction of two-thirds from what the Secretary of the Navy stated was necessary to bring our Navy up to its ratio under the 5–5–3 treaty, the result of the Washington conference.

So that, although the enactment of this legislation will improve our relative naval position, it will not regain for us our lost parity.

We know that the pacifist groups of the country are flooding the Senate with mimeographed and stereotyped pacifist propaganda against this legislation, and that these are the same groups which have continually striven to weaken our national defense.

The American Legion at its San Antonio convention unanimously adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the bill known as House bill 11526, which authorized the construction of certain naval vessels, among which there are to be 15 light cruisers of 10,000 tons each, be given priority on the list of legislative projects and receive favorable action, and that the President of the United States of America be authorized to begin construction of these vessels at once."

We respectfully urge that when the cruiser bill comes before the Senate for consideration you will do everything in your power to aid its prompt passage.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN THOMAS TAYLOR,
National Legislative Committee.

Mr. ODDIE. I also desire to place in the RECORD a letter from the national vice chairman of the American Legion, George W. Malone, of Nevada, containing strong indorsement of this bill by the American Legion at its recent convention in San Antonio, Tex.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE MAYFLOWER,
Washington, D. C., December 19, 1928.

Hon. TASKER L. ODDIE,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Pursuant to our conversation, relative to House bill 11526, authorizing the construction of certain naval vessels, I am including herewith copy of our resolutions on this important subject at the last national American Legion convention in San Antonio, Tex.

"REPORT OF NAVAL AFFAIRS COMMITTEE

"Whereas the United States of America has become one of the world's foremost nations as to population, political influence, wealth, and workers for righteousness; and

"Whereas an adequate Navy is vital to the maintenance of peace, self-defense, and the furtherance of international righteousness; and

"Whereas it is vital that an intelligent body of sound-minded people combat the pacifism, bigotry, and misinformation being circulated respecting naval matters; and

"Whereas a Navy is of the utmost indirect importance to our uninterrupted economic expansion and prosperity: Be it

"CRUISER CONSTRUCTION

"Resolved, That the bill known as House bill 11526, which authorized the construction of certain naval vessels, among which there are to be 15 light cruisers of 10,000 tons each, be given priority on the list of legislative projects and receive favorable action, and that the President of the United States of America be authorized to begin construction of these vessels at once.

"AIRPLANE CARRIERS

"That the Congress of the United States of America authorize the construction of sufficient airplane-carrier tonnage to bring the United States Navy up to the tonnage allowed us by the Washington Disarmament Conference.

"MODERN NAVAL VESSELS

"That the Congress of the United States of America authorize the modernization of such of our naval vessels which have not been modernized wherein this is practicable.

"SUBMARINE CONSTRUCTION

"That the Congress of the United States of America authorize the construction of such submarines for our Navy as are recommended by the general board of the United States Navy.

"PROGRESS IN AVIATION

"That the present expansion experimentation by our naval and marine air forces be continued, and that the policy of keeping in the foreground of aviation progress in general be demanded, and that sufficient funds for this purpose be appropriated by the Congress of the United States.

"5–5–3 RATIO

"That we demand that the Congress of the United States abide by the Washington Disarmament Conference and in accordance therewith to bring the strength of the United States Navy up to the 5–5–3 ratio."

The American Legion is not warlike, certainly if any organization wants peace between the countries of the world, it is that organization, because they know what it means to fight, and they firmly believe that the peace conferences should be continued and that they will ultimately be successful, but in the meantime, recognizing conditions as they are, we must be prepared for emergencies.

We recognize that it is a terrible thing to send young men into battle, but it is infinitely more terrible to send them into battle without proper preparation; then, until it is evident that the danger of war is past, let us be reasonably prepared.

Our organization and the younger men will see our country through any emergency without fear of the result, if our country, through its Congress, will properly equip us for that emergency.

Sincerely yours,

GEORGE W. MALONE,
National Vice Commander American Legion.

Mr. ODDIE. I ask that a letter from William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, dated January 11, 1929, indorsing this bill with the Dallinger amendment, be placed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C., January 11, 1929.

Hon. TASKER L. ODDIE,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The delegates in attendance at the convention of the American Federation of Labor, held in the city of New Orleans from November 19 to 28, inclusive, declared in favor of the adoption of necessary provisions for national defense, including the building and maintenance of an adequate Navy.

Conforming to this declaration, the convention approved H. R. 11526, now pending in the Congress of the United States, which provides for the construction of 15 new cruisers. In connection with this matter, however, the convention unanimously approved that section of the bill which provides that 8 of the 15 cruisers authorized be built in Government navy yards.

In making this recommendation we are not unmindful of the difference of opinion which prevails regarding the construction of cruisers in privately owned shipbuilding yards or in the Government-owned navy yards. In passing upon this phase of the question it was the opinion of the representatives of the American Federation of Labor that the employees of the Government navy yards were entitled to consideration, and that they should be given an opportunity to construct 8 of the 15 cruisers provided for in the Navy bill. Such legislative action would serve to supply employment to a large number of competent workmen in the Government navy yards and would remove in a very large way the oft-repeated charge that certain special and private interests were supporting the Navy bill for selfish reasons and for the sole purpose of making profit out of the construction of Navy vessels for the Government.

I respectfully request that you give favorable consideration to these declarations and recommendations made at the New Orleans convention, which was representative of the membership of the American Federation of Labor.

Yours respectfully,

WM. GREEN,
President American Federation of Labor.

Mr. ODDIE. I also ask that a letter from Maude Wetmore, chairman of the executive council of the woman's department of the National Civic Federation, indorsing this legislation, be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK CITY, January 14, 1929.

MY DEAR SENATOR ODDIE: At a meeting of the executive council of the woman's department of the National Civic Federation assembled in New York on January 3, 1929, the following resolution was adopted:

"Whereas a Navy adequate for the national defense is essential to the development and safety of the Nation; and

"Whereas the President of the United States has stressed the need for greater cruiser strength: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That consistent with the established policy on national defense of the woman's department, the council indorses the naval construction bill pending in the Senate of the United States and urges its prompt passage, unamended."

Sincerely yours,

MAUDE WETMORE, Chairman.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. ODDIE. I yield.

Mr. BLAINE. I want to inquire, in connection with the indorsement the Senator has just submitted from the estimable madam, whether or not she favored the Kellogg peace pact?

Mr. ODDIE. I do not know about that. I am submitting this as it has come to me.

I also have several telegrams that I ask to have printed in the RECORD, from the American Legion of Nevada and Arizona and from the American Legion Auxiliary of Nevada.

Mr. WHEELER. They have all made a study of the necessity of our Government needing a larger Navy, I suppose?

Mr. ODDIE. Yes; they have been reading good material on this question.

Mr. WHEELER. They were all in favor of the peace treaty, were they not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Commander F. A. MYLIUS, Adjutant.

Mr. ODDIE. I also submit a communication from the National Sojourners in connection with the resolution I will introduce from the Daughters of the American Revolution.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Adopted by National Sojourners January 11; also adopted by 44 participating organizations January 11

The committee of 33 of the National Sojourners, representing, as it does, a membership of American citizens located in all parts of the United States and its possessions, hereby declares:

(a) We heartily indorse the expressions of our President, Calvin Coolidge, made in his Armistice Day address, as follows: "We made altogether the heaviest sacrifice in scrapping work which was already in existence. That should forever remain not only a satisfaction to ourselves but a demonstration to others of our good faith in advocating the principle of limitation," and "it is obvious that eliminating all competition world standards of defense require us to have more cruisers."

(b) That we view with alarm the past and present actions of certain groups of peoples who are attempting to interfere with such proper measures of national defense and national security as are required by the Constitution of the United States.

(c) That our fellow countrymen must realize the vast sacrifices made by the United States after the conference on limitation of armaments, 1921–22, these sacrifices continuing on to date, showing an average falling to the rear daily for seven years past as regards Great Britain of 33 tons of cruisers, 10 tons of destroyers, and 10 tons of submarines, and as regards Japan of 20 tons, 30 tons, and 16 tons, respectively, and that our willingness to reduce has been fully shown.

(d) That peace pact or no peace pact, the situation is such the passage of the 15 cruiser bill at once is imperative for the preservation of our dignity among the nations when sitting at a council board, the protection of our nationals abroad when needed, the safety of our great trade and commerce on the seven seas.

(e) And that we call on all patriotic citizens to come to a realization of present conditions and assist in thwarting interests, well meaning or otherwise, whose actions in our judgment are dangerous to the perpetuation of American institutions.

GEO. R. UNMACHT,
National Secretary.

Mr. ODDIE. I have a resolution from the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, with reference to that I am going to insist that for the benefit and enlightenment of the Senate this letter from the Daughters of the American Revolution be read. I think it ought to be read.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I intend to read it. It is as follows:

NATIONAL SOCIETY,
DAUGHTERS OF THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION,
January 11, 1929.

Whereas the President of the United States, in his Armistice Day address insisted that "World standards of defense require us to have more cruisers"; and

Whereas we maintain that the hope for domestic tranquility and common defense expressed in the Constitution of the United States should be sustained at this time by an army strengthened in accordance with the national defense act of 1920 and a navy conforming to the 5–5–3 ratio as agreed upon at the Washington conference; and

Whereas we are seriously impressed by the hazard involved in further delaying to provide adequate defense for the United States; and

Whereas we recognize the risk in substituting enactment of law as a mere farce in place of actually obtaining sufficient men for the Army and real ships for the Navy or in our Nation's sole reliance upon treaties unsupported by adequate defenses: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we, as representatives of 52 patriotic organizations, record our indorsement of the cruiser bill and anticipate that its passage in the Senate will pave the way for further provision for a navy, merchant marine, and naval bases appropriate to American dignity, and in conjunction with the building of cruisers and auxiliaries, we ask Congress to provide for a sufficient personnel to man them; and be it further

Resolved, That we avoid a fluctuating policy of defense by maintaining an army at this time substantially unvaried from the exact plan of the national defense act of 1920; and be it further

Resolved, That we welcome and lend our moral support to congressional investigations of antidefense forces wherever they may be discovered to be masking efforts to subvert our constitutional form of government under the guise of working for world peace.

Adopted unanimously by representatives of organizations in conference assembled, whose names are hereto attached:

I ask that there be printed in the RECORD a list of 52 organizations which have indorsed the resolution just read.

Mr. BROOKHART and Mr. McKELLAR addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. BROOKHART. I want to know whether I should object or not. I want to ask the Senator a question first. I would like to know if the Daughters of the American Revolution organization whose resolution he has just presented is comprised of the same crowd of ladies who blacklisted me as un-American?

Mr. ODDIE. I do not know.

Mr. WHEELER. If they have not done so yet, when they find out that the Senator from Iowa is against the cruiser bill they will do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Nevada is granted.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I am not going to make any extended statement on the bill at this time. It is known very well that I favor the bill and am most anxious to see it passed, and passed promptly. I am anxious to have my position clearly understood. I am confident that it is the opinion of a large number of Senators, as it is mine, that the bill does not mean competition in navy building with any other nation, but it means a partial-replacement program. It will result in more nearly balancing of our fleet by the addition of cruisers which it sadly lacks to-day, the lack of which throws our fleet out of balance in comparison with other fleets in the world. I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ODDIE. I am not going to make any further remarks at this time, but I yield for a question.

Mr. WHEELER. Will the Senator tell me just the ships which the 15 cruisers are going to replace?

Mr. ODDIE. I have here a list of 22 old cruisers——

Mr. WHEELER. I would like to know which ones those are going to replace, because I understand we have replaced some of them several times. I would like to know definitely which ones are to be replaced.

Mr. ODDIE. I said it was to be a partial replacement.

Mr. WHEELER. Can the Senator tell me what cruisers the new ones are to replace?

Mr. ODDIE. I will state further that, eliminating all question of replacement, in order to bring our fleet up somewhere near the 5–5–3 ratio these 15 cruisers should be built. With the 15 new cruisers we will not even then approach our place in the 5–5–3 ratio.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator stated they were for replacement. I would like to know what it is proposed to have them replace. I read Mr. Butler's statement in the House, he being at the time chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee, in which he said they were not for replacement and that the first time he had ever heard of them being for replacement was when some one on the floor of the House made that statement.

Mr. ODDIE. It is a case of partial replacement in addition to bringing our fleet nearer the 5–5–3 ratio.

Mr. HALE. It is a replacement of existing cruisers, as the Senator very well knows.

Mr. WHEELER. No; the Senator does not know any such thing.

Mr. HALE. There are 22 old cruisers with a tonnage of 179,000 tons plus, which have not been replaced, and are still on the Navy list.

Mr. WHEELER. But they are not in the first line?

Mr. HALE. That has nothing to do with replacement.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator from Maine knows perfectly well that Mr. Butler, chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee of the House, made the statement that these were not for replacement.

Mr. HALE. I am not responsible for his statement, but I am responsible for my own statement that these ships are to replace certain old cruisers of the Navy.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me ask the Senator another question. When these eight cruisers were built, what were they to replace?

Mr. HALE. They were not to replace any ships, because we knew that when they were added to the 10 modern cruisers, which we now have, we still would not have enough cruisers to protect our fleet and our commerce, and therefore we have had to keep these old ships in the Navy for possible use, ineffective as they are.

Mr. WHEELER. What ships are going to be replaced, so the RECORD may show clearly?

Mr. HALE. I have just told the Senator.

Mr. WHEELER. I would like to have the names.

Mr. ODDIE. I have here a list of 23 old cruisers.

Mr. WHEELER. I have 23 names of cruisers, too; but I say they have been replaced several times. I want to have the names in the RECORD, so that when we have another naval construction bill before the Senate it may not be argued that the proposed new vessels are to replace the same boats which it is now claimed the present proposed cruisers are to be built to replace. I think the names ought to go in the RECORD for that purpose if for none other. Every time we have a cruiser construction bill it is claimed that the new vessels are to be constructed for replacement of the same old 22 or 23 ships which we have had for years.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I ask at this time that a list of ships, comprising 22 old cruisers of the Navy of which I have spoken, may be printed in the RECORD. It is these ships that we are going to replace.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The list is as follows:

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, what is the Senator from Maine going to do with the old ships? What is going to become of the ships we are retiring?

Mr. HALE. They will be scrapped and gotten out of the way as soon as it is possible to do so.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, by request I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD two letters from constituents addressed to the Citizens Conference on Cruisers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letters are as follows:

THE RECTORY, NELSON PARISH,
Kearneysville, W. Va., January 6, 1929.

The CITIZENS CONFERENCE ON CRUISERS,
Hotel Washington, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIRS: I find it impossible to attend the dinner announced by your committee, as much as I would like to. I say this apropos the check I mailed you a few days ago. Of course, I am deeply in sympathy with this whole movement and hope the Nation, through its National House, will take a definite stand when the bill is debated. I am

Very cordially,

HUNTER DAVIDSON.

SALEM COLLEGE,
Salem, W. Va., January 2, 1929.

CITIZENS CONFERENCE ON CRUISERS,
Hotel Washington, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: While I am unable to be with you in attendance at the conference, I am in sympathy with your efforts to curb our expenditure for war purposes and to express faith in the future peace tendencies of the world.

Sincerely yours,

S. O. BOND.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, we have threshed out the question of the amendment to the Dallinger amendment, and I think it has been substantially agreed that the words which have been offered as a substitute by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] should go in the bill. I understand the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs has agreed to it. Therefore I ask unanimous consent to strike out the committee amendment in lines 12, 13, and 14, page 2 of the bill, and to insert in lieu thereof the amendment of the Senator from Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. DILL. Let us have the wording of the proposed amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Tennessee proposes to strike out the following on page 2, lines 12, 13, and 14:

except such material or parts thereof as the Secretary of the Navy may find procurable by contract or purchase at an appreciable saving in cost to the Government.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

except such materials or parts as are not customarily manufactured in such Government plants.

Mr. McKELLAR. That has been agreed to by everybody, as I understand, and what moves me to agree to it is that I have been assured by four out of five of the probable conferees on the bill that they are going to stand for the Dallinger amendment just as it is in the bill with this amendment attached. On that assurance I am asking unanimous consent for the substitution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. WHEELER. I object.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then I ask for a vote on my amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Connecticut will state the point of order.

Mr. BINGHAM. What, then, is to become of my substitute for the Senator's amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will still be subject to a vote after the amendment which has just been offered has been disposed of. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have offered a substitute for the committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The substitute will be in order after the committee amendment has been voted on. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, a point of order. I do not understand how the substitute for the committee amendment, which I offered, loses its parliamentary status.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's substitute involves more than is included in the committee amendment as amended, and after the committee amendment as amended is voted on the Senator's substitute will be in order. The question is on the committee amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the substitute offered by the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. PHIPPS. Let it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The substitute will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Connecticut proposes the following amendment: On page 2, strike out the proviso in lines 5 to 14, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

And provided further, That no part of the moneys herein authorized to be appropriated for the naval establishment shall be used or expended under contracts hereafter made for the repair, purchase, or acquirement, by or from any private contractor, of any naval vessel, machinery, article, or articles that at the time of the proposed repair, purchase, or acquirement can be repaired, manufactured, or produced in each or any of the Government navy yards or arsenals of the United States, when time and facilities permit, and when, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy, such repair, purchase, acquirement, or production would not involve an appreciable increase in cost to the Government.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I ask at this time that the clerk may read a resolution passed last summer by the United States Shipping Board.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Whereas the United States Shipping Board is charged with the creation and development of an American merchant marine; and

Whereas the board is authorized by the Jones-White Act to make loans for the construction of merchant ships by private citizens; and

Whereas the cost of such construction in American yards is greatly in excess of like construction in foreign yards; and

Whereas the present decline of American shipyards is a serious, if not fatal, menace to the American merchant marine; and

Whereas American shipyards are a necessary and integral part of an American merchant marine in times of peace, as well as in times of national emergency; and

Whereas the costs of commercial ships in American yards can, and will, be greatly decreased if American private shipyards are given contracts for naval construction: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the earnest belief of this board that the United States Senate in its consideration of the pending cruiser construction bill should strike out the Dallinger amendment and leave with the Secretary of the Navy the power, which he now possesses under existing law, to use his discretion in deciding whether cruisers shall be built in navy yards or in privately owned yards.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, that resolution was passed by the United States Shipping Board last summer and it was to carry out the resolution of the Shipping Board and the ideas therein expressed as bearing on the subject matter now before the Senate. I ask that a vote may be had on my substitute.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the substitute amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM].

The amendment was rejected.

ROBERT TOQUOTHTY

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair) laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2362) to authorize the payment to Robert Toquothty of royalties arising from an oil and gas well in the bed of the Red River, Okla., which was, on page 1, line 10, after "704," to insert "that no attorney fee paid in connection with this case shall exceed 10 per cent of the amount stated in this act."

Mr. FRAZIER. I move that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 15 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened; and (at 4 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, January 28, 1929, at 12 o'clock meridian.

GENERAL CLAIMS CONVENTION

In executive session this day, the following convention was ratified and, on motion of Mr. BORAH, the injunction of secrecy was removed therefrom:

To the Senate:

To the end that I may receive the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, I transmit herewith a convention between the United States and the Republic of Panama for the settlement and amicable adjustment of claims by the citizens of each country against the other, signed at Washington, July 28, 1926.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington.

The PRESIDENT:

The undersigned, the Secretary of State, has the honor to lay before the President, with a view to its transmission to the Senate to receive the advice and consent of that body to ratification, if his judgment approve thereof, a convention between the United States and the Republic of Panama for the settlement and adjustment of claims by the citizens of each country against the other, signed at Washington on July 28, 1926.

Respectfully submitted.

FRANK B. KELLOGG.

Accompaniment: Convention.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 7, 1926.

The United States of America and the Republic of Panama, desiring to settle and adjust amicably claims by the citizens of each country against the other, have decided to enter into a Convention with this object, and to this end have nominated as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States of America, The Honorable Frank B. Kellogg, Secretary of State of the United States of America; and

The President of the Republic of Panama, The Honorable Doctor Ricardo J. Alfero, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of Panama to the United States and the Honorable Doctor Eusebio A. Morales, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of Panama on special mission; who, after having communicated to each other their respective full powers found to be in due and proper form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE I

All claims against the Republic of Panama arising since November 3, 1903, except the so-called Colon Fire Claims hereafter referred to, and which at the time they arose were those of citizens of the United States of America, whether corporations, companies, associations, partnerships, or individuals, for losses or damages suffered by persons or by their properties, and all claims against the United States of America arising since November 3, 1903, and which at the time they arose were those of citizens of the Republic of Panama, whether corporations, companies, associations, partnerships or individuals, for losses or damages suffered by persons or by their properties; all claims for losses or damages suffered by citizens of either country, by reason of losses or damages suffered by any corporation, company, association or partnership, in which such citizens have or have had, a substantial and bona fide interest, provided an allotment to the claimant by the corporation, company, association or partnership, of his proportion of the loss or damage suffered is presented by the claimant to the Commission; and all claims for losses or damage originating from acts of officials or others acting for either Government, and resulting in injustice, and which claims may have been presented to either Government for its interposition with the other, and which have remained unsettled, as well as any other such claims which may be filed by either Government within the time hereinafter specified, shall be submitted to a Commission consisting of three members for decision in accordance with the principles of international law, justice and equity. As an exception to the claims to be submitted to such Commission, unless by later specific agreement of the two Contracting Parties, are claims for compensation on account of damages caused in the manner set forth in Article VI of the Treaty of November 18, 1903, for the construction of the Panama Canal, which shall continue to be heard and decided by the Joint Commission provided for in that Article of the Treaty.

With regard to the exception above made respecting the claims for losses suffered by American citizens as a result of the fire that occurred in the City of Colon on March 31, 1885, the Government of Panama agrees in principle to the arbitration of such claims under a Convention to which the Republic of Colombia shall be invited to become a party and which shall provide for the creation or selection of an arbitral tribunal to determine the following questions: First, whether the Republic of Colombia incurred any liability for losses sustained by American citizens on account of the fire that took place in the City of Colon on the 31st of March 1885; and, second, in case it should be determined in the arbitration that there is an original liability on the part of Colombia, to what extent, if any, the Republic of Panama has succeeded Colombia in such liability on account of her separation from Colombia on November 3, 1903, and the Government of Panama agrees to cooperate with the Government of the United States by means of amicable representations in the negotiation of such arbitral agreement between the three Countries.

The hearing and adjudication of particular claims in accordance with their merits in order to determine the amount of damages to be paid, if any, in case a liability is found, shall take place before a special tribunal to be constituted in such form as the circumstances created by the tri-partite arbitration shall demand.

As a specific exception to the limitation of the claims to be submitted to the Commission against the United States of America it is agreed that there shall be submitted to the Commission the claims of Abbondio Caselli, a Swiss citizen, or the Government of Panama, and Jose C. Monteverde, an Italian subject, or the Government of Panama, as their respective interests in such claims may appear, these claims having arisen from land purchased by the Government of Panama from the said Caselli and Monteverde and afterwards expropriated by the Government of the United States, and having formed in each case the subject matter of a decision by the Supreme Court of Panama.

The Commission shall be constituted as follows: One member shall be appointed by the President of the United States; one by the President of the Republic of Panama; and the third, who shall preside over the Commission, shall be selected by mutual agreement between the two Governments. If the two Governments shall not agree within two months from the exchange of ratifications of this Convention in naming such a third member, then he shall be designated by the President of the Permanent Administrative Council of the Permanent Court of Arbitration at The Hague described in Article 49 of the Convention for the Pacific Settlement of International Disputes concluded at The Hague October 18, 1907. In case of the death, absence or incapacity of any member of the Commission, or in the event of the member omitting or ceasing to act as such, the same procedure shall be followed for filling the vacancy as was followed in appointing him.

ARTICLE II

The Commissioners so named shall meet at Washington for organization within six months after the exchange of ratifications of this Convention, and each member of the Commission before entering upon his duties, shall make and subscribe a solemn declaration stating that he will carefully and impartially examine and decide according to the best of his judgment and in accordance with the principles of international law, justice and equity, all claims presented for his decision, and such declaration shall be entered upon the record of the proceedings of the Commission.

The Commission may fix the time and place of its subsequent meetings, either in the United States or in Panama as may be convenient, subject always to the specific instruction of the two Governments.

ARTICLE III

The Commission shall have authority by the decision of the majority of its members to adopt such rules for its proceedings as may be deemed expedient and necessary, not in conflict with any of the provisions of this Convention.

Each Government may nominate agents or counsel who will be authorized to present to the Commission orally or in writing, all the arguments deemed expedient in favor of or against any claim. The agents or counsel of either Government may offer to the Commission any documents, affidavits, interrogatories or other evidence desired in favor of or against any claim and shall have the right to examine witnesses under oath or affirmation before the Commission, in accordance with such rules of procedure as the Commission shall adopt.

The decision of the majority of the members of the Commission shall be the decision of the Commission.

The language in which the proceedings shall be conducted and recorded shall be English or Spanish.

ARTICLE IV

The Commission shall keep an accurate record of the claims and cases submitted, and minutes of its proceedings with the dates thereof. To this end, each Government may appoint a Secretary; those Secretaries shall act as joint Secretaries of the Commission and shall be subject to its instructions. Each Governnrent may also appoint and employ, any necessary assistant secretaries and such other assistants as may be deemed necessary. The Commission may also appoint and employ any other persons necessary to assist in the performance of its duties.

ARTICLE V

The High Contracting Parties being desirous of effecting an equitable settlement of the claims of their respective citizens, thereby affording them just and adequate compensation for their losses or damages, agree that no claim shall be disallowed or rejected by the Commission through the application of the general principle of international law that the legal remedies must be exhausted as a condition precedent to the validity or allowance of any claim.

ARTICLE VI

Every such claim for loss or damage accruing prior to the signing of this Convention, shall be filed with the Commission within four months from the date of its first meeting, unless in any case reasons for the delay, satisfactory to the majority of the Commissioners, shall be established, and in any such case the period for filing the claim may be extended not to exceed two additional months.

The Commission shall be bound to hear, examine and decide, within one year from the date of its first meeting, all the claims filed.

Three months after the date of the first meeting of the Commissioners and every three months thereafter, the Commission shall submit to each Government a report setting forth in detail its work to date, including a statement of the claims filed, claims heard and claims decided. The Commission shall be bound to decide any claim heard and examined, within six months after the conclusion of the hearing of such claim and to record its decision.

ARTICLE VII

The High Contracting Parties agree to consider the decision of the Commission as final and conclusive upon each claim decided, and to give full effect to such decisions. They further agree to consider the result of the proceedings of the Commission as a full, perfect and final settlement of every such claim upon either Government, for loss or damage sustained prior to the exchange of the ratifications of the present Convention. And they further agree that every such claim, whether or not filed and presented to the notice of, made, preferred or submitted to such Commission, shall from and after the conclusion of the proceedings of the Commission, be considered and treated as fully settled, barred, and thenceforth inadmissible, provided in the case of claims filed with the Commission that such claims have been heard and decided.

This provision shall not apply to the so-called Colon Fire Claims, which will be disposed of in the manner provided for in Article I of this Convention.

ARTICLE VIII

The total amount awarded in all the cases decided in favor of the citizens of one country shall be deducted from the total amount awarded to the citizens of the other country, and the balance shall be paid at the City of Panama or at Washington, in gold coin or its equivalent within one year from the date of the final meeting of the Commission, to the Government of the country in favor of whose citizens the greater amount may have been awarded.

ARTICLE IX

Each Government shall pay its own Commissioner and bear its own expenses. The expenses of the Commission including the salary of the third Commissioner shall be defrayed in equal proportions by the two Governments.

ARTICLE X

The present Convention shall be ratified by the High Contracting Parties in accordance with their respective Constitutions. Ratifications of this Convention shall be exchanged in Washington as soon as practicable and the Convention shall take effect on the date of the exchange of ratifications.

In witness whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed and affixed their seals to this Convention.

NATURALIZATION TREATY BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND CZECHOSLOVAKIA

The United States of America and the Czechoslovak Republic, being desirous of reaching an agreement concerning the status of former nationals of either country who have acquired, or may acquire, the nationality of the other by reasonable processes of naturalization within its territories, have resolved to conclude a treaty on this subject and for that purpose have appointed their plenipotentiaries, that is to say:

The President of the United States of America: LEWIS EINSTEIN, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States to Czechoslovakia and

The President of the Czechoslovak Republic: KAMIL KROFTA, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary,

Who, having communicated to each other their full powers, found to be in good and due form, have agreed upon the following Articles:

ARTICLE I

Nationals of the United States who have been or shall be naturalized in Czechoslovak territories shall be held by the United States to have lost their former nationality and to be nationals of Czechoslovakia.

Reciprocally, nationals of Czechoslovakia who have been or shall be naturalized in the territories of the United States shall be held by Czechoslovakia to have lost their former nationality and to be nationals of the United States.

The foregoing provisions of this Article shall not be applicable to a national of either country who obtains naturalization in the other while his country is at war.

The word "national", as used in this convention, means a person having the nationality of the United States or Czechoslovakia, respectively, under the laws thereof.

The word "naturalized" refers to the naturalization of a person over twenty-one years of age, granted upon his own application, while he is permanently residing within the country of naturalization, and to the naturalization of a person under twenty-one years of age through the naturalization of a parent, provided such person has acquired a permanent residence within the country of naturalization.

ARTICLE II

Nationals of either of the Contracting States naturalized as provided in Article I, shall not, upon their return to the territory of the country of which they were formerly nationals, be prosecuted or punished for expatriation or for having failed, prior to their naturalization, to answer summonses to military service which had been served upon them within a period of five years preceding their naturalization.

ARTICLE III

If a national of either country, who comes within the purview of Article I, shall renew his residence in his original country without the intent to return to that in which he was naturalized, he shall be held to have lost the nationality acquired by naturalization.

The intent not to return may be held to exist when a person naturalized in the one country shall have resided more than two years in the other.

ARTICLE IV

The present Convention, drawn up in English and Czechoslovak, both texts being authoritative, shall be subject to ratification by the High Contracting Parties in conformity with their respective constitutions, and shall become operative immediately upon the exchange of ratifications, which shall take place at Washington as soon as possible.

The present Convention shall remain in force for ten years. If neither of the High Contracting Parties states its intention of denouncing it at least one year before the end of the abovementioned period, it will remain in force and will not terminate until a year after one or the other of the High Contracting Parties shall have denounced it.

In witness whereof, the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this Treaty and have hereunto affixed their seals.

EXCHANGE OF NOTES

JAPANESE EMBASSY,
Washington, May 31, 3 Shōwa (1928).

SIR: In proceeding to-day to the signature of the convention between Japan and the United States for the purpose of avoiding difficulties which might arise in connection with the laws in force in the United States on the subject of alcoholic beverages, I am happy to attach hereto, for the purpose of future reference, a memorandum of the understanding that has been reached between us in regard to the interpretation of the convention. I beg leave, therefore, to request that you kindly acknowledge and confirm this statement.

Accept, sir, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

T. MATSUDAIRA.

Hon. FRANK B. KELLOGG,
Secretary of State,
Washington.

JAPANESE EMBASSY,
Washington.

MEMORANDUM

It is understood—

1. That the term "private vessels" as used in the convention signifies all classes of vessels other than those owned or controlled by the Japanese Government and used for governmental purposes, for the conduct of which the Japanese Government assumes full responsibility.

2. That the rights conferred on the authorities of the United States under Article II of the convention do not relate to territorial waters of Japan or to waters of any territory over which Japan exercises a mandate under the authority of the League of Nations.

3. That there will be no advance requirement that Japanese vessels shall stop regularly at designated places to await such inquiries or examination as are authorized in Article II of the convention.

4. That the convention does not relate to alcoholic liquors for nonbeverage, including medicinal, purposes, which are regulated by the domestic laws of the United States.

5. That the expression "three months before the expiration of the said period of one year," as used in the second paragraph of Article V, is used in the sense of not later than three months before the expiration of the said period.

6. That questions involving the application of the convention arising while it is in force will be adjudicated in accordance with the provisions of the convention as in force at the time the circumstances occurred, even if the convention should lapse or be terminated before the decision is rendered.

MAY 31, 1928.

EXCELLENCY:

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's note dated May 31, 1928, and the memorandum attached thereto of the understanding that has been reached between us in regard to the interpretation of the convention between the United States and Japan for the purpose of avoiding difficulties which might arise in connection with the laws in force in the United States on the subject of alcoholic beverages.

I beg to state that I am happy to confirm that the said memorandum, a duplicate of which is attached hereto, is a correct statement of the understanding reached by us in regard to the interpretation of the convention.

Accept, Excellency, the renewed assurances of my highest consideration.

FRANK B. KELLOGG.

His Excellency Mr. TSUNEO MATSUDAIRA,
The Japanese Ambassador.

The President of the United States of America and His Majesty the Emperor of Japan, being desirous of avoiding any difficulties which might arise between them in connection with the laws in force in the United States on the subject of alcoholic beverages, have decided to conclude a Convention for that purpose, and have appointed as their Plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States of America, Frank B. Kellogg, Secretary of State of the United States;

His Majesty the Emperor of Japan, Tsuneo Matsudaira, Jusammi, the First Class of the Imperial Order of the Sacred Treasure, His Majesty's Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary to the United States of America;

Who, having communicated their full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed as follows:

ARTICLE I

The High Contracting Parties declare that it is their firm intention to uphold the principle that three marine miles extending from the coastline outwards and measured from low-water mark constitute the proper limits of territorial waters.

ARTICLE II

(1) The Japanese Government agree that they will raise no objection to the boarding of private vessels under the Japanese flag outside the limits of territorial waters by the authorities of the United States, its territories or possessions, in order that enquiries may be addressed to those on board and an examination be made of the ship's papers for the purpose of ascertaining whether the vessel or those on board are endeavoring to import or have imported alcoholic beverages into the United States, its territories or possessions, in violation of the laws there in force. When such enquiries and examination show a reasonable ground for suspicion, a search of the vessel may be initiated.

(2) If there is reasonable cause for belief that the vessel has committed or is committing or attempting to commit an offense against the laws of the United States, its territories or possessions, prohibiting the importation of alcoholic beverages, the vessel may be seized and taken into a port of the United States, its territories or possessions, for adjudication in accordance with such laws.

(3) The rights conferred by this article shall not be exercised at a greater distance from the coast of the United States, its territories or possessions, than can be traversed in one hour by the vessel suspected of endeavoring to commit the offense. In cases, however, in which the liquor is intended to be conveyed to the United States, its territories or possessions, by a vessel other than the one boarded and searched, it shall be the speed of such other vessel, and not the speed of the vessel boarded, which shall determine the distance from the coast at which the right under this article can be exercised.

ARTICLE III

No penalty or forfeiture under the laws of the United States shall be applicable or attach to alcoholic liquors or to vessels or persons by reason of the carriage of such liquors, when such liquors are listed as sea stores or cargo destined for a port foreign to the United States, its territories or possessions, on board Japanese vessels voyaging to or from ports of the United States, or its territories or possessions, or passing through the territorial waters thereof, provided that such liquors shall be kept under seal continuously while the vessel on which they are carried remains within said territorial waters and that no part of such liquors shall at any time or place be unladen within the United States, its territories or possessions.

ARTICLE IV

Any claim by a Japanese vessel for compensation on the ground that it has suffered loss or injury through the improper or unreasonable exercise of the rights conferred by Article II of this Convention or on the ground that it has not been given the benefit of Article III shall be referred for the joint consideration of two persons, one of whom shall be nominated by each of the High Contracting Parties.

Effect shall be given to the recommendations contained in any such joint report. If no joint report can be agreed upon, the claim shall be referred to the Permanent Court of Arbitration at The Hague described in the Convention for the pacific settlement of international disputes, concluded at The Hague, October 18, 1907. The arbitral tribunal shall be constituted in accordance with Article 87 (Chapter IV) and with Article 59 (Chapter III) of the said Convention. The proceedings shall be regulated by so much of Chapter IV of the said Convention and of Chapter III thereof (special regard being had for Articles 70 and 74, but excepting Articles 53 and 54) as the tribunal may consider to be applicable and to be consistent with the provisions of this agreement. All sums of money which may be awarded by the tribunal on account of any claim shall be paid within eighteen months after the date of the final award without interest and without deduction, save as hereafter specified. Each Government shall bear its own expenses. The expenses of the tribunal shall be defrayed by a ratable deduction from the amount of the sums awarded by it, at a rate of five per cent on such sums, or at such lower rate as may be agreed upon between the two Governments; the deficiency, if any, shall be defrayed in equal moieties by the two Governments.

ARTICLE V

This Convention shall be subject to ratification and shall remain in force for a period of one year from the date of the exchange of ratifications.

Three months before the expiration of the said period of one year, either of the High Contracting Parties may give notice of its desire to propose modifications in the terms of the Convention.

If such modifications have not been agreed upon before the expiration of the term of one year mentioned above, the Convention shall lapse.

If no notice is given on either side of the desire to propose modifications, the Convention shall remain in force for another year, and so on automatically, but subject always in respect of each such period of a year to the right on either side to propose as provided above three months before its expiration modifications in the Convention, and to the provision that if such modifications are not agreed upon before the close of the period of one year, the convention shall lapse.

ARTICLE VI

In the event that either of the High Contracting Parties shall be prevented either by judicial decision or legislative action from giving full effect to the provisions of the present Convention the said Convention shall automatically lapse, and, on such lapse or whenever this Convention shall cease to be in force, each High Contracting Party shall enjoy all the rights which it would have possessed had this Convention not been concluded.

The present Convention shall be duly ratified by the President of the United States of America, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof and by His Majesty the Emperor of Japan; and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington as soon as possible.

In witness whereof, the respective Plenipotentiaries have signed the present Convention in duplicate and have thereunto affixed their seals.

Done at the City of Washington this 31st day of May, in the nineteen hundred and twenty-eighth year of the Christian era, corresponding to the 31st day of the 5th month of the 3rd year of Shōwa.
